The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] takes the floor and yields to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to see a gentleman who professes friendship for the soldiers rise in his seat and make a speech against them. I was sorry to have objection made yesterday when I offered a resolution asking the present Secretary of War, who is not a soldier, who was too young to be a soldier, if in his opinion the duties now performed by the Assistant Secretary of War might not be better performed after the 4th of March, 1897, by the selection by him, the Secretary of War, of the General of the Army or the Adjutant-General of the Army to perform the duties of Secretary of War during his sickness or temporary absence.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Was the gentleman a member of the Fifty-first Congress, a Republican Congress, which created that ornamental office, and did he vote for the bill?

Mr. STEELE. I was not a member of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am glad that the gentleman escaped voting for that bill.

Mr. STEELE. I did not vote for the bill. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the heroes of the war ought to be kindergarten instructors. I do not believe that a stripling should be selected as Assistant Secretary of War, who may order about the heroes of the rebellion. Why, in eight years at most the General of the Army will go out of active service, and as he is the youngest man, or about so, of the general officers or staff who served during the war, and who must retire within the time named on account of age, the Department and Army will be in the hands of civilians or officers appointed since the war.

Now, I know my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] did not mean to say yesterday that he wanted a little more civilian blood in it. Why, the Secretary of War is a civilian, and the duties of the Assistant Secretary of War, under the old régime, were limited to such as he directed during his absence. No trouble ever came on account of it. There is not much military about it; yet, if I am not misinformed, the present Assistant Secretary of War, so far from being a civilian in his notions, visits from post to post in the Army and is not at all satisfied unless the troops are turned out and a salute is fired in his honor, being more military display than Secretaries of War ask or expect. If this be correct, and I think it is from what I have heard and seen of the young gentleman, there is too much civilian for him.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad to live in a country and in an age when people, without regard to party, generally are proud to care for their soldiers. They are proud to give them good homes, where they have not homes of their own. The best soldiers' homes ever erected have been provided for them by the liberality of Congress, and they are now so crowded that men are sleeping on the floors and hundreds are waiting their turn for admission.

I am glad that I live in an age when the people feel like granting liberal pensions to their soldiers, and am sorry that we even have one man who objects to the harmless legislation, if you please to so call it, that is proposed in this bill, such as will induce or compel the Department to carry out the spirit of the laws enacted rather than grade them, and that will at the same time prevent the improper expenditure of the money appropriated.

Something must be done during the present session of Congress, and more especially for those soldiers who, on account of false modesty, deferred filing their applications until it is now about impossible for them to make the technical proof required.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he insists on this amendment? It does not seem to do anything more than to authorize the Commissioner.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think it will do any harm, and I would like it to go in.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It might do this—let me call the attention of the gentleman. It might make legal and perhaps ratify similar orders to Order 229, which has been very obnoxious to the whole country. This amendment as it is drawn states—

That it shall be competent for the Commissioner of Pensions, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to establish such rules and regulations for the presentation and prosecution of pension claims as shall be necessary to facilitate the transaction of business.

Now, here is a rule or regulation established by the Commissioner of Pensions, which is very obnoxious, in reference to the taking of affidavits, which makes it impossible for anybody to prepare affidavits unless he has been properly drilled.

Mr. STEELE. If there is even a suspicion that it will indorse Rule 229, I certainly will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois desires to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by inserting after the word "dollars," in line 4, page 2, these words "to be paid quarterly to all pensioners now borne on the rolls, or which may be hereafter placed thereon, at the rates now allowed such pensioners, or at such increased rates as may be hereafter allowed them by law."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, that part of the bill has been passed over, and I will have to make the point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that that part of the bill has been passed over, and that no amendment to it would be in order.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to state that this portion of the bill should be informally passed over, and that we should return to it and have opportunity to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the paragraph commencing with line 9 and ending with line 21 that was passed over.

Mr. WOOD. I did not so understand the gentleman. There was no opportunity offered, Mr. Chairman, of presenting an amendment to the first section. Some amendment will have to be offered there, I think, because the bill as it is now before the committee provides—

For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, army nurses, survivors and widows of the war of 1812 and with Mexico, and the survivors and widows of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive, $140,000,000.

There is not a syllable in it that provides for the pensioners of the late war—the war of the rebellion. I care not what the committee meant by this language, as it is it does not apply to those pensioners.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me say, in reply to the gentleman, that this bill is in the identical language of all pension bills that have passed since 1862.

Mr. WOOD. I am aware of that fact, but there have been some very strict constructions of appropriation bills made in the past year. I submit to the members of the committee and to the Chair that the bill as it is absolutely makes no provision for the payment of pensions growing out of the late war—the war of the rebellion. If the gentleman will look at it he will see the point I am making.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I desire to reserve my point of order, and wait until this debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes another point of order. I desire to make the point of order that it changes existing law, and will wait until this point of order has been determined.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the point of order that this amendment, if admitted, even if it is conceded that the paragraph is now amendable, is in violation of Rule XXI. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist upon the point of order that the committee can not go back to the paragraph?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not make that point of order. Clearly he can not afford to suggest——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, there is so much noise that I can not hear what gentlemen are saying.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What possible objection can the gentleman from Pennsylvania have to the introduction of these words in this bill, which alone in my judgment make the appropriation applicable to the pensioners of the civil war?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then, Mr. Chairman, there is another thing——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania this. I do not care what former bills have had, following the words "for Army and Navy pensions," following the colon—

For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, army nurses, survivors, and widows of the war of 1812 and with Mexico——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The gentleman overlooks the first section of the bill, which provides for the payment of pensions authorized by law. Such pensions as the law authorizes—should not that include pensions growing out of the late war?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman on my right clearly understood that he might go back and ask you a question in reference to this paragraph, and I think it would be right to let him go back. That was the understanding here on the right.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I did not so understand, but if the gentleman understood that he had the right to offer an amendment I will withdraw the point. I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his objection to going back, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. WOOD was again reported.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I shall object to that, as changing existing law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It seems to me that the gentleman offering this amendment has misunderstood the meaning of the first two paragraphs of the bill. The language is:

For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, army nurses, survivors and widows of the war of 1812, etc.

Each class is designated. The bill does not mention specifically the survivors of the late war of the rebellion, but they are clearly intended, and the law could not be understood otherwise. This language has been used in every act since the first pension act was passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Analyzing that language now, with nothnig there but a comma to indicate the meaning, how can the gentleman say that it is not limited to the war of 1812 by a strict construction, which the distinguished Comptroller of the Treasury would be only too glad to make?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The present administration of the Department of the Interior has already construed the same language in previous pension bills.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this is not substantially the same as an amendment that has been stricken out?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. No; it is not the same.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How have pensions been paid to soldiers of the late war heretofore—under what laws?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Under acts having the same language that is contained in this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then, what is the necessity for this amendment?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not think there is any necessity whatever for it; but at the same time the amendment is properly before the committee. It is the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] that has raised the point of order upon it, not I. I simply want to relieve the minds of members of the impression that it is necessary to have any more specific mention of the pensioners of the late war.

Mr. CANNON. Let us have the amendment read again, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment was again read, as above.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that that amendment violates Rule XXI by changing existing law. It allows no decrease in pension rates. It makes the rates permanent, and that is not the law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, on the point of order I wish to say that it is unjust to the pensioners to pass such an amendment as this, as no increase of pension can be allowed under it; and if our friends on the other side want to have increased pensions allowed, they had better vote down this amendment.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks on the point of order. We are now considering an appropriation bill which will cause the expenditure of over $141,000,000. We have a right in this bill to prescribe the purposes for which the money is to be paid. In the first place, the language of the bill so far, to say the least, is subject to the construction that the appropriation does not apply to pensioners who have been placed on the rolls from causes arising out of the late civil war. The amendment which I have offered proposes that the money that we are appropriating shall be paid quarterly to all pensioners now borne on the rolls or who may hereafter be placed thereon. It also provides that it shall be paid to them at such rates as they are now allowed by law, or at such increased rates as may hereafter be allowed by law.

What objection is there to it? If we have the right to appropriate the money, have we not the right to say where that money shall go? Does this amendment interfere with any existing law? Does it even prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from engaging in the work of cutting off pensioners? The fact that a man may not be on the pension rolls to-day does not prevent the Congress of the United States from appropriating money for him. This amendment does not change existing law. It does not add to expenditures under this bill. It makes not a penny of difference in the amount of appropriation made by the bill. And, in conclusion, let me say it is absolutely necessary that this amendment, or some amendment of this kind, shall be adopted to determine with certainty where the money which we are appropriating shall go, for I do insist that upon a construction no more strict than those which have been made in the past year by disbursing officers of this Government not one dollar of the $141,000,000 appropriated by this bill need be paid to a man or the widow of a man who earned his pension by service in the war of the rebellion.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the language of the act of 1894:

> For Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, army nurses, survivors and widows of the war of 1812 and with Mexico, and the survivors and widows of the Indian wars of 1832 to 1842, inclusive.

Then comes the amount appropriated. That is the exact language of the present bill.

Mr. CANNON. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa a question. The language of this bill being in punctuation and everything else precisely that which has been employed for many years and which has received the construction of the accounting officers, does not the gentleman think, from his observation as a lawyer and as a legislator, that under such circumstances it might be dangerous, or at least inexpedient, in view of possible danger, to adopt a change of language which might result in a difference of construction?

Mr. LACEY. That is a very long question, but I will answer it in this way: If this language did not cover the soldiers of the late war I think there is somebody in the present Administration that would have been able to find it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. May I ask the gentleman from Iowa a question? I hold in my hand the pending appropriation bill. It does refer specifically to the war of 1812; it does refer specifically to the Indian wars; but there is not one line of reference in the whole bill to the war of the rebellion.

Mr. LACEY. Well, it will be construed that from the words "invalid" down to the comma preceding the words "survivors and widows of the war of 1812" the language applies generally. I do not think that this is the best language in the world, but it is the exact language which has been used in these bills for some years past.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Are we afraid to mention the late war of the rebellion?

Mr. LACEY. I think not. I think I have heard some gentlemen mention it boldly and defiantly on this floor during the last day or two. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD. Are there not invalid pensioners of the war with Mexico now borne on the roll?

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; and they are covered by this bill in terms.

Mr. WOOD. Is not the enumeration of certain classes generally held to be the exclusion of other classes?

Mr. LACEY. There are invalid pensions payable now to soldiers of the Mexican war. Some such soldiers have been drawing pensions during forty years past for wounds received in that war.

Mr. WOOD. Do we not by enumerating certain classes of persons to whom this appropriation shall be distributed exclude other classes? Is not that a well-settled rule of law?

Mr. LACEY. I do not think that rule will be applied in the construction of the language of this bill. I think these words have been found ample heretofore.

Mr. WOOD. It will not do any harm, will it, to complete the enumeration?

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I have procured a copy of the last pension appropriation act for the purpose of reading from it, but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has already read the language of the act of the preceding year. The language in both acts, namely, that of 1894 and that of 1895, is identical with that used in this bill; and more than this, it is the same language always heretofore used in this bill.

Mr. LACEY. Might we not cast a doubt on the provisions of the acts of 1894 and 1895 by the insertion of additional words?

Mr. GROUT. Precisely so. The suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] as to the danger of adopting new language when the language heretofore used has received a settled construction at the Department should have great weight. Not only is this bill in the language of former laws, under which the present Administration has readily paid out the money heretofore appropriated, although we have been told, and perhaps not with exaggeration, that this Administration is not friendly to the soldier—not only this, but the language of this bill is that of the estimates from the Department. I hold those estimates in my hand; I need not take the time of the House to read from them, but the language is identical.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then we had better let well enough alone.

Mr. GROUT. As the gentleman from Georgia suggests, it seems to me we had better not undertake to reconstruct or reform this bill in any particular. It is understood by everyone as appropriating pensions to the invalids and widows of all wars in the language used heretofore, although it seems perhaps somewhat inadequate to the casual observer——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Why not, then, use adequate language?

Mr. GROUT. But this is held to be adequate language.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Held by whom?

Mr. GROUT. If the gentleman will wait until I complete my sentence he will understand. I was saying that it seemed somewhat inadequate to the casual observer, but has been held to be adequate by the Department and by the two Houses of Congress over and over again. This being the case, what occasion is there to change it? I think we had better let it alone.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Who has ever raised a question?

Mr. GROUT. I hope that the gentleman will not insist on the proposed change. I was not present when it was presented and am not able to say whether it is subject to the point of order. But if it is insisted upon and not ruled out I hope it will be voted down. It is entirely unnecessary and might get us into trouble. Leave it where it is; where everybody understands it as being correct and sufficient; where there has, in fact, no question ever been raised in reference to it at the Department or elsewhere till now.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry: What is the status of the pending question? Has the Chair ruled on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is pending and has not yet been decided.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. It seems to me that we had better have a ruling and proceed with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] who makes the point of order to point out the change made by the amendment in the existing law.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that this money shall be paid quarterly to all pensioners now borne upon the roll. That is, now, at the present time. I claim if that provision be enacted into law that no man can be dropped from the pension rolls or suspended for any cause, no matter how just, hereafter, and that the list must remain inviolate throughout the whole period of this fiscal year.

It not only affects those who are now on the pension roll, but it will affect all those who may be placed thereon hereafter at the rate now fixed by law. That would fix all of those now on the rolls permanently there, no matter how wrongfully their names were put upon the rolls. It provides that their payment shall continue, and does not under any circumstances allow a change to be made. The only change that would be possible under this amendment would be an increase of pension. So it would seem that this is a change in the existing law in several important particulars, and for that reason I make the point of order upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois who offers the amendment desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing in the amendment to prevent the Commissioner of Pensions from proceeding to pass upon any claim on the report of his examiners, or his deputies, or his postmasters, and proceed to drop a pensioner from the rolls wherever just cause is shown. There is nothing to prevent him from cutting anybody off under the amendment. It is not a permanent provision of law, as the gentleman from New York has maintained, for the reason that this appropriation only lasts until the 30th day of June, 1897. Therefore, it can not be claimed in any sense to be a permanent provision.

Does the gentleman from New York or anyone else pretend that this Congress has not the right to make an appropriation for a man now upon the pension rolls at his present allowance and to continue it up to a certain date? Is that changing existing law? If so, do not all appropriation bills change existing law? Can it be contended for a moment that this Congress is disbursing $141,000,000 of the public money and is absolutely shorn of its power from providing that the pensioner who may be dropped from the rolls shall be paid to the end of the quarter when he gets his notice?

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. WOOD. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Does the amendment of my colleague do that?

Mr. WOOD. It is a good amendment, I will say to my colleague from Illinois. [Laughter.]

The effect of the amendment, Mr. Chairman, is to clear up and make plain some language which has been criticised by those who think the bill is well enough already. It is said that there has been a construction of a statute of a similar character. Has the point ever been raised before? There has been money paid out for sugar bounties, for instance—paid out right along for years, and yet under a precisely similar statute there came along an officer and decided that he was greater than the Congress of the United States, and that payment was held up. So when we provide that this money shall be paid to the pensioners at the rate they are now given by law, or such increased rates as may hereafter be allowed them, we are providing where the money shall go. If, when the bill is passed, or at the proper time, there is any trouble about the title of it, we can amend that without debate, as I understand, under the rules of the House.

Now, why is not this proper in this bill? It is germane and is entirely pertinent to the bill itself. Will the chairman of this committee pretend that we might not appropriate money in this bill, for instance, to a pensioner who had been dropped under the thirty days' notice of the law of a year or so ago? If it specified the old rate the effect of it would be to continue the pension for thirty days. If for thirty days, why not for a quarter?

Can we not then say in this appropriation that if a pensioner is cut off his pension shall be continued up to the time of the expiration of this appropriation? I believe that the amendment is right, that it is not subject to any point of order, that it will do no harm to this bill. It will do good, and be a measure of safety, and make every man and every widow and every child on that pension roll feel easier. They will sleep better at night. This is distributing the bounty of the Government, and merely designating where that bounty shall go; and if that is not the principal office of an appropriation bill, pure and simple, I have yet to learn what it is.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to have a ruling on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that under the statement of the effect of this amendment, made by the gentleman who proposes it, that it is clearly subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains it.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to make an announcement to the committee, that if we can get through with this bill to-night, I intend to move that when the House adjourn it adjourn until Monday. I should like to dispose of this bill to-night. I do not like to have it go over until next week.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion can not be made in committee. Does the gentleman desire to make that motion, or simply to give notice?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I simply desire to give notice that unless we can get through with these amendments reasonably soon, I shall have to move that the committee rise, and then get some order to limit debate.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "under the act of June 27, 1890," in lines 11 and 12, and also inserting after the word "defect," in line 13, the words "omission to allege the true disability."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. On what page is that?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Page 2.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object. I raise the point of order that we have passed that provision of the bill.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement that was made, it is still under consideration.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Before the gentleman proceeds, let the amendment be reported again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that this is in contravention of the provisions of clause 2 of Rule XXI, being a change of existing law.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I make the point that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Then the amendment comes too late.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The making of any point of order has been waived on this paragraph, and therefore any amendment to perfect the paragraph is clearly in order.

Mr. PICKLER. That is certainly right, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. The offering of this amendment would be a monstrous violation of good faith.

Mr. PICKLER. It is altogether otherwise. The gentleman did not reserve any point of order against this paragraph, and it certainly is subject to amendment. Although this amendment might be out of order in the first instance, yet after this paragraph is before the committee for debate, then it is certainly amendable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it would be subject to amendment only so far as necessary to perfect the propositions contained in the bill.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I concede that. Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed briefly to explain the object of this amendment, I think even my mercurial friend from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] will waive his objection. If I may have his kind attention, I will be very much obliged.

Mr. Chairman, the evident object of this paragraph is to allow pensions to be granted upon the true disability which exists at the time of making the application. With the general purpose of this paragraph, I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] has no quarrel, and, in fact, has expressed his approval of the general provision. Now, my amendment makes two additions to this paragraph. The first addition is by way of subtraction. It eliminates the limitation of the act of June 27, 1890, and makes the same provision applicable to all applications for pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to suggest to the gentleman from Nebraska that such an amendment, referring to another act, would practically change the whole subject. The Chair desires to ask whether this is not introducing another subject?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; I think not. I think the general provision of the paragraph was to allow pensions to be granted on the actual disability existing at the time of making the application. Now, it seems to me that the reference to the act of 1890 was merely an incident, and does not go to the heart of the proposition. Since that is the purpose of the paragraph, I have also thought best to include, after the word "defect," the words "omission to allege the true disability," because the words used in this paragraph go simply to a defective allegation of disability, or to an irregularity relating simply to form; for instance, failure to verify as provided by law, and do not include what was the evident purpose and intention of the paragraph, to grant the pension on the actual disability existing at the time of the application.

Now, it seems with this explanation the gentleman will certainly withdraw his objection, although I believe it to be not well taken.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the qualification or adjective applied to me as "mercurial" by the gentleman——

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I withdraw the adjective if it is offensive to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York (continuing). I shall endeavor to give his proposition due consideration. I always assume in any agreement made between gentlemen of this House that a man is pretty safe, and I am therefore surprised that when I had stated to a number of gentlemen who are anxious to get this amendment through with this appropriation bill, that I would not raise the point of order against this first amendment or rider as it stood, provided no effort should be made to amend it thereafter, and an agreement was virtually entered into, that a gentleman on the same committee should have proposed to take advantage of my silence and introduce another amendment.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman does not mean to state that he had an agreement with me that no amendment should be made to that paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I say that there was a tacit understanding that there should be none.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman certainly has no foundation for any such statement.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. It may not have been with you; but it is my impression that I so stated to you. Still, if you disclaim it, I accept your statement.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. You have absolutely no foundation for any such intimation, and it is entirely uncalled for.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. That may be your view.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is the absolute fact.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I will not discuss that with the gentleman. I do, however, press my point of order, Mr. Chairman. I claim that the effort now to amend this amendment by striking out the words "the act of June 27, 1890," makes a radical change. In other words, it would make this amendment of existing law or change of an existing law apply not only to the dependent pension act, so called, of June 27, 1890, but to all other pension laws, to the general pension law, the law which was passed in 1862, and which we ingrafted in the Revised Statutes. I claim also that the insertion of these other words—what are the words?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. "Omission to allege the true disability."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, as the amendment now stands the applicant can date back to the time of the original filing. In what case? In case of any defect or informality—that is, any slight error—any informality can be corrected just as a court may order one to be corrected; but here we have a change—"omission to allege the true disability." That is a very different matter. That opens the door wide, or would open the door wide, to fraud. A man could come in and by fabrication of testimony make out that he suffered under one disability when in point of fact the disability did not even exist. So I press my point of order.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me their attention a moment I will explain why the committee limited it to the law of 1890. You will find by examination that a statement made by Commissioner Lochren before the subcommittee having this bill in charge shows this fact, that under the old law if an applicant has a case rejected an application can be made to reopen it, and then the pension is made to date from the original application or from the time that the disability is shown to exist. Under the law of 1890, by a peculiar construction of the law, the Commissioner holds that when an application is rejected that cuts off all claim, and if another application is made he can only make payment from the date of filing the last claim. You will find that in the statement of the Commissioner before the subcommittee, so that the same rule is not applied to claims under the old law as under the law of 1890.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, as the time is growing very late and we wish to have a vote on this bill, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees and expenses of examining surgeons for services rendered within the fiscal year 1897, $750,000.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the Chair as to the matter pending before the committee. Is it not the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been withdrawn, so that the point of order drops.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a motion that all debate——

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my colleague on the committee, as he evidently wants to finish the bill to-night, as the main parts of the bill have been passed, and as he has asked the House to sit until the bill is finished, that he might as well let the reading proceed and the bill be read through.

The paragraph was again read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph we are about passing.

The CHAIRMAN. To the paragraph which is now being read?

Mr. CONNOLLY. No, sir; to the one which we have just been considering.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. If that is to be done, Mr. Chairman, I think I shall have to move——

Mr. CONNOLLY. I do not think that this will take much time.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. We have already passed that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] was endeavoring to obtain the floor to offer this amendment, so the Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

The amendment of Mr. CONNOLLY was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out of lines 13 and 14, page 2, the words "because of any defect or informality in the application."

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, if there be good reasons——

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point comes rather late, as the gentleman from Illinois has begun his argument, but it will be considered as reserved by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, it will be observed, leaves the clause applying to the act of 1890 just as the committee have reported it to the House. The committee in their bill report a provision that whenever a claim for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, has been, or shall hereafter be, rejected, suspended, or dismissed because of any defect or informality in the application, and a new application shall have been, or shall hereafter be, filed, and a pension has been, or shall hereafter be, allowed in such claim, such pension shall date from the time of filing the first application, provided, etc.

That I understand to be the rule adopted by the Pension Bureau under all the pension acts except that of 1890. My amendment would have the effect of applying to the act of 1890, and to pensions allowed under that act the same rule of construction that is applied to all the other pension acts. The committee have limited that construction to cases where the pension has not been allowed because of defect or informality in the application; but why stop there? There may be reasons, arising, if you please, from the ignorance of the applicant, or from other causes——

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, there is a difference between rejecting a claim and disallowing or dismissing a claim. The Pension Office sometimes rejects a claim for imperfection in the application on the ground that the application is not a proper one, but if a proper application is made and the office disallows the claim, the applicant can put in other evidence, and then the pension, if allowed, dates back to the original filing of the claim. In the other case, where the application is defective under the law and where the office holds that it is not a proper application, the applicant has to go back and file another application, and in that case the pension does not date back. In all other cases it does. That is why the committee used the words "because of any defect or informality in the application."

Mr. CONNOLLY. But I understand that there may be cases where a pension claim is disallowed or rejected because of the absolute failure of proof that the applicant is entitled to a pension.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes; but in that case the Commissioner rules that the applicant may put in evidence to reinstate his claim, and if he succeeds the pension goes back to the date of the original application.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Under the other pension acts.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Under the act of 1890 also.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I think not.

Mr. NORTHWAY. An examination of the statement of the Commissioner before the committee will show that I am correct.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Well, Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that it would be safer for the House to say now that in case of an application for pension under the act of 1890 made while this appropriation bill is in force no claim shall be rejected or disallowed on the ground——

Mr. NORTHWAY. I wish to say to the gentleman that I do not see any objection to the language of his amendment, because if it does not apply to anything more than what he states it can not do any harm.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois what would be the practical advantage to the pensioners of adopting his amendment?

Mr. CONNOLLY. It would be this: If an application is dismissed or rejected because of the absolute failure of proof to show that the claimant is entitled to a pension, under the bill as we have it here if the claimant makes another application he will be entitled only to receive a pension from the date of the second application.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It distinctly states the contrary.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it does not, if I can read it. It provides that if a pension is allowed on the second application, and the evidence in the case shall show the disability to have existed at the time of the filing of the first application, then the pension shall be allowed to date back to the time of the first application. But that can only be done in a case where the application has been rejected on account of informality. I want the provision to apply to a rejection for any cause. Such a provision can do no harm. Let me state a case. An applicant for pension may have his application on file under the act of 1890——

Mr. NORTHWAY. What is the language of the amendment which the gentleman proposes?

Mr. CONNOLLY. I do not propose to insert any language, but to strike out in lines 13 and 14 the words "because of any defect or informality in the application." The clause will then provide that if an application for pension has been rejected under this law and it turns out on the hearing of a new application that the cause for granting the pension existed when the first application was made the pension shall in that case be allowed to date back to the time of the first application.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I can see no harm in that amendment.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Nor can I; on the contrary, it may in some cases do much good.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I maintain that the amendment under the admission of the gentleman who offers it changes the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the change proposed to be made by this amendment is in the amendment already admitted and now pending subject to perfection; and any modification of language which is within the subject, which does not go outside to other subjects, must inevitably be in order, because it is the right of the Committee of the Whole to perfect an admitted amendment within the subject which it embraces. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY].

Mr. PICKLER. I move pro forma to strike out the last word, for the purpose of making a statement. A good many gentlemen have inquired whether there would be a session this evening. Until the last five minutes it was the intention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions that a session should be held, but in view of the request of the gentleman in charge of the pending bill and upon the representation that members have been hard at work during the present week, and that there are only a few pension bills pending on the Calendar, I am disposed, if it meets the wish of the House, to let the session of to-night go over in order that when this afternoon session closes we may adjourn until Monday.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. We want to finish this bill this evening.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CONNOLLY, it was agreed to.

Mr. AVERY. I move to amend by striking out the word "the" before the word "disability," in line 18, page 2, and inserting the words "a pensionable"; so as to read, "shall show a pensionable disability to have existed."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I raise the point of order that this is a change of existing law and is in violation of Rule XXI.

Mr. AVERY. Oh, no; it does not change the law.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think the Committee on Appropriations are willing to accept the amendment, if they can.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the point of order pressed?

Mr. AVERY. This amendment does not change the existing law, and I think the gentleman from New York, upon reading it, will recognize the propriety of the proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I press my point of order, because I find that this would be a material change in the existing law. The section as it now stands provides substantially that if at the time of the second application it is found that the disability then complained of existed at the time of the original filing the pension, if granted, shall date back to the time of the filing of the original application. Now, suppose that at the time the second application is filed the disability complained of is of a very serious nature, such as to entitle the applicant to a very large pension, but that so serious a disability did not exist at the time of the first application. Under this amendment the pension which might be allowed in view of this severe grade of disability would date back to the time of the filing of the original application, provided that at the time of such application the slightest pensionable degree of disability existed. That would certainly be a change in the law, besides being manifestly unfair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order, and will submit the amendment to the committee.

Mr. AVERY. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] has stated the willingness of the Committee on Appropriations to accept the amendment, I hope there will be no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that all further debate on the pending paragraph be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the words "to the contrary notwithstanding," in lines 20 and 21, of page 2, the following:

"Provided further, That whenever the medical testimony and examination shows that the claimant is not able to earn his support by manual labor the claimant shall be granted a pension, notwithstanding the disability or disabilities shown to exist by said medical testimony and examination are other or different from those set forth in claimant's declaration."

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I raise the point of order that this is a change of existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The next paragraph of the bill was read.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that all debate on this paragraph be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to say, in justice to the large number of members of this House who have spoken favorably to the amendment which I offered, to give the pensioner a vested right after the pension was adjudicated, that, in view of the ruling of the Chairman of the committee to-day, which I consider entirely right and proper, I propose to present the same measure to the Committee on Invalid Pensions at the proper time and endeavor to secure action by that committee. I do this with the more confidence from the fact that I have been assured by the chairman of that committee, the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], while there may be some differences of opinion as to the remedy, that the Republican membership of that committee unanimously, so far as he knows, recognize the right of a soldier to have his pension secured to him by law as a vested right after adjudication, and that a bill will be reported from that committee at an early date which will remedy the evil to which the amendment calls attention.

I believe that the debate brought up by the introduction of that amendment has had its good uses in the House. I am proud of the fact, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment has succeeded in unanimously crystallizing the sentiment on this side of the House in favor of a pensioner having a vested right on adjudication of a pension in his favor.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that a proposition would not also find favor that would place those upon the pension roll who have been thrown out without just cause?

Mr. GRAFF. I am in favor of that also.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I hope that that will be done.

Mr. GRAFF. I am glad that I can place the blame for the prevention of the adoption of that amendment upon a gentleman on the other side of the House rather than upon this.

The amendment which I proposed to offer, had it not been announced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] that he would object to its consideration under Rule XXI, section 2, of this House, with some slight modifications is the same as I announced in this House on January 13.

In its form as I would desire it now it is as follows:

Add to the conclusion of the present bill the following:

"Provided further, That during the fiscal year of 1897 in expending all the foregoing appropriations no pension shall be reduced, suspended, or dropped except for fraud upon the part of the pensioner in obtaining the pension, which fraud must be established by the verdict of a jury of the United States circuit or district court of the circuit or district in which the pensioner resides, either by indictment or issue framed in the civil branch of the court, on the relation of the Attorney-General of the United States, of which the pensioner shall have due and reasonable notice, and appear and plead as in other cases: Provided, however, That the foregoing provision shall not apply where, since the granting of the pension, the title to said pension has ceased to exist under provisions of law. A certified copy of the indictment or issue and the proceedings, verdict, and judgment had thereon shall in all such cases be forwarded by the court to the Commissioner of Pensions free of cost to the pensioner."

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I understand that this bill has now been completed, and I move that the committee rise and report the bill with favorable recommendation as amended.

Mr. DANIELS. I desire to present an amendment first, if the gentleman will allow me an opportunity.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I think it due to Judge DANIELS that I should withdraw the motion for a few moments, in order to permit him to offer an amendment. I feel under obligation to do so.

Mr. DANIELS. I offer this amendment.

At the end of line 15, page 4, add the following:

"The Commissioner of Pensions is also hereby authorized and empowered, at a rent not exceeding $3,000 per annum, to lease or hire for the use of the pension agency in the city of Buffalo suitable rooms in a new fireproof building in the said city of Buffalo; and a sum not exceeding $3,000 is appropriated to pay said rent."

Mr. MILES. I raise the point of order upon the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend from New York permit a suggestion?

Mr. DANIELS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. If you want $3,000 at Buffalo, as there is an item for rent of $23,000 in the bill, why not move to strike out "three thousand" and insert "six thousand?"

Mr. DANIELS. I thought it would be more satisfactory to the members of the committee and to the House to present it in this shape, where the explanation would appear on the face of the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I hope the gentleman from New York will not consume more than his five minutes.

Mr. DANIELS. I shall not do so.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there is an absolute necessity for this additional appropriation in the city of Buffalo.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the point of order has been made upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland will please state his point of order.

Mr. MILES. The point of order I make is that this amendment changes existing law, and also that it provides for an expenditure not authorized by law.

Mr. DANIELS. The Chair will observe that this is simply to increase the appropriation mentioned in the fifteenth line of the bill in section 4.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the amendment apply to that line?

A MEMBER. That is the effect of the amendment, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. But the point of order has been made against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let us have a ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

Before that motion is submitted, I wish to ask unanimous consent that all members who have not spoken upon this question may have permission to print their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I object. I think we have had enough of this.

The motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DINGLEY reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the pension appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments. Unless objection is made, the vote will be taken on the amendments together. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF A REPORT.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to withdraw a report, No. 53, accompanying House bill No. 147, and to substitute another report.

The SPEAKER. Is it by direction of the committee?

Mr. POOLE. I have the consent of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to withdraw a report and to substitute another?

There was no objection.

IMPROVEMENTS IN HOUSE RESTAURANT.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, with a resolution, for the present consideration of which I ask unanimous consent.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be appropriated from the contingent fund of the House for the purpose of enlarging and improving the House restaurant and the kitchen attached thereto, the said sum to be expended under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman if that is the report of a subcommittee?

Mr. HICKS. It is the report of the entire committee.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, in what form does that resolution come up?

The SPEAKER. As a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HICKS. It is reported by the entire committee.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman in what position will that leave the present keeper of the House restaurant with reference to betterments and improvements?

Mr. HICKS. It will not change his condition at all. He and Mr. Lewis, the new keeper, are arranging that to the entire satisfaction of both.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. He will be deprived of no existing rights?

Mr. HICKS. None whatever.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that that committee has no right to report this as a privileged matter, and I want to suggest that there is no money in the contingent fund with which to pay that amount.

Mr. HICKS. The Committee on Accounts have agreed to the matter, and also the Committee on Appropriations. It is necessary that some improvements should be made.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman is mistaken about the consent of the Committee on Appropriations. We have that matter under consideration, and there is no money in the contingent fund with which to pay this.

Mr. HICKS. I am informed that there is a fund, and I trust the gentleman will not interpose any objection to this needed improvement. We will find the fund.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to ask if it is designed also to improve the cooking?

Mr. HICKS. This is intended for the benefit of all of you.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest that there ought to be some means devised by which a member can get a good meal without paying three or four days' salary for it.

Mr. HICKS. If you will permit the improvements to be made you will all be benefited.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. I should like to ask the gentleman why the new keeper of the restaurant should not pay these expenses himself. Why should we be obliged to appropriate the public money for such a purpose?

Mr. HICKS. It is a permanent improvement, and belongs to the House. Similar improvements on the Senate side cost $15,000.

Mr. BARTLETT of New York. In the absence of the other members of the Committee on Appropriations I shall object.

Subsequently,

Mr. BARTLETT of New York withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York withdraws his objection. Is there further objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HICKS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next. If that motion shall prevail it will do away with the meeting to-night, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. That motion alone will not accomplish that object. Under the rules the evening session would take place, and after that the House would adjourn until Monday.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand that if this motion prevails, and then if the House adjourns before 5 o'clock, that does accomplish an adjournment until Monday and does away with the evening session.

The SPEAKER. That would do it; yes.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PICKLER. Pending that, I desire to say it was the intention of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to have a session this evening, but a large number of members have said that they are very weary, having been here so long, and that there is a desire to adjourn over until Monday. Further, we have only a few private pension bills on the Calendar, and therefore we have concluded to ask a vacation of the order for an evening session to-night.

The motion of Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE was agreed to.

EXTENDING TIME FOR MAKING ASSESSMENT OF REAL ESTATE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled the joint resolution (H. Res. 25) to extend the time for making an assessment of real estate in the District of Columbia; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, in moving to adjourn, I simply wish to state that which no doubt many members know, that the pension bill just passed is fifty days ahead of the passage of any pension appropriation bill in the last three Congresses. [Applause.] I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for armament of fortifications, rapid-fire guns, etc.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for repairs to the War Department branch of the Government Printing Office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a letter from the Attorney-General submitting an estimate of deficiency for the pay of regular assistant attorneys for the current fiscal year—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the president of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, transmitting the annual report of the said company for the year ended December 31, 1895—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of a deficiency in the appropriation for expenses of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred House bill No. 54, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota, accompanied by a report (No. 71) in writing thereon; which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 70) in writing thereon; which said bill, amendment, and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 189) to repeal an act entitled "An act to exclude the public lands in Alabama from the operation of the laws relating to mineral lands," approved March 3, 1883, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 73) in writing thereon; which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1244) to confirm certain cash entries of offered lands, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 75) in writing thereon; which said bill, amendment, and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 128) for the relief of Henry H. Schrawder. (Report No. 67.)

By Mr. PARKER, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 2048) for the relief of Rufus Betz. (Report No. 68.)

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 356) extending provisions of an act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors, approved June 27, 1890, to the Eighteenth and Nineteenth regiments of Kansas Cavalry Volunteers. (Report No. 72.)

ADVERSE REPORT

Under clause 2, Rule XIII, the following adverse report was delivered to the Clerk and laid on the table:

By Mr. BISHOP, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 2047) for the relief of Charles Fletcher, alias James H. Mitchell. (Report No. 69.)

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 628) to provide an American register for the steamer Miami, which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

WESTERN CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in response to a resolution of March 2, 1895, directing the Secretary of the Interior to withhold any further distribution and payment out of the money derived from 35 per cent of the judgment in favor of the Old Settler or Western Cherokee Indians against the United States in the sum of $800,386.31, set apart for the payment of expenses and for legal services justly and equitably payable on account of the prosecution of this claim, until otherwise authorized by law, except allowances already made for legal services, transmitting certain information as to any and all payments and distributions from this fund already made, together with copies of all payments in any manner connected with said payments and distributions filed in the Interior Department and the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DEDUCTIONS FROM SALARIES OF CLERKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 20, 1895, information as to whether there is a practice in the Post-Office Department, or any branch or line of its service, of deducting from a clerk's salary, at the end of a month, pay for such offenses as missending a registered package, carrying mail past its destination, or failing to sign a register at terminal points, and also the extent to which this practice has been carried on and the aggregate sum of money in the Post-Office Department arising from this practice; which was read.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask, in addition to the printing of the communication which has just been read, that it may lie on the table for a few days, when I shall call it up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication will lie on the table and be printed.

ANACOSTIA AND POTOMAC RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the president of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company, transmitting the annual report of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company for the year ended December 31, 1895; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona;

A bill (H. R. 3537) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 88) authorizing the distribution of copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in Congressional districts where distribution has not been made.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, upon the Hon. Marcus C. Lisle, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky, and upon the Hon. George W. Houk, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 30) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893;

A bill (S. 43) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certian lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 25) to extend the time for making an assessment of real estate in the District of Columbia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Produce Exchange of Toledo, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cancel every note once redeemed in gold by the Treasury and to issue long-term bonds in sums of $50 and less at a rate of interest not to exceed 3 per cent, to be offered to the people of this country and no other; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to permanently retire and cancel all United States notes, called greenbacks, and Treasury notes, called Sherman notes, in order to prevent disaster to business and preserve the honor of our country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of members of the Kentucky Equal Rights Association, praying Congress to protect women equally with black men against State denial of the right of suffrage; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of Clay B. Bording and sundry other citizens of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the passage of the so-called William A. Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I present resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of New Orleans, Limited, asking favorable consideration of what is known as the Squire bill, making appropriations for the protection of the United States coasts everywhere from foreign attack. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I also present a memorial concerning the importance, condition, and needs of the harbor of New Orleans, with a petition praying that an adequate appropriation be made for the improvement of that harbor.

The memorial shows that the exports from the port of New Orleans in 1891 were $81,529,453. The imports in the same year were $18,087,944, or nearly 66 per cent of the entire imports of all the Gulf ports. It further shows that New Orleans is the second port in the United States in regard to its exports, and in regard to imports it is the fourth; while, in regard to its total foreign commerce, it is only exceeded by New York, Boston, and Philadelphia.

The memorialists show that this harbor is of national and international importance. They ask that Congress appropriate for the improvement of the harbor at New Orleans the sum of $500,000, and they further urge that this be made part of a continuing appropriation of $2,000,000, extending over four years, similar to appropriations for other important works, as made by the Fifty-third Congress.

The memorial is signed by the mayor and city council of the city of New Orleans, by the president of the New Orleans Levee Board, by the presidents of the Cotton Exchange, Board of Trade, Sugar Exchange, Mechanics Dealers, and Lumbermen's Exchange, the Maritime Exchange, and the Chamber of Commerce; also, by the president of the Associated Banks in Clearing House, and by the president of the Board of Underwriters, and the president of the Association of Railroads.

I move that the memorial and petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I present resolutions of the Chicago Board of Trade, recommending the retirement of the greenback circulation. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I present resolutions of the Victoria Club of Chicago, in relation to the action in the Transvaal Republic. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM. I also present a petition of the National Live Stock Exchange of Chicago, in relation to the condition of the live-stock trade, praying that Congress, by the aid of the diplomatic representatives of our Government, who have larger experience and more intimate knowledge of the means necessary to be employed, enact such legislation as Congress in its wisdom may deem expedient in the interests of that trade with foreign countries.

In this connection I have a letter which states that when reciprocity was inaugurated, Germany, France, Sweden, Norway, Switzerland, and Belgium freely bought our cattle, sheep, hog products, and canned meat, and when it was repealed the trade was in a large degree cut off.

I call the especial attention of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to this petition and to the subject therein discussed. I move that it be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation abolishing compulsory pilotage on coasting and sailing vessels when the captain has a United States license, or a vessel in tow of a tug in charge of a man holding such license; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented sundry petitions of citizens of Kingwood, New Lexington, Middletown, Royalton, Voltair, Sunbury Gap, East Freedom, Pindleton, West Fairview, Berwick, Lewisberry, Penns Park, Wrightstown, Lingohocken, Churchville, and Bellsano, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called William A. Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bellaire, Ohio, praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions, adopted by the Toledo (Ohio) Produce Exchange, praying for the issuance of long-term bonds in sums of $50 and less at a rate of interest not to exceed 3 per cent, and for the cancellation of every note once redeemed in gold by the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Association of New Philadelphia and Canal Dover, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation in the interest of morality; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition of the Saginaw (Mich.) Lumber Dealers' Association, and a petition of the Board of Trade of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the improvement of the harbors of Ludington, Mich., and Manitowoc, Wis.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of Harry E. Price and sundry other citizens of Cumberland, the petition of J. D. Warfield and sundry other citizens of Damascus, and a petition of sundry citizens of Baltimore, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition, numerously signed by citizens of Aurora, Mo., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill.

I also present a petition, numerously signed, by the leading citizens of Maryville, Mo., praying for the passage of the same bill.

I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Immigration, and hope they will be there given full consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented petitions of sundry citizens of Missouri praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the United States Military Telegraph Corps, praying that they be granted compensation for efficient and important service rendered the Government during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, No. 35, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 735 to reorganize the personnel of the United States Navy, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HILL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Utica, N. Y., and a petition of members of sundry churches of Malone, N. Y., praying that the President and the Congress of the United States use their influence with the great powers of Europe in persuading them to arrest the awful persecutions now in progress in Turkey and Armenia; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of La Crosse, Wis., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., praying that an appropriation be made for improving the harbor facilities at St. Joseph and Benton Harbor in the State of Michigan; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Cincinnati (Ohio) Bicycle Club, praying for an increase in the appropriation for the office of road inquiry of the Department of Agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Association of Dayton, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation in the interest of morality; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Akron, Ohio, praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition of the board of supervisors of Napa County, Cal., and of the city council of Napa, Cal., praying for the control and construction by the Government of the Nicaragua Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CUBAN CONSTITUTION.

Mr. CALL. I present a translation of the constitution of the new republic of Cuba, and ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a miscellaneous document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1415) relating to the liability of employers in the District of Columbia to make compensation for personal injuries suffered by employees in their service, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1416) providing for the preferment of wages of employees in cases of assignment, execution, in payment by receivers, etc., asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1483) to repeal an act entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes therein specified," approved January 30, 1799, being section 5335 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] to this report.

Mr. GRAY. The Committee on the Judiciary, then, does not take cognizance of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. It is the bill introduced by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] in regard to correspondence of American citizens with foreign Governments.

Mr. GRAY. It is the opinion of the Judiciary Committee that the bill belongs rather to the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. HOAR. The Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator is himself a member.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be agreed to, in the absence of objection.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1560) to regulate the procedure in pension cases, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 991) for the relief of Frederick Carlisle, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1398) for the relief of Maj. Samuel T. Cushing, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 38) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1498) to punish the carnal and unlawful knowing of any female under the age of 18 years, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

This is a bill to raise the age of consent in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and all other places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. The committee were of opinion that in regard to the Territories the matter would be more properly dealt with by the several Territorial legislatures, and in regard to all places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States except the District of Columbia the likelihood of such offenses there is so small that it is not worth while to make any legislation in addition to what now exists. Therefore, the matter being reduced to the District of Columbia, the committee were of opinion that the Committee on the District of Columbia is the proper place for a consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOAR. I am also instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1582) to pay to the widow of the late Samuel F. Miller, a justice of the Supreme Court, a sum equal to the balance of his salary for the year in which he died, to report it without amendment.

I give notice that to-morrow, or at some early day, I shall call up this bill for action.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 677) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 100) for the relief of the estate of John R. Bigelow, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BRICE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (R. 1100) granting a pension to Russel N. Reynolds, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1017) granting a pension to Robert Kiracofe, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 680) for the relief of James Linskey from the operation of the act restricting the ownership of real estate in the Territories and the District of Columbia to American citizens, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

PITMAN PULSIFER'S CENSUS TABLE.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Printing I report a resolution, with the accompanying table, and ask immediate action.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That 1,000 copies of "Table showing the publications and cost of each census of the United States," prepared by Pitman Pulsifer, formerly clerk of Committee on the Census, United States Senate, be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the request in regard to the resolution?

Mr. HALE. I ask immediate consideration for it. I will state to the Senator——

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again, and then I will hear the explanation.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. HALE. This matter has been called to the attention of the Committee on Printing by the Commissioner of Labor, who has charge of the census. I have sent to the Printing Office and find it will cost only $17.50, and therefore the committee recommend its passage. It is a valuable table.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is to be printed as a separate document?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. DAVIS. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the joint resolution (S. R. 1) relative to the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine; the joint resolution (S. R. 12) to enforce the Monroe doctrine; the joint resolution (S. R. 49) to enforce the Monroe doctrine; the resolution of the board of supervisors of Sangamon County, Ill., in favor of the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine; resolutions adopted by Washington Council, No. 1, Junior Order United American Mechanics, Butte City, Mont., indorsing President Cleveland's message upon the Monroe doctrine; and a memorial of the Eighth Ward Republican Club of the city of Detroit, Mich., relative to the Monroe doctrine, to ask to be discharged from their further consideration, and to report a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution and memorials, if there be no objection. The concurrent resolution will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

Concurrent resolution relative to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That whereas President Monroe, in his message to Congress of December 2, A. D. 1823, deemed it proper to assert as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, were thenceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power; and

Whereas President Monroe further declared in that message that the United States would consider any attempt by the allied powers of Europe to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety; that with the existing colonies and dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and should not interfere, but that with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States; and further reiterated in that message that it is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; and

Whereas the doctrine and policy so proclaimed by President Monroe have since been repeatedly asserted by the United States by Executive declaration and action upon occasions and exigencies similar to the particular occasion and exigency which caused them to be first announced, and have been ever since their promulgation, and now are, the rightful policy of the United States: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the United States of America reaffirms and confirms the doctrine and principles promulgated by President Monroe in his message of December 2, A. D. 1823, and declares that it will assert and maintain that doctrine and those principles, and will regard any infringement thereof, and particularly any attempt by any European power to take or acquire any new or additional territory on the American continents, or any island adjacent thereto, or any right of sovereignty or dominion in the same in any case or instance as to which the United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety by or through force, purchase, cession, occupation, pledge, colonization, protectorate, or by control of the easement in any canal or any other means of transit across the American Isthmus, whether under unfounded pretension of right in cases of alleged boundary disputes or under any other unfounded pretensions, as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States and as an interposition which it would be impossible in any form for the United States to regard with indifference.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the concurrent resolution be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to give notice, having reference to the filing of the resolution, and having reference also to the resolution which was introduced by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], that I shall on Wednesday, at the close of the routine morning business, ask leave to address the Senate upon the Venezuelan question.

Mr. GRAY. I desire to say, in reference to the report from the Committee on Foreign Relations just made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], that that report was not from a unanimous committee.

SUITS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PLATT. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory; and as there is immediate necessity for the passage of the bill, I am instructed to ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps a single word of explanation may be necessary.

The United States court in the Indian Territory embraced the whole Territory prior to the passage of an act last March, and appeals and writs of error were taken from that court to the court of appeals of the eighth circuit. Last March we divided the Territory into three judicial districts, and provided for the appointment of three judges, whom we constituted an appellate court, from which cases should go from the separate courts, and from that appellate court we gave an appeal or writ of error to the court of appeals in the eighth circuit. However, we failed to provide that the cases already pending in that circuit should be proceeded with the same as if the act had not been passed. The object of this bill is to allow the courts to proceed with the cases then pending. Judge Caldwell has written a letter stating that this bill ought to be passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. PLATT. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF NAPHTHA LAUNCHES, ETC.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 291) to amend section 4426 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to vessels propelled by steam, gas, fluid, naphtha, or motor, to report a substitute therefor. I ask that the substitute may be treated as an original bill and placed on the Calendar, and that Senate bill 291 be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That bill will be indefinitely postponed, and the bill now reported will be read twice by title.

The bill (S. 1646) providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. For the information of Senators, all of whom have been receiving letters about the naphtha launches, I wish to state that the bill which has been reported as a substitute for the original bill provides that all naphtha launches of less than 15 tons burden shall not require inspection, or an engineer, or a licensed pilot, but that naphtha launches exceeding 15 tons burden, carrying passengers for hire or carrying freight for hire, shall be subject to inspection.

The bill further provides that none of these launches shall hereafter be utterly lawless; that they shall be subject to all the requirements as to the laws of the road, as to safety appliances to be kept on board, as to signals in fogs, as to signals when meeting and passing other steamers, that now apply to the steam craft of various kinds. Such a provision is an absolute necessity.

The president of the company manufacturing these gas engines, John J. Amory, who, no doubt, was largely instrumental in inspiring the letters that have been showered upon us within the last fortnight, called at the room of the Committee on Commerce Saturday and examined this bill, and declared that it was entirely satisfactory to him. He said that these launches should be subject to the laws of the road, etc.; that he knew of but one pleasure launch over 15 tons burden, and that those over 15 tons burden carrying freight and passengers for hire ought to be subject to inspection. So I presume that all the launch people will be entirely satisfied with the bill that has been reported.

Mr. VEST. Do I understand the chairman of the committee to state that this Mr. Amory made no objection to that provision of the bill which subjects launches of all sizes, even of 2 or 5 tons, to the rules of the road, as the Senator expressed it, in regard to signals and lights?

Mr. FRYE. He expressed himself as entirely satisfied with that provision. He said that, in his opinion, it ought to be required of them, and that, in his opinion, they all to-day comply with the rule, because he said the rules of the road and for the safety of passengers, etc., were posted in every naphtha launch that he has had anything to do with.

Mr. VEST. I am a member of the Commerce Committee, and I agreed to the reporting of this bill, with the reservation that that portion of it to which I have just alluded does not meet my approval. I think it is simply absurd to require a launch of 2 tons or 1 ton or less (for some of them are made even less than a ton burden) to have apparatus on board for lights, signals, pilotage, and all the rules that applied to that class of vessels which are not operated by naphtha.

I do not propose to go into a discussion of the bill, but it refers to very extensive provisions that are found in the general statutes in regard to signals, lights, etc. Before we enact it, these provisions should be scrutinized, because we might make it simply impossible for anybody to own for pleasure one of these very small launches if we apply all these regulations to it.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that after the chairman of the committee was authorized to report the bill he amended the last section. The chairman examined it with a great deal of care. There are some regulations contained in the laws on the statute book which ought not to apply and could not apply to the naphtha launches. The change which was made is as follows:

Relating to lights, fog signals, steering, and sailing rules, as the Board of Supervising Inspectors shall, by their regulations, deem applicable and practicable for their safe navigation.

Mr. VEST. That is a very great improvement. I am very glad the chairman has put that clause in.

Mr. FRYE. It was of very great importance, as I thought.

Mr. VEST. When I agreed to the reporting of the bill it did not contain that provision.

Mr. PASCO. I do not understand that the bill is now up for action.

Mr. FRYE. It is not.

Mr. PASCO. I hope the bill will be allowed to remain on the Calendar for some little time. A great many people in my State are interested in naphtha vessels, and I wish to submit it to some of them in order that if there are any other objections to the bill than those which have been removed, they may have an opportunity to communicate the objections to me and I may have an opportunity to present them to the Senate. I find that the bill has been shorn of its most serious objections, perhaps of all the objections that have been called to my attention, and I hope to be able to assist in its passage, unless I find there are other objections that may be presented to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 58) appropriating $5,000 to open Jupiter Inlet, Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Committee on Commerce to give immediate attention to this joint resolution. It carries an appropriation of $5,000 to open Jupiter Inlet, in the State of Florida. That inlet has become closed by recent storms, and all access to the lighthouse and to the interior is cut off by the dangerous shoals and reefs which have accumulated there.

ECKINGTON AND SOLDIERS' HOME RAILWAY.

Mr. GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 721) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PASCO. I ask to have an order made in reference to some papers presented by the former Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Butler. It is at his request that I ask for the order.

The order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the petition filed by and in behalf of the heirs of Jesse Fish, jr., regarding the title to Anastasia Island, Florida, and other papers filed by and in behalf of said heirs in said case be allowed to be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, it was Ordered, That the papers in the pension claim of John C. Secrest, under Senate bill 1485, Fifty-third Congress, second session, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from the files in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, there being no adverse report thereon.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, it was Ordered, That the petition of Mrs. E. L. Eblen and also the petition of Francis E. Yale and J. S. Blackford be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claims of Rufus Betz and of Charles Fletcher be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and transmitted to the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, there having been no adverse report in the Senate in either case.

PRESERVATION OF HERDS AND FLOCKS.

Mr. WARREN. I send a resolution to the desk, and ask that it be printed and lie over. It is my intention to call it up on Thursday next immediately after the morning business, and then to make some remarks upon it.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the late unprecedented shrinkage in numbers and values of farm animals throughout the United States, as shown by the last published reports of the Department of Agriculture, the attention of the Committee on Agriculture is hereby especially directed to this subject, with the request to consider and report to the Senate, or to invite the Finance Committee to consider and report, by bill or otherwise, what legislation, if any, is necessary to preserve our herds and flocks.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2769) to authorize the leasing of lands for educational purposes in Arizona was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 3537) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 88) authorizing the distribution of copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in Congressional districts where distribution has not been made was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

EULOGIES ON DECEASED REPRESENTATIVES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania; upon the Hon. Marcus C. Lisle, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky, and upon the Hon. George W. Houk, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, be printed as required by law.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], coming over from a previous day, which will be read:

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. PUGH January 15, 1896:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment, in coin or its equivalent, of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt"; and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to the nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution, and I hope we may be able to secure a vote upon it without debate.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] gave notice a few days ago that he desired to occupy the attention of the Senate for a while this morning, and he has been seeking the floor for that purpose. If it be agreeable to the Senator from Alabama to let his resolution lie over until the Senator from New Jersey can make his speech, I think it would be pleasant to that Senator.

Mr. SEWELL. I will say to the Senator from Alabama that it will probably not take me over fifteen minutes to make the remarks which I propose to submit.

Mr. PUGH. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution which has just been read was laid before the Senate as the business next in order in the morning hour. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask that the resolution heretofore submitted by me be now taken from the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution heretofore submitted by the Senator from New Jersey, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. SEWELL January 16, 1896:

Resolved, That the Monroe doctrine, as originally propounded, was directed to the special prevention of the threatened action of the allied powers in reference to the revolted colonies of Spain and the occupation, by way of colonization, of any supposed derelict territory on this hemisphere.

2. That the question of resisting any acquisition of territory by conquest was limited, as stated by Mr. Webster, to cases in which, by reason of proximity, such acquisition would be dangerous to our safety and the integrity of our institutions.

3. That the true ground upon which the Monroe announcement was based and upon which any similar position has been taken rests for its justification upon what may be our interests, and our interests only; and that neither by the Monroe doctrine, nor any other official declaration, have we ever come under any pledge to any power or State on this continent that binds us to act merely for their protection against invasion or encroachment by any other power.

4. That when a case arises in which a European power proposes to acquire territory by invasion or conquest, it is then for us to determine whether our safety and the integrity of our institutions demand that we shall resist such action by armed force if necessary.

5. That the Executive has pressed the Monroe doctrine beyond what was contemplated at the time of its announcement, and that the resultant sequence of the positions thus taken seems to be a committal of this Government to a protectorate over Mexico and the Central and South American States; that this would be most unwise and dangerous, and would violate the sound and well-established policy that we should avoid all entangling alliances with foreign powers, whether they be European or American.

6. That this action was premature, looking to the history of the controversy, and inopportune in view of the business and financial condition of the country.

7. That neither Congress nor the country can be, or has been, committed by the action or position of the Executive Department, in reference to the Venezuelan boundary controversy, as to the course to be pursued when the time shall have arrived for a final determination. It will then be our province and our duty to adopt such a line of policy and to take such action as may be then demanded by our sense of duty to the country and by a due regard for its honor and dignity, the welfare and safety of our people, and the integrity of our institutions.

Mr. SEWELL Mr. President, the message sent by the President to Congress on the 17th of December last presents a condition of affairs in our relations with Great Britain of most serious import. After a brief reference to the boundary question between Great Britain and the Republic of Venezuela, and to the correspondence between the respective officers of the two Governments upon this subject, he refers to the Monroe doctrine, and proceeds to apply it in this way:

If a European power, by an extension of its boundaries, takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring Republics against its will and in derogation of its rights, it is difficult to see why to that extent such European power does not thereby attempt to extend its system of government to that portion of this continent which is thus taken. This is the precise action which President Monroe declared to be "dangerous to our peace and safety," and it can make no difference whether the European system is extended by an advance of frontier or otherwise.

After further discussing the subject, he proceeds:

Assuming, however, that the attitude of Venezuela will remain unchanged, the dispute has reached such a stage as to make it now incumbent upon the United States to take measures to determine with sufficient certainty for its justification what is the true divisional line between the Republic of Venezuela and British Guiana. * * * In order that such an examination should be prosecuted in a thorough and satisfactory manner, I suggest that the Congress make an adequate appropriation for the expenses of a commission to be appointed by the Executive, who shall make the necessary investigation and report upon the matter with the least possible delay. When such report is made and accepted, it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands, or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which, after investigation, we have determined of right belongs to Venezuela.

In making this recommendation I am fully alive to the responsibility incurred, and keenly realize all the consequences that may follow.

Taking the text of this message, it appears to be quite clear that the President intended to present to Congress the contingency of war with Great Britain, if that power should insist upon encroaching upon the territory of Venezuela beyond the line which the suggested commission should find to be the true boundary between British Guiana and Venezuela. Whether it was wise in the President, at this time, to present that as a contemplated issue or not is a matter about which there may be a serious difference of opinion. Throughout this message, as well as the accompanying correspondence upon the part of the Secretary of State, the ground upon which the position of the President is taken is that the United States has announced the Monroe doctrine as the one which must govern its action in the relations between European powers and all the States in this hemisphere.

It may be well to recur to the circumstances under which the Monroe doctrine was put forward, and what was intended at the time to be its purpose and its scope. This announcement was made in the year 1823. Shortly prior to that time, Russia, Prussia, France, and Austria had entered into what was known as the Holy Alliance, the purpose being to protect and sustain the monarchs of Europe in their authority and power. In pursuance of this purpose, they proposed to overturn the Cortes in Spain and restore Ferdinand to power. Upon making this proposition, however, to England, that power declined to cooperate. It was then determined that France should send an army into Spain for this purpose. This was done, the Cortes was overthrown, and Ferdinand installed as King of Spain.

Following these events the courts of St. Petersburg, Vienna, Berlin, and Paris were addressed by the Spanish Government in the month of December, 1823, proposing a conference at Paris for the purpose of inducing the allied powers to assist Spain in regaining her sovereignty over the revolted American colonies.

In a speech made by Mr. Webster upon the 14th of April, 1826, he discussed the history of the Monroe doctrine, its correct definition and limitations, and what it was properly intended to mean as a rule of action on the part of the United States. After giving a statement of this request, he says:

The King of Spain, in making this request to the members of the Holy Alliance, argued as it has been seen he might argue. He quoted their own doctrines of Laybach; he pointed out the pernicious example of America, and he reminded them that their success in Spain itself had paved the way for successful operations against the spirit of liberty on this side of the Atlantic.

The proposed meeting, however, did not take place. England had already taken a decided course; for as early as October (two months prior to Monroe's declaration) Mr. Canning, in a conference with the French minister in London, informed him distinctly and expressly that England would consider any foreign interference, by force or by menace, in the dispute between Spain and the colonies as a motive for recognizing the latter without delay.

It is probable that this determination of the English Government was known here at the commencement of the session of Congress; and it was under these circumstances, it was in this crisis, that Mr. Monroe's declaration was made.

The Spanish provinces on this continent had previously thrown off the yoke of Spain and erected themselves into independent, so-called republican forms of government. There was an apprehension in this country that the Holy Alliance might undertake to reestablish the power of Spain throughout her revolted colonies.

A feeling prevailed that such a policy as this, if carried out successfully, might endanger the safety of our people and the integrity of our institutions, and it was as against this that the Monroe doctrine was chiefly pointed. Another object of what is known as the Monroe doctrine was to settle the question that there could be no occupation of unoccupied territory by way of colonization upon the part of any European power. In other words, that there was no portion of either North or South America which, at that time, could be considered as derelict or unoccupied, and that the policy previously pursued by European powers of appropriating such territory could no longer be permitted within this hemisphere. The Monroe doctrine served its purposes. No attempt was made upon the part of the Holy Alliance to reestablish the power of Spain within her revolted colonies, and no territory was sought to be colonized as being unoccupied or derelict.

That the limitations which I have thus put upon what is known as the Monroe doctrine are correct, I think I can safely rely upon the words used in the announcement of the doctrine, upon the correspondence of the then Secretary of State, and the declarations of the men who were in public life at and shortly after that period.

Again, the doctrine, even as proposed at that time, limited as I have suggested, met with very great opposition upon the part of men whose opinions are certainly entitled to respect. Unquestionably there was the thought upon the part of many persons that the Monroe doctrine would, if adopted as a part of our fundamental law, more or less commit this country to interference and intermeddling in the affairs of other American States, where they were involved in hostile relations with European powers. A declaration upon this subject is to be found in a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives in 1825 in the following words:

That the United States ought not to become a party with the Spanish American Republics, or either of them, to any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing interference by any European powers with their independence or form of Government, or to any compact for the purpose of preventing colonization upon the continents of America, but that the people of the United States should be left free to act in any crisis in such manner as their feelings and friendship toward these Republics and as their own honor and policy may at the time dictate.

The same thought was enforced by Mr. Webster in the speech to which I have referred. In the course of his speech he said:

It is doubtless true, as I took occasion to observe the other day, that this declaration must be considered as founded on our rights, and to spring mainly from a regard to their preservation. It did not commit us, at all events, to take up arms on any occasion of hostile feeling by the powers of Europe to South America. If, for example, all the States of Europe had refused to trade with South America until her States should return to their former allegiance, that would have furnished no cause of interference to us. Or if an armament has been furnished by the allies to act against provinces the most remote from us, as Chile or Buenos Ayres, the distance of the scene of action diminishing our apprehension of danger, and diminishing also our means of effectual interposition, might still have left us to content ourselves with remonstrance. If an army equipped and maintained by these powers had been landed on the shore of the Gulf of Mexico and commenced the war in our own immediate neighborhood, such an event might justly be regarded as dangerous to ourselves, and on that ground call for decided and immediate interference by us. The sentiments and policy announced by the declaration thus understood were, therefore, in strict conformity to our duties and our interests.

In a speech delivered in the Senate on the 8th of March, 1853, by the Hon. John M. Clayton, of Delaware, he said:

This celebrated declaration, which is often quoted as a pledge to go to war with any European nation which shall attempt to colonize any part of this hemisphere, is not a declaration by the President to a foreign country, but a mere recommendation to Congress to declare, first, that we think any attempt to extend the European system, that is, to make a European colony in this hemisphere, would be dangerous to our peace and safety; and, secondly, that any European interposition to control the destiny of an established American Government would be viewed by us as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. Congress utterly refused to adopt the recommendation at the time, and has ever since refused to make any such declaration. Mr. Monroe made no declaration himself. But, in pursuance of the power given him by the Constitution to recommend to Congress such measures as he should deem expedient, he said in his message to the two Houses: "We owe it to ourselves to declare," etc.; that is, he recommended to Congress (in virtue of the right to recommend given him by the Constitution) to make this declaration in some resolution or other proper form, and he was pledged by it to nothing more than this: That, if Congress shaped such a resolution or made such a declaration, he would approve it. There was no pledge in it to any power on earth but his own countrymen in Congress assembled. The American Government could be committed only by the vote of both Houses of Congress, approved by the President.

The proposition recommended by Mr. Monroe was warmly opposed by the very Congress to which it was submitted. No such declaration was made, or attempted to be made, by Congress, but Mr. Clay, who was an ardent supporter of Mr. Monroe's administration, did at the time propose a resolution to the House of Representatives which was intended to approach the declaration, but even that failed. His resolution was "that the people of these States would not see, without serious inquietude, any forcible interposition by the allied powers of Europe, in the behalf of Spain, to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States." Even had this passed, it was but a poor response to the recommendation. It did not adopt Mr. Monroe's language or its equivalent, and it restricted the "serious inquietude" we should feel to the case of a forcible interposition by the allied powers to aid Spain! But Mr. Clay's resolution, even when thus diluted, backed by all the influence which he and Mr. Webster exerted on the occasion, never passed the House of Representatives.

It has been often said and there is much reason to believe that Mr. Adams, who was Secretary of State at the time Mr. Monroe proposed the doctrine, was entitled to the paternity of it. Mr. Calhoun once intimated so much in the Senate. It was the principal topic of discussion in Congress during the Administration of Mr. Adams, and it was generally believed at the time that the reassertion of the Monroe principle in Mr. Poinsett's instructions, and in the course adopted by the advocates of Mr. Adams in favor of the Panama mission, drove Mr. Adams from power and secured the election of President Jackson, whose party, shortly after his election, assumed the name of the Democratic party. Among his most ardent advocates was Mr. Van Buren, the great Coryphæus of that party, who, in a speech in the Senate, opposing the Panama mission and the Monroe doctrine, said:

"I will venture to affirm that there is not a member on this floor who will avow his willingness to enter into a stipulation to resist attempts by the European powers to colonize any portion of this continent. If mistaken," said Mr. Van Buren, "I desire to be corrected. No; I am not. No; thank heaven, a policy so opposite to all the feelings of the American people, so adverse, as I firmly believe it to be, to its true interests, has no friend, at least no advocate, on this floor."

The Senator from Michigan, Mr. Cass, was perfectly correct when he said that this declaration of Mr. Monroe had lain ever since its origin a dead letter on our records. His recent attempt to revive it by his resolution at the last session closes the history of the Monroe doctrine. That resolution met with such violent opposition from his own party as to give us the assurance that no President who should undertake to act upon it could be sustained. With all similar resolutions, recommendations, and declarations, it was consigned to "that same ancient vault where all the kindred of the Capulets lie."

Looking back to the condition of this country at the time the Monroe doctrine was announced, and looking to the then threatening position of the European powers and the feeble condition of Mexico and the South American States, it might well have been our duty to ourselves and our own interest would have demanded that we should have intervened to prevent the reconquest of the revolted colonies by the Spanish Government. It may have been well also to give notice to all the world that we could not abide the appropriation of any portion of either North or South America by a European power by way of colonization as unoccupied territory, but I can not see any ground for maintaining that this Government gave any pledge to other American States that in controversies with European powers we would and must necessarily intervene and assist them by our military power to resist assaults by a European power. As Mr. Webster states it, that, as it appears to me, would raise a contingency in which we should then have to decide whether our interests and our safety were involved or not.

That also appears to me to be the true rule which should be applicable in the present instance. Is our safety involved? Is the integrity of our institutions endangered by reason of this controversy between Great Britain and Venezuela? It appears to me that the doctrine which has been put forth by the President, and upon which the Administration bases the extreme position it has taken, is far in advance of anything which was contemplated by the Monroe doctrine or which has ever yet been acted upon as a part of our national policy.

The controlling reason as presented by the President is not the acquisition or extension of territory merely, whereby we are to be endangered. But it is the taking "possession of the territory of one of our neighboring republics against its will, and in derogation of its rights." That the mere acquisition or extension of territory is not the gravamen of the offense is shown by the following language taken from the President's message:

Great Britain's present proposition has never thus far been regarded as admissible by Venezuela, though any adjustment of the boundary which that country may deem for her advantage and may enter into of her own free will can not, of course, be objected to by the United States.

Venezuela might thus cede by treaty the half of her territory and yet we would not have a right to object. But if any part of it is taken by force, we are then bound to intervene and resist the attempt by force. Great Britain may get the whole disputed territory by treaty or purchase, and neither our safety nor the integrity of our institutions is involved. But if there is a quarrel, then we are to make the cause of Venezuela our own and resist by armed intervention the attempt of Great Britain to take forcible possession of the disputed lands.

This appears to be inconsistent with the previous position taken in the message that "it can make no difference whether the European system is extended by an advance of frontier or otherwise." But, whether it be inconsistent or not, the deduction to be drawn from the spirit and the letter of the message is that the mere acquisition of territory is not the cause of offense, but the real cause is the attempt of a European power to impose upon and oppress a weaker American State or nation.

I can but think that this is a new departure; that it practically means that this Government must assume a protectorate over Mexico, Central America, and all the South American States, and that, no matter whether these States may be right or wrong, in any case of a conflict with a European power we pledge ourselves as an ally to furnish men and munitions of war and force enough to protect the weaker American power against the stronger European power. This seems to me to be the plain inference to be deduced from the attitude assumed by the President and his Secretary of State in the correspondence with Great Britain.

Again, conceding that the message does not go so far as I have endeavored to show, it may be that our safety and the integrity of our institutions would not be in the least degree affected or endangered by the acquisition of territory by a European power under such circumstances, and yet the position of the President and of his Secretary of State leaves no room for inquiry as to whether we would suffer any damage under those circumstances. With them it seems that the mere enforcement of a claim by a stronger European power which may result in the acquisition of more or less territory is, in itself, the injury and damage to us; that it endangers our safety and the integrity of our institutions.

For one, I can not assent to that doctrine. It is to be borne in mind that Venezuela is 3,000 miles distant. According to estimates which have been made of its population it has about 2,200,000 inhabitants. Of these, 1 per cent, or about 22,000, are said to be whites, while the rest of the population consists of Indians, negroes, and mixed breeds. It is well known that these South American States, and Venezuela especially, have been in a state of revolution, more or less, ever since they threw off the Spanish yoke. The Secretary of State says in his correspondence, which accompanies the President's message:

> In 1848 Venezuela entered upon a period of civil commotions, which lasted for more than a quarter of a century, and the negotiations thus interrupted in 1844 were not resumed until 1876.

Certainly a nation which was so recently in a state of practical revolution for a period of twenty-five years can hardly commend itself to us as a proper ward over whom we should be willing to assume guardianship, and we know that the same condition of things has been more or less true of all the South American States. I can but think that it behooves us to pause and consider well before we agree to an extension and development of the Monroe doctrine to a point which involves our taking charge of all these States and undertaking to protect them as against European powers. It can not be that a population so given over to turmoil and revolution, so unstable in their forms of government and systems of policy as they are, can fail to embroil themselves with foreign powers, sometimes when they are right and perhaps more frequently when they are wrong. If we lead them once to understand that we will stand between them and foreign powers, they will be reckless, hasty, and violent, and we shall find ourselves in interminable trouble in consequence. Besides, it may be fairly supposed that foreign powers would say to us that our interposition as now proposed would lay upon us the duty of making good all undertakings on the part of these Governments and being responsible for the wrongs they might commit. That would be the effect of a protectorate, and I do not myself very well see how a position of that kind could be successfully contested if we do undertake to interfere as is now proposed.

I do not wish to be understood as affirming that there are no cases in which it is not our right, and our duty to ourselves, to interfere; but the test is not whether a stronger power is imposing upon a feeble one or not. It is not that we owe any duty to the weaker power or to any other power on the face of the earth except ourselves. If we are to interfere, it must be simply and solely because our duty to ourselves and our own rights and interests absolutely require it.

I am fully aware of the fact that the commonly received interpretation of the Monroe doctrine is much broader and the understanding of its binding force much stronger than I have adopted. But it has not yet been so engrafted upon or incorporated with our system, with the latitude to which I refer, as that, when a proper case arises, we may not review its history, its past application, and its adaptation to the conditions now existing.

I can but think that the public mind, as well as many of our public men, has been led away from a true understanding of the grounds upon which we can properly and legitimately intervene in matters such as are now under consideration. The thought seems to prevail that by reason of the declaration of the Monroe doctrine we are pledged to resist by force any and all aggressions of a European power upon the States lying south of us, and that the Monroe doctrine as thus interpreted is to be the measure and rule of our conduct in all such cases. As I have endeavored to show, the Monroe doctrine was much narrower and more limited in its scope than the interpretation to which I have referred as being put upon it. Our right and duty to intervene rests upon a broader basis. We have a right to intervene in the affairs of other nations in any case in which our safety is involved or the integrity of our institutions is endangered. This principle is bound up in and is of the essence of our organization and existence as a nation. It underlies the Monroe doctrine. That was but one form of proposed application or expression of that cardinal principle and was most useful and valuable in the conditions then existing. The Monroe doctrine was but an outgrowth from that broad, underlying principle. To rest our right to interfere upon the Monroe doctrine is calculated to mislead and confuse.

It may be entitled to respect. But if it should appear that a blind adherence to its supposed obligations is likely to lead us into entangling and dangerous alliances, then the sooner we halt and ponder and deliberate upon its true meaning, upon the consequences to ensue from too latitudinarian a construction of its terms, and upon the full import of its application in the present or existing contingency, the more probable it is that we will discharge the duties we owe the country in a wise and patriotic manner.

The Executive has no power to commit Congress or the country to the positions he has assumed, nor do I regard that by providing for a boundary commission we have made any committals as to the action which may appear to be wise and expedient, when the commission shall have made its report. It is to be hoped that with that report, or in some other manner, an amicable solution of the controversy may be obtained. If not, then, and not until then, will the emergency arise in which we shall have to determine upon the course of action we should adopt.

And when the time for action comes it should not be unduly influenced by impulsive sympathy on the one hand, or by passionate antipathy on the other. The human mind is prone to excitement when international controversies arise. The first ebullitions of public sentiment are not always sustained by the sober second thought. Besides there are persons who seek a cheap popularity by the affectation of patriotic zeal. Such, as a rule, are not of the stuff of which the solid and substantial citizens are made. While public sentiment is entitled to respect at our hands, we should not be misled by the intemperate expressions of those who at the first intimation of war are ready to boil over with heated passion, no matter what nation may be the contemplated antagonist or what the cause of controversy.

Such influences should not find lodgment in this body. We are intrusted with the conservation of the interest and the welfare of over 60,000,000 people. The interests involved are vitally important. The subject is grave, and our action may be fraught with momentous consequences. Such is my sense of the situation, and I submit to you that it demands at our hands the most careful, the most deliberate, and most thoughtful consideration of which we are capable.

Again, it does appear to me that the present was not an opportune time for the precipitation of such an issue upon the country. I can but think that a matter which has been slumbering so many years in a state of diplomatic repose might have been delayed at least a few months longer. If we address ourselves to the proper ordering of our domestic economies we have quite enough now to engage our full time and upon which to exert our best mental energies. It seems hardly wise, just at this time, to have thrown into the political arena this further cause for disorder and disturbance.

A proper and zealous regard for the upholding of the honor of the nation on the part of the Executive is to be commended. It is right that he should be watchful as to any proposed innovations on the part of foreign powers which may involve our interests, our safety, or the integrity of our institutions. But we have a right to expect that discretion and good judgment will be exercised in bringing to a culmination an issue so grave and serious as that now presented. It appears to me that in this respect the action of the Executive has been alike unseasonable and premature.

Whatever may be the true construction of the Monroe doctrine; whatever may be its binding force; whatever may be the eventual danger of the apprehended encroachment by Great Britain upon Venezuelan territory; whatever course our honor and dignity and interests may require us to pursue, I can but think that the action to which I have referred has not been well timed. The country is in a state of recovery or convalescence from the financial malady of 1893. But the still unsettled and troublous condition of its business and money affairs are too strongly in evidence to warrant the putting of any further unnecessary strain upon it. In this view it appears to me that the action of the Executive has been most unseasonable.

I ask that the resolution remain on the table for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). It will be so ordered, unless there be objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish to state that I desire to submit some remarks upon the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey on Thursday next.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution to print 5,000 copies of the paper entitled "Geological and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado," with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I do not propose to object to a vote being had upon the joint resolution if the Senate desires to vote upon it at this time.

When the consideration of the joint resolution was asked for a few mornings ago by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], as I am informed, it had not been referred to a committee, but was then introduced by him and its passage by the Senate asked for. I objected to its passage at that time because I believed that it provided for an extravagant appropriation, which was not authorized under the circumstances.

The facts in regard to this matter, as I understand—and if I am misinformed the Senator from Illinois will correct me—are that it is the duty of the Supervising Architect, regularly appointed and receiving a salary of four or five thousand dollars—I do not know the exact amount—to prepare plans and specifications of all public buildings provided for by Congress throughout the United States.

Congress, in the regular appropriation act, appropriated the sum of $200,000 for the office of the Supervising Architect for the employment of draftsmen and skilled workmen to assist him in the preparation of these plans. Two hundred thousand dollars, I understand, is the regular appropriation for that office to aid the Supervising Architect, whose business it is by law to make all of these plans and specifications, with the assistance he is authorized to employ by this additional appropriation.

In addition to that, Mr. President, in the sundry civil appropriation act of last year the sum of $30,000 was specifically provided for assistants to the Supervising Architect in preparing plans and specifications for the public building at Chicago, Ill. Now, it is proposed by this joint resolution, without sending it to a committee, to consider and pass upon it in any way whatever, to appropriate $25,000 to employ an assistant architect to make the plans and specifications for the public building at Chicago, in the State of Illinois. I believe this to be extravagant. I do not think that such a sum should be so recklessly appropriated.

I know how difficult it is to defeat any appropriation that is asked for by one of our large cities, but it seems to me that it is the duty of the Supervising Architect to make the plans and specifications for all public buildings. If he is not competent to do it, then the Secretary of the Treasury ought to appoint some one who is competent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, in order that the joint resolution may be disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I presume there will be no objection to that course.

Mr. CULLOM. It will take but a very few minutes to dispose of the joint resolution at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the unfinished business will be temporarily laid aside and the consideration of the joint resolution will be proceeded with. The Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. BERRY. If the Supervising Architect is not competent to discharge the duties which the law imposes upon him, then the Secretary should secure some one who is. If it be stated that the money given to the Department is not sufficient to enable it to employ first-class talent, then it should be increased and first-class talent should be employed. But the Secretary of the Treasury has already had $200,000 for assistants for all the public buildings throughout the United States, $30,000 more to employ assistants for this particular building, and then to ask the Senate to pass a joint resolution, without consideration by any committee of this body, appropriating $25,000 more to employ another assistant architect to make the plans of the building is recklessly extravagant. It seems to me, I confess, that there have been few things in a small way that show such reckless extravagance.

Now, if we make this precedent, if we provide for the appointment of an assistant architect at Chicago, where are we to stop? We have already had notice from the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] that he wishes an appropriation for an assistant architect at Los Angeles, Cal., with a salary, I presume, of twelve or fifteen or twenty thousand dollars, if it is made in proportion to the proposed appropriation. The senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has given notice that he desires two assistant architects for two buildings in the State of New Jersey. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], I think, has another proposition for the public building at Portland, Oreg., where he will want one or more assistant architects to prepare the plans. If we begin in this reckless way, where is it to stop? How much will it cost to make the plans for the various public buildings throughout the United States? How much assistance does the Architect want, when Congress thought $200,000 was sufficient for him to employ all the necessary assistants?

As I said a while ago, I know full well the influences that will be brought to bear from the great city of Chicago to beat down a man who dares to stand here and oppose any proposition they want; but, Mr. President, I believe that this extravagance in this particular is unjustified and inexcusable.

Much has been said recently about the tariff act not providing sufficient revenue to run the Government. I think the difficulty is not in the insufficiency of revenue, but that it comes from the extravagant appropriations which are made here, almost recklessly, in so many cases. It is true that $25,000 is not a great deal, but it sets a precedent for the extravagance which prevails in many of the departments of this Government. Such extravagance ought to be stopped and it will have to be stopped if we are to get revenue enough from any source to meet the demands that are made upon the Government.

I am unwilling to sit by and let the joint resolution pass without objection. If the Senate thinks proper, however, to vote upon it now without reference to a committee, I shall simply call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the joint resolution, and vote against it.

Mr. BATE. Has not the joint resolution been referred to a committee?

Mr. BERRY. No, sir; it has never been referred to any committee.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I shall not take much time in discussing the merits of the joint resolution, as I think the Senate already pretty well understands it. I do not propose to debate with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] the question whether the present policy, which has been in vogue for so many years in the Treasury Department with reference to the Supervising Architect, is a good one, or whether the salary paid to the man who occupies that place is a sufficient amount. But I will simply state what the facts are.

The appropriation for the building at Chicago was made some time ago. The Illinois delegation, for the time being representing that State in the two Houses of Congress, have frequently called upon the Secretary, hoping thereby to secure the preparation of plans for the building and to begin its construction. Up to this time nothing at all has been done. The reason why nothing has been done, as alleged by the Secretary of the Treasury, is that it is impossible for him or for the Architect of the Treasury to proceed any faster than they are going in the preparation of plans for the construction of public buildings.

Mr. PLATT. When was the act authorizing the building passed?

Mr. CULLOM. A year and a half ago. The fact is, as the Secretary stated, that there are hundreds of buildings the construction of which has been authorized. Work has been begun on a number of them, while the plans for many of them have not been prepared at all. The reason for it, as alleged by the Secretary, is that they did not have appropriations sufficient to carry on the work as rapidly as it ought to be carried on.

It is very important to the city of Chicago that the building should be constructed as soon as possible; and when I say the city of Chicago, it means in a large sense the whole country, because the mails of the entire country—East and West and North and South—largely go through that city and have to be handled there.

Therefore, after consulting with several of our delegation and after consulting with the Treasury officials, I asked the Secretary to put on paper exactly what he thought ought to be done; what amendment to the law ought to be made. He did so, and I introduced it, as I told him I would, and I supposed when I did it that there would be no opposition whatever to the passage of the little amendment.

The joint resolution simply provides for taking $25,000, or so much as may be necessary, but not to exceed that amount, of the appropriation already made for that building and using it for this purpose. There is no increase.

Mr. DAVIS. Is there no increase?

Mr. CULLOM. There is no increase at all. The sum of $25,000 is simply to be taken from the appropriation for the purpose of enabling the Secretary to employ an architect or architects for the preparation of plans for the building. It is to be a great edifice, a building which perhaps will cost not less than $4,000,000, covering a whole block of ground. It is very important that it should be a great building in size, so as to accommodate the Department and the Government with reference to its mails, courts, etc. It is very important, therefore, that this authority should be given, and I am surprised, I confess, that there should be any objection to it.

I do not sympathize with any attacks which have been made upon the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], if any have been made, for having a different opinion. I certainly make no criticism of him. But I do trust, notwithstanding the fact that he holds a different opinion and believes that there is extravagance in the Department and there will be extravagance in this matter if we pass the joint resolution, that the Senate will pass it. I assume that the Secretary of the Treasury will not spend a dollar beyond what is necessary in order to get the plans and specifications prepared for the beginning of the construction of the building.

I am inclined to think that the Government may be justly criticised for the manner in which we conduct that Department, because I believe that if there were a law which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to send an agent to Chicago, or New York, or Oregon, or wherever a great public building is to be constructed, and let the contract and employ an architect on the ground where the building is to be erected to make the plans, we would get along with the work a good deal faster than we have been getting along heretofore and save money to the Government. But that is not the policy of the Government. What I desire now is to get the building at Chicago started. When the present building is vacated, which will be done within a period of a little less than two months, the Government will have to pay not less than $60,000 a year as rent for rooms scattered all over town, to be used for public offices occupied by Government officers outside of the post-office force itself.

It seems to me that the most important feature at present is to get the building started so as to stop the extraordinary rent that the Government will have to pay in order to conduct the business of the Government in that city. I hope there will be no further discussion about the joint resolution and no further objection to it. I understand from my friend, the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], that he does not propose to make any further opposition to it, and so I understood from the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. I hope the joint resolution will be passed without further delay.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the views of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] as to economy have always been eminently sound, but a condition of things is now presented which will create the necessity of extravagant appropriations or there will be no money for the people. There is already in the Treasury a cash balance of about $180,000,000, and it is proposed to sell bonds and buy $200,000,000 more of money—$100,000,000 immediately, and another $100,000,000 at the convenience of those who wish to obtain Government bonds. If that is done, pretty much all the circulating medium will be in the Treasury.

It is something more than a temptation to extravagant appropriations—before Congress adjourns it may become its duty—to get this money out of the Treasury by any means, so that the people may have something with which to do business. A contraction in the currency of $200,000,000 more and piling up the cash balance in the Treasury would utterly destroy business. It would be a greater calamity than to appropriate money and tax the people. If you take the money out of circulation at this time, unless there can be some way invented to stop the bond sales, there will be no refuge for the people except extravagance. That appears to be the only alternative.

Congress will not do anything else. It will not stop the bond deals going on, and it can not afford to have the entire circulation tied up in the Treasury. A peculiar state of affairs is presented. Therefore, if money is wanted at this time to build public buildings, Congress had better appropriate it now when it is necessary to get the money out of the Treasury. The people can not get it in any other way that I can see.

Mr. BERRY. I do not entirely agree with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] that it is best to issue bonds and then to indulge in extravagant appropriations in order to get the money in circulation throughout the country. I think it would be better to stop issuing bonds.

Mr. STEWART. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas in that respect. That is what I am trying to do, but it can not be done, and it leaves the alternative which I have presented.

Mr. BERRY. If that can not be done I do not think it wise that the Senate should indulge in extravagant appropriations even because wrongs may be done in other directions.

Now, in answer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], I wish to state, in the first place, that when he says the joint resolution does not increase the appropriation, because the sum comes from the appropriation already made, it is not a fair argument, because the Senator from Illinois well knows that when the building has once been begun it will be completed. He knows that if by reason of this sum being taken from the present appropriation there shall be an insufficient amount left to complete the building Congress will have to appropriate what is needed. He knows that it is not fair to say that this does not increase the amount of money that the building will cost, because if we take from the present appropriation $25,000 or $50,000 to pay for the plans, the Senator well knows that when the proper time comes that amount will be replaced in order to complete the building. So there is nothing whatever in that argument.

The point I am making is clear. It may be that I know nothing about it, but here it is made an officer's duty under the law to make the plans; he is there for that purpose; those who made the law thought that a man with a salary of $5,000, if that be the sum, was sufficient for the purpose, and they made it his duty to make the plans. They gave him a general appropriation of $200,000 for assistants in making the various plans. But the Chicago building being somewhat out of the ordinary and larger than those usually built, Congress thought it might be necessary to require more assistance than that ordinarily used and it went further. It also appropriated $30,000 for assistants to this man whose duty it is to make the plans. Congress has already appropriated $30,000 for somebody to help him in making the plans.

The joint resolution proposes to appropriate $25,000 in addition. It seems to me that is reckless extravagance. It seems to me that when it is the duty of this officer to make the plans, to pay $25,000 for a man unnamed to assist him is an extravagant appropriation. The joint resolution does not come from any committee whatever, and it seems to me it ought not to pass the Senate in this way.

The senior Senator from Illinois says the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] have agreed not to oppose the joint resolution further. Why? Because the moment we make this precedent and give $25,000 for an assistant at Chicago, that moment the Senator from California, the Senator from New Jersey, and the Senator from Oregon will say, "The same reasons prevail at Portland, Los Angeles, and Newark that exist at Chicago; and the Senate having already given the authority in the Chicago case, why not give it in these cases?"

I think, Mr. President; that money should not be appropriated in this way. I repeat that which I have already said. Complaint has been made and is being made that under the present tariff law there is an insufficiency of revenue. I say that the laws of this country raise ample revenue to run the Government if it were run in an economical way; but extravagance after extravagance has grown up, and every man who has dared to stand and raise his voice here because he believed it was his duty to the people he represented has been denounced as a demagogue and even worse by the parties whose interests were affected by the appropriation to which he objected. But believing it to be my duty to object to the joint resolution, I did object to it. I do not think it ought to be passed in this manner. I think the whole matter ought to go to a committee, and the committee ought to report not only on the Chicago building, but on the California, the New Jersey, and the Oregon cases, and any other building that may be similarly situated. If the present laws or the present architects are insufficient to meet the situation, then a general bill ought to be brought in to meet it, instead of seeking to take money out of the public Treasury without consideration by a committee of this body.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in replying to the Senator from Arkansas. I have stated what are the facts about the Chicago case. If there is any fault to be found, it is in the fact that there is not enough money for the Architect of the Treasury to make the plans and designs as rapidly as they are required.

That is the whole story. The Secretary insists that there is not money enough to enable him to do it. He desires to employ an architect to help prepare the plans for the Chicago public building and to take the money, if we will allow him to do so, out of the appropriation already made. I hope that permission will be granted.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I believe the joint resolution ought to be referred to the appropriate committee, and, therefore, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Mississippi bear with me for one moment? I hope that that reference will not be made. It would simply result in longer delay, which would cause greater expense to the Government of the United States. If the joint resolution is passed, as it ought to be in my judgment, and the plans and specifications are provided, we will get a public building in Chicago some time or other, and shut off the extraordinary amount of rent that the Government is now paying. I may say that it will have to pay rent at a much greater rate within a short time.

I hope that the reference will not be made, and that the joint resolution will be passed by the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Mr. President, I shall vote against the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, but I do it in the hope and with the expectation that either the Committee on Appropriations, of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is a member, or the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or both together, will, at a very early day, and without waiting for the regular appropriation bill, formulate a bill that will furnish money enough to enable the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury to go on with the plans and specifications of the various public buildings in this country for which appropriations were made years ago.

I for one think it is a burning shame that the public business should have been delayed as it has been delayed, and if, as stated by the recent communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, it is because of the lack of appropriations to enable the work to proceed, it seems to me we ought to know it and we ought to meet the demand at once without further delay.

Mr. CULLOM. I agree with the Senator from Oregon that it is a shame that the hundreds of public buildings all over the country are delayed for want of sufficient appropriations to enable the Government to prepare the plans and specifications as rapidly as they ought to be prepared. So far as I am concerned, I am ready at any minute to do my part on the Committee on Appropriations, of which I have the honor to be a member, if the matter comes before the committee, looking toward the reformation of this condition of affairs.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to repeat that $230,000 has already been appropriated for assistants to the Supervising Architect in making the plans.

Mr. GEORGE. For assistants to him?

Mr. BERRY. For assistants to the man whose duty it is to make the plans, whom the law contemplates will make them, and who is getting a salary to make them. Congress has already given him $200,000 generally, and $30,000 for this particular building at Chicago.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, a few days ago, when the same matter was under consideration, I mentioned the peculiarity of a similar case at San Francisco. I do not intend to oppose the joint resolution, because I know that a building in Chicago is a great necessity, and I think it ought to be proceeded with before the plans which have been adopted for it become so antique as to be considered disreputable. As it is now in various places in this country, including, as I stated, the city of San Francisco, the Department has prepared plans and they are still hanging upon the wall, in most cases, I believe, looking outward. They will soon be turned the other way. They will soon be obsolete, and we shall have to prepare new plans in accordance with the progress of the age, not the progress made by Congress in the matter of public buildings.

I do not think the Treasury Department is at all to blame. I do not believe that money enough has been appropriated. I think the whole system is wrong. Certainly a system which brings about the result that confronts us here must be wrong. Congress makes an appropriation for a public building and then five or six years hence nothing is done looking to its completion. Here is an opportunity for Chicago to get a public building. Although I am anxious to succeed in the case of San Francisco, I shall do my best to help Chicago out. I think it is the duty of Congress to provide for all these buildings, but if we can extricate one from the slough of despond let us do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to be indulged in making one or two remarks as furnishing the reason why I made the motion.

The joint resolution proposes to appropriate $25,000 out of the Treasury. The rules of the Senate require or suppose without contrary action on the part of the Senate, that all measures shall be referred to its committees for the purpose of deliberation, for the purpose of informing the Senate as to the particular necessity for them, and as to the particular form in which a bill or joint resolution ought to be passed by the Senate.

When the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] states that $200,000 has already been appropriated for the purpose in a general appropriation act, that $30,000 more has been added, making the very large sum of $230,000, nearly a quarter of a million dollars, and then that another $25,000 is asked for, I think it is rather pressing the liberality of the Senate. In other words, when Congress has got to that point in the way of giving out money—and I understand there is not very much money in the Treasury, except what we have borrowed—I think it is rather pressing the matter; that we ought at least, when that point is reached, to have a committee look into the matter and see what is right and proper. I do not see any reason, and no reason has been given, why the usual course of reference to a committee—which ought not to delay the passage of the joint resolution more than a week, if it ought to be passed at all, because every committee meets once a week—should not be pursued.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GEORGE. I will yield in a moment.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not see why the usual course of referring the matter to a committee ought not to be adopted on this occasion. If the Senator from Illinois desires to interrupt me I will hear him now.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely wish to state that a portion of the Illinois delegation, as I have said, although I do not know whether the honorable Senator from Mississippi heard me, called upon the Secretary of the Treasury two or three times within the last year, asking him to commence the work of preparing the plans and specifications for the building. Without a very definite answer, he put us off by the statement that the Department had not got to it, and so on. Finally he made the statement that it would be impossible for him to take action very soon with reference to the Chicago building, in view of the other buildings which were being crowded upon him, unless Congress would give him an additional appropriation and authority to employ an additional architect to assist in making the plans, etc. The Chicago delegation never asked him to recommend any additional appropriation or any specific amount, but they were governed entirely by his judgment as to the best thing to do with reference to getting started.

I thought, and I think my colleague agreed with me, that as it is a matter which does not concern, except indirectly, the question of extravagance or of any other appropriation, but simply asks that so much of the appropriation already made as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary, not to exceed $25,000, may be used for this purpose, it would not be necessary to have the joint resolution referred to any committee, but that the Senate could pass it, and thereby save a little time and in the end save money, which would be paid for rent.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am not going to do anything against the interests of Chicago. The fact is, I am in love with that city. I have a right as a Democrat to be in love with that city. It happens to be the only city in the United States which has succeeded in having a Democratic nominee nominated there elected to the Presidency of the United States. I understand that Chicago is to be also the seat of the next national Democratic convention; and dim as the prospect may appear now for the election of the next Democratic nominee, I confess that my hopes are brightened and cheered by the fact that the good luck which has attended the Democratic party by holding its conventions in Chicago twice and electing its nominee twice may attend it the third time. So I want the Senator from Illinois to understand particularly that I have nothing against Chicago. It is a great city, and I would not lay as small a thing as a straw in the way of the progress of that great city having anything in the world it wants.

But still, Mr. President, notwithstanding the predilections which I have as a Democrat in favor of the city of Chicago, and notwithstanding all the pride I may have as an American citizen in its rapid and phenomenal growth—for never was there anything like it before in all the history of the world—notwithstanding all that, I believe I ought to insist, when money is to be taken out of the Treasury, that a committee shall consider that question beforehand. What will the delay of a week amount to? In the lap of the ages which that city is to last—because I suppose it is to be eternal—what is just one week? I believe the Senator from Illinois is on that committee, is he not?

Mr. CULLOM. I am not upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GEORGE. Well, there will be a meeting of the committee one day this week, and by next Monday we can have all this matter before us. So I think, out of respect to the rights and the feelings of the overtaxed people, even where the little sum of $25,000 is involved, the joint resolution should go through the ordinary routine by which bills are acted upon in the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. BERRY. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I will withhold my vote.

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE].

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. THURSTON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—49.

Bacon,	Faulkner,	Mantle,	Shoup,
Baker,	Frye,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Smith,
Brice,	Gallinger,	Murphy,	Stewart,
Burrows,	Gear,	Nelson,	Teller,

Clark,	Hill,	Morrill,	Vilas,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Pettigrew,	Voorhees,
Cullom,	Kyle,	Proctor,	Wolcott.

So the joint resolution was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to call up for consideration the bill (S. 790) to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota to support schools of mines. It will take but a few minutes to pass it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There are a number of Senators who desire to be heard on the regular order, and none are ready to proceed to-day, I understand. Under the circumstances, I think it is proper I should state that I shall not ask the regular order to be proceeded with to-day, but am willing that it shall be informally laid aside to consider anything that the Senate chooses to take up during the remainder of to-day's session.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas when he thinks we shall be able to reach a vote on the pending measure, the bond bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I can not undertake to set a time. There are a number of Senators who desire to be heard. They are not ready. I presumed some of them would be ready to proceed to-day, but I understand no one is ready. I suppose they will be ready to go ahead in the course of a few days, and that there will not be very much delay.

Mr. PLATT. The bond bill has been pending here since the 7th of January. It is nearly two weeks now, and there have been no speeches made in opposition to the amendment proposed by the majority of the Finance Committee. It is not a case where the minority is obstructing business, but where the majority seems to be preventing us from getting to a vote. I think that the measure ought to be pressed to a vote in some way without what seems to me to be an unreasonable delay. It is a measure which was adopted in the other House because the President of the United States had asked Congress not to take a recess for the holidays until it did something to assist the Treasury Department. There is the bond call, which expires on the 5th of February, and if this bill is to be passed at all, either as it came from the other House or according to the amendment which has been suggested here in the Senate, it ought to be acted upon, it seems to me. The Secretary of the Treasury in giving his notice requiring bids for the bonds, as I remember it, said that if there should be authority to issue a 3 per cent bond on long time the bids would be received for such a bond.

There is a great deal said about being unable to get a vote upon measures in the Senate, about unlimited debate, about obstruction on the part of minorities to prevent votes, and very many Senators think the rules ought to be changed so that there should be some limitation upon debate, among whom I am one. But this is a very peculiar debate. We do not arrive at a vote because Senators in favor of the proposition have not gotten ready to make speeches. We have occasional speeches here; I suppose they are speeches; and I suppose it is debate which has been going on upon the bill. I should call it the reading of essays, or, adopting the language of our old school days, the reading of compositions. A debate upon the bond bill seems to signify a written composition and reading it to four or five members of the Senate.

It seems to me the measure, which is the unfinished business, is important enough, whatever the action of the Senate may be, to have it pressed to a vote. The Senator says that in a few days somebody will be ready, as I understood him, to make a speech on it, and then we will take it up again. I submit that we ought to have some time fixed within which it is possible that we may reach a vote on the subject,

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, the anxiety of the Senator from Connecticut to have a free-silver bill passed at this time is in striking contrast with that Senator's conduct about twelve months ago, when a similar measure was pending in this body, which the friends were anxious to have passed at once and without debate. At that time we had but one day within which we could hope to consider such a bill, and the Senate and the country owed it to the filibustering tactics of the Senator from Connecticut that no vote was then had on that measure. He himself took the responsibility by dilatory tactics to delay and prevent a vote because of the pressing necessity to pass appropriation bills.

Now that Senator is particularly anxious to have the bill passed at once and become a law. The friends of the measure understood at that time the reason why he opposed it, and the friends of the measure understand now that perhaps his anxiety to force a vote at this time is to avoid a debate upon this question, for the reason probably that he does not feel he will be able to answer the reasons presented in favor of the bill, either here or to the country. The friends of the measure will present the reasons why they believe the bill ought to be passed. We shall not ask for a vote until we shall have had an opportunity to present those reasons clearly and distinctly, that they may be understood not only here, but elsewhere.

I imagine that there will be no difficulty about the action whenever it is to the best interest of the country that action should be had. There never has been a time, so far as I know, where a Senator in good faith desired time to prepare to discuss a great question such as this is, when there was any disposition to cut off such debate. I do not believe the Senator from Connecticut himself ever undertook anything of the kind or ever advocated it anywhere; and this is the first time, so far as I know, when any such measure was ever resorted to.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, if I am justly chargeable with inconsistency—I do not think I am—the Senator from Arkansas is certainly much more open to that charge than I am. At a time when the appropriation bills were pressing upon the Senate and it was doubtful whether the Senate could consider the appropriation bills and adjourn on the 4th of March without leaving some of them unacted upon, the Senator insisted upon bringing forward a bill for free coinage which had no relation to anything which was being transacted in the Senate, which was a purely independent measure, and insisted that the Senate should vote upon it in one day. Some of us did desire to discuss that bill. I remember that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] made some remarks upon the bill——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. You have the opportunity now.

Mr. PLATT. And I made some remarks upon the bill. I think I spoke about two hours, and then there arose after my speech was concluded some little disagreement between the two sides of the Chamber, which ended in an agreement on this side that the Senate might vote the next day at 11 o'clock upon a resolution which was offered by one of the Senators in favor of the bill, and the next day the Senator from Arkansas came in and said he did not want a vote at all. Now, that is the inconsistency; that is the charge which is laid to me.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. One moment, please. But the Senator then, and without any reason for it, apparently, except a desire that the Senate should express its opinion upon that great subject, as he considered it, insisted that it should vote within one day after the report was brought in. Now, he is not willing the Senate shall vote. If I have changed, if I wanted to prevent a vote then, he certainly has got on my ground now. He wants to prevent a vote now.

I do not know what reason there can be for the delay of this bill. I do not know why this amendment is brought here, unless it be to embarrass the Treasury Department. The Senator knows perfectly well there is not any free-coinage measure going to pass this Congress. And yet we take up two weeks, and three weeks, and four weeks, while this bond call is pending, in an academic discussion of the question of the standards and the coinage of this country. What other object is there except to embarrass the Treasury? I should be glad to know. We who do not believe in causing embarrassment to the Treasury have not added to the delay by discussion. For my part I do not intend to do so. I want to see a vote upon the bill. I think that I might be able to answer some of the arguments which have been addressed to the Senate in favor of the measure, satisfactorily at least to myself, but I do not wish to delay a vote upon it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the Senator repeat his statement as to a proposition for a vote on that bill before. If I understood him, he said there was a proposition submitted from the other side of the Chamber at the time that bill was pending that there should be a vote had the next day at 11 o'clock, and I declined.

Mr. PLATT. No; submitted by the friends of the Senator from Arkansas and those who were acting with him.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I myself asked for hour after hour to be agreed upon the next day, and all the propositions were rejected by the gentlemen who were filibustering on the other side. Any statement or information on the part of the Senator that I was in any sense responsible for there being no vote the next day is absolutely without foundation, and the record does not sustain it.

Mr. PLATT. This matter has been called up without having had an opportunity to refresh my recollection, but I think I am not mistaken about it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator ought to refresh his memory now and state the facts.

Mr. PLATT. Some disagreement arose between the friends of the measure and those who were opposed to it. It was at 11 or 12 o'clock at night. The Senator from Arkansas was insisting upon a vote, and he could not find any quorum here. Then there was a compromise reached by the introduction of a resolution by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and it was assented to by the Senator from Arkansas, that there should be a vote upon that resolution, expressive of the sentiment of the Senate on the subject of free coinage, the next day at 11 o'clock. That was agreed to before an adjournment that night, and without a vote upon the bill itself.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I wish to repeat that I stood hour after hour and through the whole of the next day asking that a vote might be had on the bill, and it was rejected all the time. There was a proposition made on a different matter altogether, which was submitted from the other side. I do not remember whether it was voted on or not, but it had nothing to do with a vote on the bill; and the intimation, as I understood it, by the Senator from Connecticut that I had failed to ask for a vote on the bill when I could have gotten it is absolutely without foundation, if he made the statement, although, from his present statement, he did not, and I accept his disclaimer.

Mr. CHANDLER. There can not be any mistake about the substantial accuracy, I think, of what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut. I distinctly recollect the occasion. There was objection made to the bill or resolution which the Senator from Arkansas was pressing. It continued during the evening. The controversy was allayed and an adjournment was brought about by an agreement of the opponents of the measure which the Senator was pressing that the next day there should be a vote upon that subject-matter. I do not know that it was an agreement that the vote should be taken upon the exact proposition of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I know it was not.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it was a part of the arrangement that evening that the vote should be taken upon a different proposition on the same subject-matter, which, as the Senator from Connecticut has said, was drawn up by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I know, however, the proposition was made that the next day, by agreement, there should be a vote. The proposition was stated to me. I assented to it for one, and came here the next day with a distinct understanding that without debate the subject-matter which the Senator from Arkansas had been pressing upon the Senate and insisting that we should vote upon in less than twenty-four hours should be disposed of, and neither the junior Senator from Colorado nor the Senator from Arkansas insisted that the understanding should be carried out, but the Senator from Arkansas, as I understand and as I understood at the time, incontinently retreated from the agreement that the sense of the Senate might be taken upon his measure.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, a few days since I introduced a resolution which is kindred in its character with the bill which is now the unfinished business, and it is specially associated with the question of the new issue of bonds. That resolution is known to history as the resolution of Stanley Matthews, then a Senator from Ohio. The resolution recited facts in its preamble that were fresh in the recollection of the country and of the Senate by which it was passed. The resolution passed both Houses of Congress by over a two-thirds vote in January, 1878. A few days afterwards the measure known as the Bland-Allison Act for the remonetization of silver was sent to the President of the United States, Mr. Hayes, and it encountered his veto. It was returned and passed over his veto and became the law. That law and the contract which it recited have been in undisturbed operation since February, 1878. Notwithstanding it had the sanction that it did when it became a law, notwithstanding the persistent effort to have that law repealed and that contract disregarded, it has remained the law of Congress since that day, and no one has attempted to introduce any bill in either House to repeal that law or to gainsay the facts recited in it.

The Treasury Department under the administration of both parties since that time has persisted in disregarding that law and violating the contract recited on its face and recited on the face of the bonds that are now held to be payable in gold. They have changed that express law by treatment and by custom of the Treasury Department; they have violated an express law, an express contract, without any respect or consideration, and repudiated it, and to-day are insisting that their repudiation, their nullification of a law and their disregard of a contract, has changed the legal effect of that law recited in the Stanley Matthews resolution, and converted those bonds into gold bonds. There has also been an effort since the present Administration came into power to commit this Congress to the policy of issuing gold bonds—bonds payable on their face in gold instead of coin. The persistent effort and practice and policy of the Treasury Department has been under this Administration to commit the Government to an obligation to pay all these bonds in gold, and very tempting propositions have been made to Congress to induce it to take that action. We were told when the veto message of the seigniorage bill was sent to Congress that possibly a place could be found for all the silver to be coined out of the seigniorage if Congress would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue gold bonds without limit to obtain gold to prevent the evil effects of attempting to coin the seigniorage.

When the last bonds were sold, the sixty-two-million-dollar issue, another message was sent to us that a contract had been made with the bond syndicate by which they would give up the 4 per cent bonds and accept the 3 per cent bonds upon condition that the new bonds should be expressly payable in gold, and that by this committal of the Government to gold bonds and the repudiation of the law and the contract recited in the Stanley Matthews resolution the people of the country could save $16,000,000 in interest. These were very tempting offers to Congress, but they did not have the effect to influence any action favorable to the demands in those messages.

I simply rose to remind the Senate that this resolution has been laid before it by the Vice-President, that it is the next thing in order, and I can gratify the desire of the Senator from Connecticut and the desire of those who are anxious for a vote by calling up the resolution and asking that the Senate give it immediate consideration for the purpose only of demanding a yea-and-nay vote, to see what progress the money power has made in revolutionizing the sentiment of these two bodies since 1878, from a two-thirds vote, a vote that wiped out the veto power upon which the bond syndicate to-day depends to carry out its purpose.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of making an inquiry, in the first place, as to the parliamentary situation. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] called up his resolution during the morning hour. He then gave way, after it was read by the Secretary, to allow the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to have considered the joint resolution relating to the public building at Chicago. That was continued until the morning hour expired. Then the unfinished business proper, which was the bond bill or the free-coinage bill, was laid aside temporarily to enable the Chicago building joint resolution to be completed. Therefore, the business now properly before the Senate is the bond or free-coinage bill. I ask whether I am not right and whether that is not the only business now before the Senate? The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] stated that he would not press that bill this morning for debate, but nevertheless that is the business before the Senate now, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. That bill is the unfinished business. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], as the Chair understood, asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of his resolution.

Mr. PUGH. I did so to gratify the wishes of those Senators who wanted to vote upon something relating to this great question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the status, and the unfinished business is the free-coinage bill, so called.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to make some remarks upon this revolutionary resolution, as the Senator from Alabama calls it. I should prefer to do so to-morrow, and I would ask him not to press it this afternoon. If the Senator from Idado [Mr. DUBOIS] wishes to have his bill considered this afternoon, I desire to accommodate him if I can; and the resolution of the Senator from Alabama may go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. An objection will carry the resolution over.

Mr. HILL. I simply asked the Senator the question. I do not wish to object, unless I am compelled to do so.

Mr. PUGH. I understand that an objection will carry the resolution over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from New York does not object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be the first resolution laid before the Senate to-morrow. That is the parliamentary status.

Mr. PUGH. Can I get unanimous consent to take a vote on the resolution to-morrow?

Mr. HILL. Hardly, Mr. President. Not to-morrow; some other day. [Laughter.]

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator name a day when he will be ready to stop this filibustering?

Mr. HILL. I am not informed as to the precise time of the election of Senators in Utah, and therefore I can not. I do not wish to displace the bill of the Senator from Arkansas. I care nothing about it. The Senator from Arkansas can take his own time.

Mr. PUGH. I am anxious to have a vote on the resolution, as it involves a great public question and excites so much public attention and interest. Notwithstanding my very great desire to yield to any request of the Senator from New York—and if it were his personal request I could not resist it—as this is a request relating to a great public matter, I must insist upon my motion.

Mr. HILL. What is the effect of that motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is to take up the resolution, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HILL. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to the effect of the motion. Would it displace the free-coinage bill, if agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would like the Senator from Alabama to again state his motion, so that there will be no misunderstanding as to just what it is. Is the motion of the Senator from Alabama to take from the Calendar the resolution and proceed to its consideration?

Mr. PUGH. I ask unanimous consent to do so. I do not wish to displace the pending measure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That would be the effect of agreeing to the Senator's motion.

Mr. PUGH. It is not my intention to affect the standing of the unfinished business. I can put my request in the shape of unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution during the morning hour before the unfinished business is reached.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be then considered.

Mr. HILL. What is the request?

Mr. SHERMAN. The proposition is not understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair said the Senator from Alabama could make the request. That is all the Chair has decided.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will decide any other question when it is presented.

Mr. DUBOIS. I rose a few moments ago to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill No. 790, and my understanding was that unanimous consent was granted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be read for information.

Mr. HILL. I suggest that the request of the Senator from Idaho, that by unanimous consent the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, would not displace the unfinished business.

Mr. HALE. It was part of the request of the Senator from Idaho that the unfinished business be not displaced.

Mr. HILL. I did not understand that. I have no objection to that course being pursued, the unfinished business not being displaced.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, before the subject of considering the unfinished business passes from the attention of the Senate, I want to make an appeal to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] who is in charge of that bill.

The Senator gained in the last Congress a deserved reputation for good sense and skill and good temper in the management of important bills, and I appeal to him, now that he is in charge of the bill which is the unfinished business, the bond bill, so called, substituted by a free coinage of silver amendment, whether in the course of the business of the Senate it is not desirable for him to push that bill so far as is practicable to a vote.

I do not make this appeal because I am anxious for a vote, but I want to call the Senator's attention to the condition of the business of the Senate. It is known to every Senator of experience that the best time to get any important bill considered and passed is in the early part of the session. The months of December and January, and especially January, are the months when other business does not interpose.

The House of Representatives has already matured and passed one appropriation bill, is considering another to-day, and the third one has been reported this morning; and these bills will be here within a day or two. There is a disposition on the part of both bodies to attend to the business of the session, to wind it up as speedily as possible, and to secure an early adjournment of Congress. The appropriation bills have the right of way, and will inevitably be brought before the Senate within the next week. One of them is a very important bill, one of the most important of all the appropriation bills, having upon it many subjects that will need discussion, and long discussion. The Senator will then find that his measure, which I know he wants to pass, and I know he wants to pass it speedily, will be taken out of its track and other business will be substituted. Without manifesting any anxiety for a vote on this bill—for I do not feel it and I do not want to hurry the Senate—yet I do want him to take into account the other business that will be here, and to try to push the bill in his charge to as early a result, whatever that result may be, as it is possible for him to do.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Mr. President, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine, I desire to say that the friends of the measure in my charge are anxious to have it disposed of at the earliest practicable moment; but at this time, early in the session, with very little business on the Calendar, with nothing of material importance now pressing, with appeals made to me by Senators who say that they in good faith are making as rapid preparation as they can in order to submit arguments on the question, I can not refuse to allow them reasonable time to make this preparation. Therefore, as there is no occasion for any great hurry at this moment, it seems to me that a delay of a few days will not interfere with the disposition of this measure. Anxious as I am to have a vote, and willing as I am to have it disposed of at the earliest possible moment, I have not pressed it because Senators are preparing to address the Senate and have not had time as yet to do so.

Mr. HALE. I suppose that is undoubtedly so; but I ask the Senator whether now, when other business is not being pushed, is not the time when, if he can, he should try to induce Senators who want to speak in favor of the measure in the Senator's charge, and who are not opposing it, to hurry up their mental processes and to try to give to the Senate the benefit of their speeches upon the subject at as early a date as possible? The truth is, we have been considering it at odd hours, as the Senator from Connecticut says, nearly a fortnight; and the Senator has been very good-natured, as is his way, and allowed it to go along rather in a dragging fashion; nobody has found fault, and I find none, because I know the condition the Senator describes, but when the speeches to which he refers are made, say in a week longer, he will find other business here that he can not get rid of, and I can not get rid of, and the Senate can not get rid of, and then the measure in his charge will be side tracked, which he does not want. I am interfering here only as a friend in the conduct of this matter, not that the Senator needs that, but to show him that he will not have the clear track that he has now.

PUBLIC LAND SUITS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

I desire to invite attention to the necessity for prompt legislation in order to remove the limitation of the time within which suits may be brought by the Government to annul unlawful or unauthorized grants of public lands.

By the act of March 3, 1887 (24 Stats., 556), the Secretary of the Interior is directed to adjust each of the railroad land grants which may be unadjusted, and it is provided, if it shall appear upon the completion of such adjustment, or sooner, that the lands have been from any cause erroneously certified or patented by the United States to or for the use of a company claiming under any of said grants, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to demand a reconveyance of the title to all lands so erroneously certified or patented, and on failure of the company to make such reconveyance within ninety days the Attorney-General is required to institute and prosecute in the proper courts necessary proceedings to restore title to said lands to the United States. The demands made under this act have been numerous, and in some cases have resulted in the reinvestment of title to the lands in the United States upon demand, but in most cases the demand has been refused and suits have been necessary.

The work of adjustment has been unavoidably slow. The said act makes provision for the reinstatement of entries erroneously canceled on account of railroad withdrawals, and, upon certain conditions, provides for the confirmation of titles derived by purchase from the companies of lands shown to be excepted from the grants. It contemplates a disposition of every tract described by the granting act, situated within the primary or granted limits; an inspection of each tract certified or patented to the company within such limit, to determine whether such certification or patenting was proper; the listing of those tracts shown to be erroneously certified, and the determination for what tracts lost to the grant indemnity is to be allowed.

It is necessary, in making such an adjustment, that all questions of conflicting claims, either between settlers and the road, or between two roads the grants for which conflict or overlap, be finally disposed of, so that a proper disposition of the land can be shown in the adjustment. While adjustments have proceeded with the utmost rapidity consistent with a due regard for the rights of the settlers, of the United States, and the railroad companies, and while to this end the force of adjusters has been largely augmented in the General Land Office, many of the grants yet remain unadjusted.

In some of the grants, notably the corporation grants, the lack of surveys up to the present time made the completion of the work impossible.

Decisions rendered by the Interior Department in numerous conflicts have been carried into the courts. The construction of the Interior Department has generally been sustained when final determination has been reached, but many of the cases are still pending in the courts, not yet having been decided. Some of these cases, while involving immediately the title to only one particular tract, will, when decided, furnish a rule of construction to control the disposition of the title to thousands of acres of other lands in the same situation. Until the courts pass upon these questions final adjustments can not be made.

By section 8 of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stats., 1099), it is expressly enacted that suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent theretofore issued "shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act." This period of five years will expire on the 3d of March, 1896. Of course no suit by the United States to secure the cancellation of a patent in this class of cases after that date would be effective. Indeed, it is now too late to initiate proceedings looking to any such suit, inasmuch as demand has to be first made on the company, and thereafter ninety days must be allowed for compliance or refusal, in accordance with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1887. Before the expiration of this period the statute would bar the right of recovery by the Government, and the benefits of anticipated favorable decisions of the courts would be lost so far as they might determine the character and disposition of grants similar to those directly involved in pending cases.

It will be readily seen that if this act of limitations is to remain on the statute books, the portion of the adjustment act referred to would be rendered nugatory. Indeed, there would be but little use in continuing the adjustment of many of the land grants, inasmuch as ascertained rights of the United States, or of settlers, could not be enforced by law.

Legislation establishing limitations against the right of the Government to sue is an innovation not entirely consistent with the general history of the rights of the Government, for it has uniformly been held that time did not bar the sovereign power from the assertion of a right.

The early adjudications of the Land Department construed the grants with a degree of liberality toward the grantees which later decisions of the courts and of the Department have not sustained. It seems clear that the further progress of adjustments will develop facts and transactions in connection with these land grants which ought to be the subjects of legal examination and scrutiny before they are allowed to become final and conclusive. The Government should not be prevented from going into the courts to right wrongs perpetrated by its agents or any other parties, and by which much of the public domain may be diverted from the people at large to corporate uses.

In these circumstances, it seems to me that the act of 1891 should be or amended as not to apply to suits brought to recover title to lands certified os patented on account of railroad or other grants. And I respectfully urge upon Congress speedy action to the end suggested, so that the adjustment of these grants may proceed without the interposition of a bar, through lapse of time, against the right of recovery by the Government in proper cases.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 17, 1896.

SCHOOLS OF MINES.

Mr. DUBOIS. I now ask for the consideration of Senate bill 790.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 790) to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota to support schools of mines.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, in section 1, line 6, after "United States," to strike out "by each of the said States"; in line 7, after the word "within," to strike out "the"; and in the same line, after the word "States," to insert "respectively"; so as to read:

That each of the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota shall annually receive 25 per cent of all moneys paid to the United States for mineral lands within said States, respectively, for the maintenance of a school of mines in each of the said States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator make some explanation of the general nature and character of the bill.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator will excuse me for a moment. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to move in section 1, lines 3, 4, and 5, to strike out "States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota," and to insert in lieu thereof "public-land States"; so as to read:

That each of the public-land States shall annually receive 25 per cent of all moneys paid to the United States, etc.

Mr. HALE. What States would that include?

Mr. DUBOIS. All the public-land States. I will say that I do that in deference to the House of Representatives. The public-land States will not secure any of this appropriation unless they have mineral lands; but some of the members of the House of Representatives wish those States included.

Mr. HALE. Is that a phrase in the nomenclature of the General Land Office which is recognized as defining and including certain States?

Mr. DUBOIS. That is the term which is used by the General Land Office in defining States which have had public lands.

Mr. HALE. So that it is well understood and is in accordance with the present practice?

Mr. DUBOIS. It is well understood and simply in accordance with their definition.

I will say, in answer to the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], that this bill has heretofore passed the Senate several times, that it has been unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Lands each time, and also has been reported at the present session. It provides that the Government shall appropriate from revenues derived from the sale of mineral lands the sum of $12,500 each year, provided that each of those States appropriates a like amount in order to support a school of mines. The money comes from the sale of the mineral lands in the mineral States, and the States put up an equal amount for the support of these schools.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the bill read as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] will first be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, after the words "States of," it is proposed to strike out "California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota," and insert "public-land States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will now be read as amended, in accordance with the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The bill as amended was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each of the public land States shall annually receive 25 per cent of all moneys paid to the United States for mineral lands within said States, respectively, for the maintenance of a school of mines in each of the said States: Provided, That said sum so to be paid shall not exceed the sum of $12,000 per annum to each State, nor shall it exceed the amount annually expended by each of the said States for said school of mines.

SEC. 2. That before any money shall be paid to each of the said States under the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that each of the said States is maintaining a school of mines within its borders, in which students in attendance are given instruction in chemistry, metallurgy, mineralogy, geology, mining, mining engineering, mathematics, mechanics, and drawing, and that the students in attendance from other States are received into said school of mines on the same terms and conditions that the students from the said State are received.

SEC. 3. That the board of trustees of each of the said schools of mines shall make a report each year to the Secretary of the Interior of the number of students in attendance at such school of mines, the State of which they are inhabitants, and the general course of studies pursued in said school, and the amount expended in the support of said school.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to aid the public-land States to support schools of mines."

JOHN FINN.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 227) to permit the withdrawal of certain papers and the signing of certain receipts by John Finn or his attorney. The bill will excite no debate, and has heretofore passed the Senate in the same form. Of course, I do not wish it to displace the regular order.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Auditor for the War Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit John Finn of St. Louis, Mo., claimant of 371 quartermaster's vouchers, aggregating $6,363.95, more or less, to sign the receipts upon the said vouchers, which said vouchers, it is alleged, were presented by the said Finn to the Quartermaster-General, and are now alleged to be in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury; and the receipts so signed shall be accepted as a sufficient compliance with the laws and rules regulating such cases: Provided, That it shall be found, upon examination, that the said vouchers were duly issued by the legally constituted authorities and came rightfully and for value into the hands of said Finn and that they have not heretofore been audited and paid: Provided further, That all original payees who do not present claims for payment on said vouchers within thirty days from the date of approval of this act shall be forever barred from presenting such claim, and said John Finn shall after said thirty days be entitled to receive the amounts found to be due thereon upon the conditions aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Auditor for the War Department to audit certain quartermaster's vouchers alleged to belong to John Finn, of St. Louis, Mo."

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERALS.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during sessions of Congress.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has heretofore been read.

Mr. PLATT. The bill has been read, but manifestly there are some amendments which ought to be made to it if it is to be passed. I wish that it may be read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will again be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to one feature in his bill. I do not know that it is open to the criticism which I am now going to make, but as the bill reads it seems to enact by public law that the body of a Senator or of a Member of the other House shall, the moment the breath leaves it, be put into the absolute care and custody and delivered over to a committee of the Senate or of the House to prepare it for burial, without any reference whatever to the wishes of the family of the deceased. In other words, if I fall in my place here, no matter how many of my family may be here, no matter what their desires may be in reference to the final disposition of my body, it is placed absolutely within the custody of a committee of the Senate or of the House.

Now, I am not very particular what becomes of my body after the final hour, but I confess that so far as I am concerned, I should prefer that my friends should have charge of my body and make preparations for the funeral rather than that it should be done of necessity, by law, by a committee of the House or of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let the first section of the bill be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read section 1 of the bill, as follows:

That whenever, during a session of the Congress of the United States, a member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall die at any place within the District of Columbia, the House of which he was a member shall appoint a special committee of its members to properly prepare and incase the body of the deceased and forward it, in charge of a sergeant-at-arms specially appointed, to the home of the deceased, and deliver it to his family, or to his relatives or friends in case he had no family.

Mr. HILL. I desire to inquire of the author of the bill what is the precise reform the bill proposes to make. Those around me suggest that it simply prevents a committee of either House of Congress from accompanying the remains to the place of burial. Is that the case? What is the precise reform which the bill will make in existing law?

Mr. PEFFER. There is no existing law, but there is a very expensive and useless custom which has grown up by long usage. The Senator from New York probably was not present some four weeks ago, when I had the honor to present to the Senate a large number of very interesting facts relating to this matter. That presentation showed, among other things, that within the last ten years the expenditures for the funeral services and obsequies alone undertaken by both Houses of Congress have averaged upward of $4,000 in each particular case.

While I do not know, and of course can not do more than approximately estimate, what the expense would be, I think the average under the bill would probably be not to exceed three or four hundred dollars at most, whereas now the average is upward of $4,000. In addition to that, the measure relieves the two bodies of Congress combined of all the gossip and talk of newspapers and others in relation to what does or does not occur during the trip from the capital to the home of the deceased member and upon the return. In other words, I think it is a very substantial reform.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator from Kansas takes his seat, will he allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. PEFFER. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I think we all see what the Senator is trying to accomplish, but I do not think that on reflection he will want to have the bill passed as it has been framed. One sees on its being read from the desk that it really does provide, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has said, that the moment the breath leaves the body of a Senator or a Representative a committee of either House shall take charge of the body. It goes upon the theory that a Senator or a Representative is a waif, an estray, and that when he dies his body is to be taken charge of at once by the House of which he was a member, which is to go through with the last sad offices and prepare the body for burial, as if there were no family.

Now, the Senator from Kansas does not want to do that. He does not want to create any law which has in it that really objectionable proceeding. I suggest that unless he can now prepare an amendment which will cover his purpose, that there shall not be large committees to go off on trips, but that there shall be limitations as to what shall be done by either House incidental to the funeral ceremonials of a Representative or a Senator, he ought to let the bill go over for a day and call it up to-morrow, in the meantime preparing something that will be unobjectionable to everybody here.

Mr. PEFFER. I think that upon a moment's reflection and consideration Senators will see that everything has been provided for except the objection made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], which can be disposed of very readily by adding, after the word "member," in line 6, if I have the right place, the words "unless otherwise requested by the family or the friends of the deceased."

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator desire in a case of this kind to put upon the family, the near representatives, the mourners of a deceased Senator or Representative, as a part of the law, the burden of requesting that the Senate or House of Representatives shall not interfere? I do not think the Senator wants to do that. Let nature take its course, and then let the Senator come in and provide for what he wants as to any incidental participation of the House of Representatives or of the Senate in the funeral ceremonial. If he will put the bill in that form nobody will object.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator from Maine will pardon me, I will state that I have been a member of this body for something over four years, and several deaths have occurred during that time. Immediately after the announcement of the death the Sergeant-at-Arms and a number of persons in his employ, without any request from the friends of the deceased anywhere, assume that it is proper, and everyone will concede that it is, to see that the remains are properly cared for; that the friends are properly notified; that all proper things are done. Then in addition to that—and it is this addition which I wish to avoid—the presiding officer of the Senate and the presiding officer of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of resolutions offered to that effect, appoint a committee of five or seven members of this body and a number of members of the other body, forming together a joint committee, to accompany the remains of the deceased to his late home. It is all of this expense, which occurs after the preliminary work of taking care of the body has been done, that I desire to avoid by the bill now pending.

In case none of the friends of a deceased member is present to look after the proper care of the body, it seems to me it is the duty of this body or of the other body, of whichever the deceased person happened to have been a member, to take some appropriate action in the premises. My home is between 1,200 and 1,300 miles from the capital. The home of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is not so far. The homes of the Senators from California are much farther, as are those of the Senators from the Dakotas. I think the average distance of the homes of Senators from the capital is not less than a thousand miles.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me?

Mr. PEFFER. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the Senator's attention to an omission in the bill and to ask him whether or not it is intentional. It is also customary with the two Houses of Congress to spend large sums at the funerals of deceased members of the Supreme Court. Does the Senator desire that custom to continue or does he desire to include it in his bill?

Mr. PEFFER. The bill merely applies to members of the Senate and the other House.

Mr. GEORGE. It relates only to those?

Mr. PEFFER. Only to those.

I think the objection made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] can be obviated by the amendment which I suggested a moment ago. After the word "member," in line 6—I do not care about having the amendment stated until Senators have thought about it—I suggest that we insert "unless otherwise requested by the family or the friends of the deceased"; so that it would read:

That whenever, during a session of the Congress of the United States, a member of the Senate or House of Representatives shall die at any place within the District of Columbia, the House of which he was a member, unless otherwise requested by the family or the friends of the deceased, shall appoint special committee, etc.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that at present there exists no law whatever authorizing these expenditures. They are always made by authority of a resolution of the Senate or of the other House, from whichever body the member dies, and they are paid out of the contingent funds of the respective Houses. The matter is absolutely within the control of each body.

With respect to the average expense within the last ten years, to which the Senator from Kansas has referred, I will state that I think the average is enlarged very considerably by the expense of the funeral of a Senator from California, which came within that period and which caused a very large expenditure.

I am satisfied that it is better to determine this question, if we are to determine it by the action of the two bodies, by a concurrent resolution of instruction in reference to the subject to the officers having charge of such funerals. As well stated by the Senator from Kansas, the amount of expenditure on account of funeral services in the city of Washington is very limited, and could not in any way be regarded as extravagant or beyond what Congress should spend. The other expenditures result from the method of transportation of the body to the place of burial and the transportation thereto and return of the Congressional committee. That can be limited and controlled by either House at any time upon the death of a Senator or a Representative, or it can be controlled by a concurrent resolution passed by the two bodies. But I do not think we ought to put this in the form of a statute of the country. I suggest that the plan I have outlined would be a more feasible way of reaching the question, and framed in such way it would give instructions to the officers of this body and the other House as to the expenditures which would limit them to an economical sum for that purpose.

I do not like another portion of the bill, I am frank to say, and that is in reference to not permitting a committee of the Senate, for example, where a member of the Senate departs this life, to accompany his remains to the place of interment. I think that is a courtesy, a respect and an honor due to a deceased member which ought to be carried out by this body. I know of no organization in the United States, I care not what it may be, in which that custom is not observed. I do not think it is well for the Senate or for Congress to set an example to all the organizations of the country by prohibiting a reasonable, economical expenditure on account of railroad fare of a committee from Washington to the home of the deceased, if he is to be buried there. For that reason I should object very seriously to that portion of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, my first feeling on reading the bill was that it was a very cold and cruel measure. I do not see what title a committee of the House of Representatives should have to the body of any one of our brother Senators who may die within the District of Columbia. The bill provides that the committee shall immediately take possession of the remains, and, as the object is economy, get as cheap a coffin as it can bargain for, I suppose—perhaps what they call in the army a pine overcoat—and deliver it at the home of the lately deceased member.

I do not at all like the reading of the bill. I dislike the extravagance aimed at, but I think the evil could be cured by two lines in an appropriation bill, when we come to the paragraph that gives the contingent expense fund to the Senate, by providing that no expense shall be incurred in the case of the funeral of a Senator without the previous approval of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. I am sure they would reasonably govern the whole matter. I shall vote to postpone the bill, or to take any other courteous action on it, but I can not vote for it.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Kansas will not press the consideration of the pending bill. There are a great many Senators and Members of the House, elected here to represent the people, who have very limited means and who are very poor. That when one dies the expense of sending his body to his home shall be paid by the legislative body of which he was a member is eminently proper. There can be no reason why a legislative body should not see that at least the mileage which would be paid for sending the body to his home is paid. The verdict and judgment of the people who have honored him by sending him to a place of public trust and importance should be treated with some consideration. We lower the standard of public duty and of public men when we confine them to the narrowest and closest and plainest economy. The people have admiration and honor for a government whose representatives, elected by the people, are surrounded by some degree of public respect and public attention. Therefore, in my judgment, the money is not thrown away when expended in this manner.

As was said by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], it is the province of the Senate and of the House to provide for the expense and to determine the manner in which it shall be done, and I do not think it is competent for the two Houses of Congress and the President of the United States to limit the method of procedure which is inherent in the two Houses, and in them alone, in their separate organization.

In my opinion, therefore, if any change shall be made it is the duty of the Senate as a distinct legislative body to provide the manner in which its dead members shall be transported and the respect that shall be paid to them. This has been the custom, and if there be objection to any expense it is competent for the Senator from Kansas or any other Senator to provide by a resolution of the Senate the manner in which the ceremonies shall be conducted.

But if the consideration of this bill is to be pressed, I shall propose an amendment that the wishes of the family shall be consulted, and that if they so prefer, the expense of the funeral service and the transportation shall be paid to them, leaving to the Senate and the other House to say what degree of respect and what degree of expense shall be incurred.

I hope the bill will not pass.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, just a word or two more. I see there is some objection on the part of Senators to the enactment of a law authorizing or directing the expenditure of money upon these funeral occasions. It is the use that has been made of money on such occasions that I am trying to avoid. If Senators are really in sympathy with the objects and purposes of this bill (and I think they are, because I have talked with a number of them individually, and all of them seem to think that something ought to be done), I hope that they will suggest something. I would have no sort of objection to striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the few words mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut a few moments ago providing that hereafter there shall be no money expended upon the occasion of the death of any member of either of the Houses of Congress, or something of that kind.

Mr. HAWLEY. No——

Mr. PEFFER. My object is to get rid of these expenditures, and yet, at the same time, if the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I appreciate very well, as all other Senators do, that there is a propriety in taking some notice of the decease of members of either branch of Congress. In any other great body, no matter where it is or under what circumstances, where a member dies, some attention ought to be paid on the occasion. I am trying to get some appropriate action taken that will not be expensive, where the people of the country have to pay the expense.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator allow me? If he referred to me he was mistaken in his reference.

Mr. PEFFER. I thought the Senator spoke about the propriety of such a provision.

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not advocate the entire prohibition of any expenditure. I suggested merely, by way of illustration, that to the clause in the appropriation act setting aside money for contingent expenses there should be added a provision that no obligation shall be incurred in conducting the funerals of Senators except after the previous approval of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I think that would prevent these very extravagant things and answer every purpose in the world.

Mr. PEFFER. Now, continuing my line of remarks, unless some action of this character is taken, when the first instance arises in this body or in the other House the usual course will be pursued, and it will go along; the next will be treated in the same way, and the next one. Every dollar of these expenses comes out of the public Treasury. If it were the rule that Senators and members of the other House who are personal friends of the deceased should as individuals have charge of the funeral obsequies and bear all the expenses personally, there would be no need of anything of this kind, but as it is now it is constantly growing to be more and more extravagant, and there are more and more useless ceremonies, and the people of the country have to foot the bills.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to the fact that I have received a very large number (I do not know how many, for I have not kept account) of newspaper comments, not only the comments of gossiping reporters, but solid, deliberate, temperate discussions from editorial pens in all sections of the country. I have one here from the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, a paper with whose history every Senator is familiar. It is a long argument in which the subject is discussed.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me a moment?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. The Senator from West Virginia expressed the idea that he thought it would be appropriate that a committee of each House should accompany the remains of a Representative or Senator. The Senator from Kansas has been investigating this subject. I desire to ask him whether in his investigation he has ascertained what is the custom in the Parliament of Great Britain? What is the custom in other legislative bodies of the world? What is the custom of the legislatures of the respective States of the Union? Can the Senator inform me?

Mr. PEFFER. I will say to the Senator from New York that I have not gone to the extent of investigating the practice of other nations, nor do I know anything about the custom of the States separately. All I do know is with respect to my own State, and I have never heard of an instance of that kind there. Indeed, I do not know that I have ever heard of an instance in any of the State legislatures, when a member of either branch died during a session, where the State was charged with his funeral expenses beyond a certain very small matter of preparing the body and having it sent in charge of a committee or something of that kind to the home of the deceased, and that is what I want to get at here.

Mr. HILL. As I understand this bill it does not affect judges of the Supreme Court, it does not affect any Cabinet official.

Mr. PEFFER. No, no.

Mr. HILL. It would not affect either the President or the Vice-President of the United States?

Mr. PEFFER. No; only a Senator or Representative. It is particularly expressed.

Mr. HILL. Are not the reforms as necessary in regard to other funerals as those which will pertain to Senators and Representatives?

Mr. PEFFER. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. HILL. I ask if the reforms are not as necessary and desirable in regard to funerals of those other officials as in regard to Senators and Representatives? In other words, would it still be left to the discretion of Congress as to what should be done upon the occasion of the death of a justice of the Supreme Court, the death of a President, or the other high officials of the Government, or the General of the Army of the United States? Does the Senator think it would be inappropriate to appoint a committee of the civil branch of the Government to accompany the remains of the Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States?

Mr. PEFFER. I do not.

Mr. HILL. At the public expense?

Mr. PEFFER. I do not.

Mr. HILL. Then he draws the line simply on Senators and Representatives.

Mr. PEFFER. That is not the proper way to mark the line that I have drawn.

Mr. HILL. I ask the question for information merely.

Mr. PEFFER. That is not the way to put it exactly. The General of the Army is only one man, and a Senator of the United States is only one man, but he is a member of a body that now consists of 87 and will soon consist of 90 members. It has grown up to be a custom that without distinction as to men these proceedings are to be had. Custom has the force of law in these cases. The General of the Army is one case in a hundred thousand. He is at the head of an army of 25,000 men. He represents the military arm of a mighty people. In his case, and especially if he were a man like Grant, or Sherman, or Sheridan, or Schofield, the people would unanimously expect some proper demonstration on the part of the Congress of the United States. It has always been that way, and there would be no objection in the case of great Senators. We can go back through the departed past and our memory will drop here and there upon one great character that was national and rose up above the average public man.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas will suspend while the Senate receives a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ARANSAS PASS IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask my friend from Kansas if he will not yield to me to ask unanimous consent to call up and pass the little measure that has just come from the other House. We want to relieve the company. The law expires day after to-morrow and the bill must be passed within the next few days. It will take but a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. PEFFER. I will yield for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which the Aransas Pass Harbor Company was required, by an act entitled "An act to amend an act of Congress, approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass," to obtain the navigable depth of 20 feet over the outer bar therein mentioned is hereby extended until January 22, 1899.

Mr. MILLS. The bill is simply for the completion of the work. I will state that the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who is chairman of the Committee on Commerce, is familiar with the bill, and finds no objection to it at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether the War Department, conducting the work, desires to have this extension given to the company?

Mr. MILLS. I so understand. I do not know personally.

Mr. FRYE. The War Department has nothing to do with the work.

Mr. CHANDLER. Who conducts it?

Mr. FRYE. It is the work of a private corporation.

Mr. VEST. It is a special contract.

Mr. FRYE. A special contract.

Mr. CHANDLER. What I desire to know is whether the executive officers of the Government, whoever may be supervising the work of this company, think this extension ought to be allowed.

Mr. FRYE. They have nothing to do with it. Authority was given by Congress to a corporation to improve the Aransas Pass, and a certain length of time was allowed by the law enacted by Congress in which the work should be completed. They have not been able to complete it within that time, and therefore they come in and ask that the time may be extended. The matter was before the committee two years ago, and there was an extension of a year given at that time. I see myself not the slightest objection to further extending it to 1899.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Maine further inform me whether it is a question of any payment of money to this company?

Mr. FRYE. It is not. The Government has nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is simply a permission to this company, at their own expense, to improve the pass?

Mr. FRYE. That is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL FUNERALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 236) to provide for proper disposition of the remains of deceased members of the Senate and House of Representatives who die at the capital during sessions of Congress.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PEFFER. For the purpose of this bill?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes, sir; on this bill.

Mr. PEFFER. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I rose to make a suggestion to the Senator from Kansas. It does not seem that there is any prospect of reaching a vote this evening. There is some executive business to be transacted. It is getting rather late. Will the Senator yield to me that I may move an executive session?

Mr. PEFFER. I think it is likely that we shall have this matter disposed of inside of fifteen minutes. I do not think it will be long.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well; we will try it.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, before leaving the subject, I think it is due to the friends of the bill and to the subject-matter of it as well that I should place on record a few of the criticisms made by the newspaper press. Here is one from the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. The reading clerk is a better reader than I am, and if he is not too tired he will oblige me by reading it. I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

PEFFER ON FUNERAL JUNKETS.

Senator PEFFER exercised self-restraint in his attack on the Congressional funeral abuse in the Senate the other day. The most that he did was to prove that these affairs are recklessly and extravagantly managed, and that everybody who has a chance to get in a big bill for any sort of services rendered does so and gets what is asked for. Congressional coffins cost considerably more than those in which ordinary corpses are buried, and so with carriages, flowers, clerical services, and all the incidentals of the funeral. A Congressional funeral seems to be regarded as a grand plucking time by everybody who can find a pretext for grabbing some of the public money. It cost $21,000 for a Senatorial committee to bury the body of Senator Hearst in California, and while this funeral was probably the worst junket of the sort for years, there is plenty of evidence that it differed only in degree from the usual expression of respect and regard paid to a dead member of Congress by his bereaved colleagues.

The custom is for the public Treasury to pay for everything connected with Congressional funerals—casket, undertaker's services, carriages, flowers, grave digging, and so down to the last detail, including the fees of musicians and clergymen at the funeral services. In addition the expenses of a committee of the Senate or House, with such invited guests as the members of the committee may take with them, the Sergeant-at-Arms and his assistants, and often of relations and friends of the deceased, are also paid, to say nothing of refreshments of various sorts which the contingent fund of one body or the other supplies. PEFFER does not say very much about this item of refreshments, nor does he emphasize the junketing features of these funeral parties, but he hints plainly at them, and they appear in the itemized account he gives of the expenses of the Plumb funeral at Emporia, Kans., and of two or three others. There were at least 21 persons whose expenses were paid to the Plumb funeral, and probably more, and it cost between $350 and $400 for food and commissary supplies for them en route, not including hotel bills at Emporia and St. Louis. As several members of the committee returned to Washington by themselves, most of these supplies must have been consumed on the outward trip. The bill of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which carried the party from Washington to Emporia, was $153 for "commissary supplies en route," while the remainder of the $350 was expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms. PEFFER says that the Plumb funeral was as economically managed as was possible, and if this is the case his figures throw considerable light on the probable cost of "commissary supplies" on less carefully watched junkets.

Senator Kenna, of West Virginia, whose home was only 300 miles from Washington, was buried a couple of years ago at a cost to the country of over $3,000, of which $432 went for "commissary supplies, meals and lunches furnished in cars." There is another item of more than $100 for meals and hotel bills in the account of the Sergeant-at-Arms. This Kenna funeral seems to have been a wholesale picnic, for the country paid for the use of three Pullman cars and a combination car, and, first and last, of eighty-five carriages. It cost $1,800 to bury the body of Representative Houk at Dayton, Ohio, and $2,350 to go to Michigan with the remains of Representative Chipman, and the commissary plays a prominent part among the items in both these accounts. It is not much of a Senatorial funeral that does not cost $3,000 or more nowadays, while the outlay in burying Representatives average a little more than half that amount.

The charge of gross junketing in connection with these funerals is thus established, and is in itself sufficient argument for the passage of the bill which PEFFER has introduced and had placed on the Senate Calendar. His bill provides for the showing of proper respect and regard to deceased members of either House, including the appointment of committees to arrange for the preparation of the body for burial and for services over it at Washington, but it forbids the sending of committees to the home of the deceased, leaving the transportation of the body to the Sergeant-at-Arms. PEFFER is right in regarding this as the proper extent to which expressions of Congressional respect for deceased colleagues should go, but there is not the slightest probability that either House will abandon these chances for junkets at public expense, any more than that the Senators will give up their bay rum, apollinaris, brandy, expensive pocketbooks, penknives, and other luxuries to which they treat themselves frequently at the expense of the public Treasury.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, if there is any more of that sort of matter let us bury that at any rate. [Laughter.] The man who wrote that article, especially the last part of it, is wholly ignorant of the way matters are conducted here, wholly ignorant of this matter of stationery and all that sort of thing. The fact is that my neighbor of the Springfield Republican talks sometimes as if he would be glad to bury the whole of us alive at his own expense. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAULKNER. I think there is a general sentiment in the Senate, so far as I have observed, looking to retrenchment in expenditures here in the matters referred to, and especially on the question of transportation, which is really the expensive item in all Congressional funerals. I submit a motion, which I believe the Senator from Kansas will not object to, which will carry out to a great extent his views in this matter. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report an amendment to the rules to regulate and control the expenditure of public funds in the burial of a Senator, thereby making it a rule of the Senate. This matter will come up for discussion when the Committee on Rules make their report.

Mr. PLATT. Before that motion is acted upon, I should like to suggest an amendment to the bill, to strike out all after the word "committee," in line 7 of section 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

To confer with the family or friends of the deceased and take such order, consistent with their wishes, as may be required for forwarding his remains, in charge of a sergeant-at-arms specially appointed, to the home of the deceased and the delivery thereof to his family or friends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER].

The motion was agreed to.

PORT OF ENTRY OF NEW ORLEANS.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans so as to include that portion of the parish of Jefferson on the west bank of the Mississippi River lying between the upper line of the parish of Orleans, west bank, the west bank of the river to a point opposite the upper boundary line of the parish of Orleans, east bank, a line drawn thence back 4,000 feet, perpendicular to the river, and a line drawn thence parallel to the Mississippi River until it intersects the upper parish boundary line, west bank; and so as further to include that portion of the parish of St. Bernard lying between the lower boundary line of the parish of Orleans, east bank, the east bank of the Mississippi River to a point 3 miles below the lower boundary, a line drawn thence back 4,000 feet parallel to the lower boundary line, and a line drawn thence parallel to the Mississippi River, until it intersects the lower boundary line of the parish of Orleans.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to insert, as section 2, the following:

SEC. 2. That section 1 of said act be so amended as to make the City of Fort Smith the terminus of said road on the western border of the State of Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SILVER COIN AND COIN REDEMPTION.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to offer an amendment to the first section of the silver bill, so called, which I ask to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1 it is proposed to add:

Provided, however, That this section shall apply to the coinage of the silver mined in the United States of America only.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie over.

Mr. BAKER. I give notice that I shall ask leave to submit some remarks upon the subject to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will then recognize the Senator for that purpose.

NEWBERRY COLLEGE.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 271) for the relief of the Newberry College, Newberry, S. C., which was unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to say to the Senator from South Carolina that it will be impossible for him to have that bill debated and passed this afternoon.

Mr. TILLMAN. I had hoped the bill would go through without any debate, as it passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say to the Senator that I have letters with reference to this claim, which make it necessary for me to object to it until I have examined those letters. After I have done so, I shall cooperate with the Senator in getting the bill before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course, if the Senator objects to the consideration of the bill, I do not want to precipitate any debate this evening.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do object; but I want to state to the Senator from South Carolina why I do so. If he calls the bill up at some other time I shall be ready to speak upon it, if I conclude to speak upon it at all.

Mr. PASCO. I wish to say to the Senator from New Hampshire before he enters his objection that I hope he will not urge it. The bill was called up during the last Congress by the then Senator from South Carolina, Mr. Butler, who preceded the present Senator, was discussed here for some time, and finally passed by the unanimous vote of the Senate. It was then recommended by the unanimous vote of the Committee on Claims, and it has received a like indorsement during the present session. I should be very glad if the Senator from New Hampshire would take that into consideration before he insists upon his objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall be obliged to make the statements which have come to me in reference to this claim if the bill is taken up for action at the present time. It is possible that when I examine the papers and confer with the Senator from Florida I may not object to the passage of the bill. I shall do so if it is taken up to-day. While I wish to extend every courtesy to the Senator from South Carolina, I must object to its consideration at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the bill will be passed over.

CRIPPLE CREEK DISTRICT, COLORADO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print 5,000 copies, in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled "Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado"; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 21, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS OF 1893.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of three brief reports from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the report which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the accompanying House concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 for the use of the Post-Office Department, have considered the same and recommend that it do pass.

The Public Printer estimates that the cost of printing and binding will be $1,800.

In support of the recommendation the committee submits the following letter from the Postmaster-General:

OFFICE OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to request that you will kindly cause a concurrent resolution to be introduced in the House for the printing of 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 from the plates now in the Government Printing Office. The entire edition of this publication was exhausted early in the year 1895. In that fiscal year the Department procured 1,000 additional copies and at the beginning of the fiscal year 1896 another 1,000 copies, all of which have been distributed.

Under the provisions of section 89 of the act of January 12, 1895, the Department can not procure an additional supply until the beginning of the fiscal year 1897, at which time only 1,000 more may be procured.

It is presumed that it was not the intention of the Congress to restrict the Department in procuring an adequate supply with which to meet the demands of the service of so necessary a publication as the Postal Laws and Regulations, and I trust you will urge the adoption of the proper legislation.

Very respectfully,

WM. L. WILSON,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. GEORGE D. PERKINS,
Chairman Committee on Printing,
House of Representatives.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The resolution will be reported to the House first.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 for the use of the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER. The question is on granting unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that I did not hear the reading of the report, and I would like the gentleman to make some explanation why he asks unanimous consent for the passage of this resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. The resolution, Mr. Speaker, provides for the printing of 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations, the edition having been exhausted; and the Postmaster-General, in that letter which has been read as a part of the report, makes the best explanation that the committee is able to present.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I would like to ask the gentleman, before unanimous consent is given, what is the estimated cost?

Mr. PERKINS. Eighteen hundred dollars.

Mr. CANNON. Why should this item of deficiency be referred to the Committee on Printing rather than to take the usual course along with the other deficiencies for the public service for the remainder of this fiscal year? In other words, why should we have practically the carrying of deficiencies for the remainder of the fiscal year divided up rather than kept track of along with other deficiency appropriations?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the law provides for the printing of so many copies of these reports annually.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. PERKINS. That the number has been exhausted, and the Postmaster-General asks the authority of Congress to print an additional number.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is this a unanimous report from the Committee on Printing?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, if I understand it, the Postmaster-General, instead of submitting his deficiency estimate through the Secretary of the Treasury, along with other deficiencies for the fiscal year, proposes, without reference to the rules of the House, to have this appropriation made in the shape of a first, second, or third urgent deficiency.

Mr. PERKINS. Why, then, can not every request for printing here be accounted a deficiency?

Mr. CANNON. Ah! The printing touching the House and its business is a matter that goes to the Committee on Printing, and touching the propriety of the authorization of printing, etc.; but this is where printing is authorized, and the law calls for so much printing. It does not need any enactment; it does not need authorization of the Committee on Printing; but it should go to the Committee on Appropriations, in charge of the urgent deficiency bill. It seems to me that the best way is to allow the estimate to come in the formal way.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand the objection of the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to say, in addition to what has been so well said by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that the subcommittee in charge of the legislative appropriation bill in the last Congress considered this question, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will remember, and gave exactly the amount of the Postmaster-General's estimate for this service.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the two gentlemen, members of the Committee on Appropriations, do not exactly understand this resolution. This is simply a resolution to print additional copies of a document.

Mr. CANNON. Wherein does it differ from a resolution to provide for carrying on the Government Printing Office?

Mr. RICHARDSON. This resolution simply provides for printing additional copies of a document out of money already appropriated. It is not a self-appropriating resolution. It simply proposes to use money already appropriated for printing—to print additional copies of a document, and it is in the exact form that has been followed always heretofore when we have provided for printing additional copies of documents.

Mr. SAYERS. If the money which is covered by this resolution is used for this purpose it may cause a deficiency in the annual appropriation for the Public Printing Office. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this resolution ought to have gone in the first place to the Committee on Appropriations, because that committee has exclusive jurisdiction of appropriations, and that jurisdiction has been uniformly recognized by the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If my friend will permit me, this resolution makes no appropriation. As I have already said, it is in the same form as every resolution for printing for the last ten years, to my knowledge. I have been a member of the Printing Committee for nine years, and during that time every resolution to print additional copies of a document has been in the exact language of this one. I repeat, this does not make any appropriation; it simply uses money which has been already appropriated for public printing, but the Public Printer will not use that money for this purpose until there is a concurrent resolution directing him to print these additional copies.

Mr. SAYERS. But this resolution ought first to have gone to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If this resolution should have gone to that committee, then every resolution providing for the printing of additional copies of a document ought to have gone there; but no such resolution ever did go there, to my knowledge.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the documents to which this resolution refers are for the use of the Post-Office Department. Now, the resolutions to which the gentleman refers as heretofore reported from the Committee on Printing for the printing of additional copies have generally been for documents for the use of members of the Senate and of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not at all. My friend is mistaken in that. The Post-Office Department has no power to do this printing. The law expressly limits them to 1,000 copies, and now they want additional copies of this document.

Mr. CANNON. The correctness of the position of the gentleman from Tennessee is to be tested and determined by the powers of his committee under the rules of the House. If this be a matter of privilege reported from the Committee on Printing an objection will have no effect.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I concede that this is not privileged.

Mr. CANNON. Therefore the gentleman comes here and asks unanimous consent. Now, that request would come with just as much force, so far as the rules of the House are concerned, from any other gentleman who should rise in his place and ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution. It seems to me that the test of the jurisdiction of the gentleman's committee in this matter lies in its privilege.

Mr. RICHARDSON. If that be so no resolution could be reported from the Committee on Printing unless it were privileged. That position certainly can not be maintained for a moment. The rule says that the Committee on Printing is privileged to report resolutions for printing where the printing is to be provided for the House or for the two Houses of Congress, but if they add to that printing for the House or the two Houses a provision for the reprinting of documents for any of the Departments or bureaus, it has been held that that addition takes away the privileged character of the resolution. It will not do, however, to say that the Committee on Printing has not jurisdiction of such a resolution because it was not privileged, as the gentleman from Illinois seems to contend.

Mr. CANNON. So far as I am concerned, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] makes his report and seemingly, and I have no doubt actually, reports a condition of affairs that calls for this printing. Having called attention to the matter, I shall not make objection in this instance, but I want to say, in all courtesy and kindness, that it seems to me that the best way is to keep the deficiencies for the public service together, and in the future, in case I have the power, I shall insist upon the strict observance of the rule.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's premises are right, but I confess that I do not see how they affect this resolution. This resolution simply provides for printing additional copies of a document the supply of which has been exhausted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection; and the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

PUBLIC LANDS AND THEIR WATER SUPPLY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the second resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, under the direction of the Department of the Interior, 6,000 copies of a paper contained in the Sixteenth Annual Report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, entitled "The public lands and their water supply," together with the accompanying maps and illustrations; of which number 1,500 copies shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the Geological Survey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the chairman of the committee make some explanation as to the necessity for the adoption of this resolution.

This resolution, as I understand, requires 6,000 copies of some report to be printed. I have not been able to catch the reading of the resolution, and I should like to have the chairman of the committee explain the necessity for its adoption.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, this resolution, which comes from the Senate, proposes to print a part of the report which the resolution describes. It has been represented to our committee by the Director of the Geological Survey and by others interested in the matter that there is a great demand for this portion of the report for circulation among the people. Prompted by the suggestions made to it, the committee has secured from the Public Printer an estimate of the cost of the proposed printing, and on due consideration has recommended the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. What is the important part of the report which the gentleman refers to?

Mr. PERKINS. It is set forth in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again read the resolution for the information of the House. The Chair hopes that quiet may be preserved so that the Clerk may be heard.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. SAYERS. To cut this matter short, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

GEOLOGY, ETC., OF CRIPPLE CREEK DISTRICT, COLORADO.

Mr. PERKINS. I have another resolution from the Committee on Printing which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the earliest day practicable 5,000 copies in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled, "Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado," constituting pages 1 to 209 of Part II of the Sixteenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, with the accompanying illustrations, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for distribution by the Geological Survey.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have the report read, the right to object being reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report, if there be no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the accompanying Senate concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 5,000 copies in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled, "Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado," constituting pages 1 to 209 of Part II of the Sixteenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, with accompanying illustrations, have had the same under consideration, and recommend its passage with the following amendment:

Strike out "2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives" and insert: "1,500 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of the House of Representatives;" so that it will read:

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the earliest day practicable, 5,000 copies in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled 'Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado,' constituting pages 1 to 209, of Part II of the Sixteenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, with the accompanying illustrations, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for distribution by the Geological Survey."

The Public Printer estimates the cost at $1,260.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. MILES. I object.

Subsequently,

Mr. MILES said: I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the resolution last reported from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PERKINS. As the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES] has withdrawn his objection, I would like to have the question on that resolution resubmitted. If an opportunity can be given, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] would like to make a brief explanation.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MILES. It was because I did not understand the purport of the resolution as read that I made the objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that if gentlemen will resume their seats and cease conversation there may be an opportunity for gentlemen making explanations to be heard.

Mr. MILES. I think the House ought to have the benefit of an explanation on this subject; and the gentleman to whom I stated that I would withdraw my objection informed me that he would make such an explanation to the House.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the present consideration of this resolution arises from the fact that the annual report of the Geological Survey is now being printed. The part relating to Cripple Creek constitutes one part of the report. The surveys have been made, and the Government has gone to the expense of having the plates prepared and everything ready for printing the extra copies of the report. By authorizing the printing of it at this time it will save a large amount of money by using the plates and type that are now set up.

This report relating to the Cripple Creek mining region is one that is in great demand, not only from the State of Colorado, but from all parts of the Union. The recent gold discoveries made there are attracting a great deal of attention, and demands, to me, at least, come in from all parts of the Union for copies of this report. The Government, as I have already said, has gone to an enormous expense in making the surveys. These surveys are now in the annual report, the plates are all prepared, and all that is asked at this time is to permit the additional number of copies to be printed while the work is being done on the annual report.

Mr. SAYERS. What is the amount of the cost?

Mr. SHAFROTH. One thousand two hundred and sixty dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAYERS. I shall not object, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of this resolution. But I wish to say to the gentleman from Colorado and to the House that I shall hereafter object to all resolutions of this character which look to the use of the general appropriation for the support of the Printing Office. For the first time in a great many years no deficiency has been asked for by the Public Printer for the current year, and for one I do not like to see that fund (appropriated by the last Congress) exhausted by using it in this manner under special resolutions.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if it is not also true that while there is no deficiency, the Public Printer has actually turned back $150,000—covered it back into the Treasury, as funds not used?

Mr. SAYERS. I suppose so. I do not know the fact, but suppose it to be true.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, the amendment recommended by the Committee on Printing was adopted, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PAYNE. The bill (H. R. 2705) constituting Green Bay, in Wisconsin, a port of delivery, was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee has directed me to report it back and to ask its reference to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which, according to the practice of the House, bills of this character have uniformly been referred.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the reference will be changed.

IMPROVEMENT OF ARANSAS PASS.

Mr. CRAIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass. This bill has been presented as a substitute for House bill No. 3548, which should be laid on the table if this substitute be passed.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time within which the Aransas Pass Harbor Company was required, by an act entitled "An act to amend an act of Congress, approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass," to obtain the navigable depth of 20 feet over the outer bar therein mentioned is hereby extended until January 22, 1899.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. CANNON. I wish to put a question to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN]. If I understand this matter aright, there is a company now engaged in improving Aransas Pass.

Mr. CRAIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. What is the necessity for the passage of this bill?

Mr. CRAIN. Its passage is made necessary by reason of the fact that on the 22d day of this month the time heretofore fixed by law for the completion of the work by this company will have elapsed. The company has been working in good faith, but owing to unforeseen obstacles has been unable to comply with the provisions of the original act. That company has expended over $150,000, and has abundant means to go on with the work. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which the original bill was referred, have unanimously recommended the adoption of the substitute which has just been read.

Mr. CANNON. My understanding is that a private company is doing this work with its own funds, and that neither by the original bill nor by the bill now proposed to be passed is the Government in any way committed to any expense in connection with the construction or maintenance of this work.

Mr. CRAIN. Not to the extent of one dollar.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRAIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Pacific Railroads to ask that that committee shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING, BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill.

Whereas a clause in the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., 395) relating to public buildings, provides: "No change in said plan involving an increase of expense exceeding 10 per cent of the amount to which said building was limited shall be allowed or paid by any officer of the Government without the special authority of Congress;" and

Whereas during the last recess of Congress the contract for the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill., was let for an amount less than the estimated cost, and it became advisable for the Secretary of the Treasury to so modify the drawings and specifications for said building as to provide fireproof construction and improved design: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct and complete the above-named building as may be shown and called for by modified drawings and specifications: Provided, That the present appropriation for said building and its site shall not be exceeded.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand from the reading of this resolution that it is not proposed to exceed the limit of cost?

Mr. WARNER. Not to exceed the appropriation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WARNER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SCOTTISH RITE MASONRY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Thomas Hubbard Caswell, of the city of San Francisco, State of California; Odell Squier Long, of the city of Charleston, State of West Virginia; Erasmus Theodore Carr, of Miles City, State of Montana; Frederick Webber, of the city of Washington, D. C.; Gilmor Meredith, of the city of Baltimore, State of Maryland, and Samuel Emery Adams, of the city of Minneapolis, State of Minnesota, officers and members of the supreme council mentioned in the caption hereof, and their successors, be, and they are hereby, incorporated and made a body politic and corporate in the District of Columbia by the name of "The Supreme Council (Mother Council of the World) of the Inspectors General Knights Commanders of the House of the Temple of Solomon of the Thirty-third Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Free Masonry of the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America"; and by that name it may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded in any court of law or equity, and may have and use a common seal and change the same at pleasure, and be entitled to use and exercise all the powers, rights, and privileges incidental to fraternal and benevolent corporations within the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the said corporation shall have the power to take and hold real and personal estate, which shall not be divided among the members of the corporation, but shall descend to their successors for the promotion of the fraternal and benevolent purposes of said corporation.

SEC. 3. That all claims, accounts, debts, things in action, or other matters of business of whatever nature now existing for or against the present supreme council mentioned in section 1 of this act shall survive and succeed to and against the body corporate and politic hereby created: Provided, That nothing contained herein shall be construed to extend the operation of any law which provides for the extinguishing of claims or contracts by limitations of time.

SEC. 4. That said corporation shall have a constitution and statutes, and shall have power to amend the same at pleasure: Provided, That such constitution and statutes or amendments thereof do not conflict with the laws of the United States or of any State.

SEC. 5. That said corporation shall not engage in any business for gain, the purposes of said corporation being fraternal and benevolent.

The following amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary were read:

In lines 10 and 11 of the bill strike out the words "mentioned in the caption hereof," and insert in lieu thereof the words "of the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States."

Strike out section 2 of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following as section 2:

"That the said corporation shall have the power to take and hold personal estate and such real estate as shall be necessary and proper for the promotion of the fraternal and benevolent purposes of said corporation, which shall not be divided among the members of the corporation, but shall descend to their successors for the promotion of the objects aforesaid."

In section 4, line 2, after the word "statutes," insert the words "or by-laws," and in line 3 of same section, after the word "statutes," insert the same words, "or by-laws."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee why he applies to Congress for incorporation?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no other way by which this Masonic order can be chartered in the District of Columbia. They own some property here and have a valuable free library.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Does it only apply to the District of Columbia?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not like to appear overcritical, but this bill uses the word "statutes," meaning by-laws. I believe I am safe in saying that never before in any law or statute of Congress has the word "statute" been applied to anything except an enactment of Congress or of some State legislature, and I should like to have that word stricken out and some such word as "regulations" substituted. I desire to say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] that I perfectly understand that this order designates its by-laws as statutes, but he will understand that if this law should call them "by-laws" or "regulations," then in any court in which they might become a matter of controversy the court would construe the words "by-laws" or "regulations" to cover what the order calls "statutes."

Mr. RICHARDSON. I defer entirely to my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] in that matter. The only reason why I used the word "statutes" in drawing the charter was that from time immemorial that order has used the word "statutes" as applicable to its regulations or by-laws; but I agree with the gentleman fully that if the word "regulations" is used instead of "statutes" it will answer the purpose, and I will accept his suggestion.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Ought not this bill to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has been considered by the Judiciary Committee, and this is their unanimous report, submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], and I will state, moreover, Mr. Speaker, that a similar charter was passed in the last Congress for the benefit of the Knights of Pythias.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I did not know that the bill had been considered by the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It has. This order is purely benevolent and charitable, and the object of this bill is to enable them to own and have title to their property here and to carry on their library and other similar purposes.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Does this bill confine it to the District of Columbia, or does it simply confer all the powers, rights, and privileges incidental to fraternal and benevolent corporations in the District?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will read the language. After naming the gentlemen and giving the title, it says:

Be, and they are hereby, incorporated and made a body politic and corporate in the District of Columbia by the name of "The Supreme Council (Mother Council of the World) of the Inspectors General Knights Commanders of the House of the Temple of Solomon of the Thirty-third Degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Free Masonry of the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States of America."

Then at the conclusion of the paragraph are the words which the gentleman has quoted:

And be entitled to use and exercise all the powers, rights, and privileges incidental to fraternal and benevolent corporations within the District of Columbia.

It is limited particularly to the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDERSON. Has the gentleman reported the amendments recommended by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Clerk reported the amendments, and they are embraced in the report. I shall ask that they be adopted. In addition to that, I will further ask to substitute the word "regulations" in two places where the word "statutes" occurs in the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON. In the bill passed for the benefit of the Knights of Pythias the word "statutes" was not used.

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, because they do not so denominate their regulations or by-laws, while in this order they denominate them statutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it essential to use the term "statutes"?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is not. The word "regulations" will answer every purpose. I ask first for the adoption of the amendment which I have suggested.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent to amend by substituting the word "regulations" where the word "statutes" now appears.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is right—in section 4.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound such papers and documents, for the use of the said committee, as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects considered or to be considered by the said committee during the Fifty-fourth Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back House bill No. 1712 with a request for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1712) granting to the First Regiment of North Carolina State Guard two condemned cannon.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to the First Regiment North Carolina State Guard two pieces of condemned cannon: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service, and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, there are six bills of a similar nature, coming from military organizations, Grand Army posts, and municipalities, requesting the donation of condemned cannon, and in some cases of condemned cannon balls, for monumental and other purposes. These were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The committee communicated with the Secretary of the Navy to ascertain whether it was practicable to comply with these requests. In reply the Secretary says, in case the discretion is given to the Secretary of the Navy to furnish such articles as in his judgment may be spared without injury to the service, and with the further provision that the Government of the United States shall not be put to any expense by reason of the donation, there is no objection to the passage of the bills. The bills have all been amended so as to conform to the suggestion of the Secretary. These condemned cannon of the Navy are old iron guns of obsolete patterns, and of no use to the Government. They have no commercial value, as the cost of breaking them up would be greater than the value of the metal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of these bills?

Mr. CANNON. I would be glad if the gentleman would submit his report and let it be printed in the RECORD, because there are other places that would be very glad to have these condemned cannon for ornament in the same way; and that would give us a little time to look into it and let others have an opportunity.

Mr. HILBORN. Let these bills pass, and let the others then come in.

Mr. THOMAS. Let these bills pass, and let others then come in.

Mr. CANNON. You can have it printed in the RECORD, and you can call it up in the morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. How many cases are there in this?

Mr. HILBORN. It covers seven cases, and fourteen guns.

Mr. CANNON. How many pieces of condemned cannon are there altogether?

Mr. HILBORN. I can not tell you. The Secretary of the Navy says there is no objection to the passage of these bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. I want to move an amendment, if you do go on with them.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 248) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish four pieces of condemned cannon to the city of Hastings, Mich.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to furnish to the city of Hastings, Mich., for use in completing the soldiers' monument, four pieces of condemned cannon, if in his judgment it may be consistent with the interests of the public service.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Provided, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois desires to offer an amendment.

Mr. CANNON. This is an omnibus bill, I understand, covering seven cases.

The SPEAKER. It is not an omnibus. There are seven cases.

Mr. THOMAS. This is a bill granting cannon to the city of Hastings, Mich., for the soldiers' monument.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will advance backward. [Laughter.]

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1785) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to W. H. Wallace Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eldorado, Kans., and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to W. H. Wallace Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eldorado, Kans., for the soldiers' monument to be erected in said town.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interests; And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2777)) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate one condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls for four pyramids to Shaw Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Leavenworth, Kans., and also one condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls for four pyramids to McLouth Post, No. 279, Grand Army of the Republic, at McLouth, Kans., for soldiers' monuments to be erected at said cities.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Provided, That in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interests; And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3265) donating one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to Stone River Post, No. 74, Grand Army of the Republic, Sedan, Kans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to donate to Stone River Post, No. 74, Department of Kansas, Grand Army of the Republic, Sedan, Kans., one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls, for the monument to be erected in the cemetery in said town.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, reporting the bill, recommended an amendment, as follows:

After the word "town," in the eighth line, add: Provided, "That, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such articles can be spared without detriment to the public interest: And provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill as amended,

Mr. BLUE said: Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding: "And also to Charles A. Clark Post, No. 184, Grand Army of the Republic, of Ridge Farm, Ill., four pieces of condemned light cast-iron cannon, and twenty cannon balls for use of said post for decorative purposes."

The amendment was adopted; and the bill as amended was passed.

The title was amended by adding the following: "And authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver four condemned cannon to Charles A. Clark Post, No. 184, Grand Army of the Republic, of Ridge Farm, Ill."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill H. R. 3544) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish not more than four pieces of condemned cannon to the village of New Rochelle, N. Y.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to furnish to the village of New Rochelle, N. Y., for use in completing the soldiers' monuments in that place, not more than four pieces of condemned cannon, if, in his judgment, it may be consistent with the public service.

The committee recommended an amendment, as follows:

After the word "service," line 7, add: "Provided, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense on account of such donation."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3982) granting to Lincoln Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Valley Hope, R. I., one condemned cannon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to deliver to Lincoln Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Valley Hope, R. I., one condemned cannon: Provided, That the same can be spared without detriment to the service, and that no expense is thereby incurred by the Government.

Mr. PITNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:
"And also to the town of Newton, in the State of New Jersey, four pieces of condemned cannon and twenty cannon balls, for the decoration of the new soldiers and sailors' monument in that town."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting:
"And also to the Women's Relief Corps, of Taylorsville, Ill., four condemned cannon, for the purpose of decorating the soldiers' monument erected by said corps."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended by adding the following:

Also to the Women's Relief Corps, of Taylorsville, Ill., four condemned cannon and four condemned cannon balls; also to the town of Newton, in the State of New Jersey, four pieces of condemned cannon and twenty cannon balls.

On motion of Mr. BRODERICK, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the above bills donating cannon, etc., were passed was laid on the table.

THOMAS L. YOUNG.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the widow, heirs, or legal representatives of the late Thomas L. Young, who served as captain of Benton Cadets, Missouri Voiunteers, and as major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel of the One hundred and eighteenth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion, for a balance or balances of wages earned by him as said officer in the suppression of said rebellion and not yet paid to him or to his widow, heirs, or legal representatives, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for due investigation according to law; and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon said court to render a judgment for the amount, if any, found due from the United States upon the said claim.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the House, I desire to make a brief explanation. This is a bill which passed the Fifty-third Congress, and is no more than a bill to remove the statute of limitations so as to enable the representatives of Col. Thomas M. Young, formerly lieutenant-governor of the State of Ohio, and a member of this House, to recover the longevity pay to which he would have been entitled had his claim been filed with the Court of Claims in time. It is similar to many other bills that have passed both Houses, and it was passed unanimously by the House of Representatives in the third session of the Fifty-third Congress. The bill simply allows the claim to be filed with the Court of Claims under the longevity pay act, which allows an additional ration for every five years of service prior to entering the war of the rebellion.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman state the amount involved?

Mr. BROMWELL. The report shows that, and I will ask to have it read.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before the report is read, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that the bill, as I understood it from the reading, does a little more than what the gentleman states. It not only refers the case to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts, but it also authorizes the entering of a judgment against the United States.

Mr. BROMWELL. That provision was inserted at the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. WILSON of Ohio], who is a member of the Committee on War Claims, in order to prevent the necessity of coming back to this House after the court shall have ascertained the amount to which the representatives of Colonel Young are entitled.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object in this case, but I wish to remind the other side of the House of the rule which we adopted here the other day after some discussion, requiring all these claims to have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. The report may be read.

The report (by Mr. WILSON of Ohio) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1743) for the relief of the legal representatives of Thomas L. Young, submit the following report:

This claim was presented in the Fifty-third Congress and was favorably reported upon by the Committee on War Claims, to whom it was referred.

After a careful investigation of the facts involved, your committee adopt the report of the Fifty-third Congress, a copy thereof being hereto attached and made a part of this report.

Your committee attach hereto the acts of Congress and the decisions of the courts relating to longevity pay, and ask that they be printed as an appendix of this report.

Your committee report back the bill, and recommend its passage with the following amendment:

In line 7, after "Infantry," insert "and an officer in the Regular Army of the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of the bill. How does this controversy arise?

Mr. BROMWELL. This bill is merely for the purpose of removing the statutory limitation, this claim not having been filed within six years, as required by statute.

Mr. CANNON. Has there been a ruling of the Court of Claims covering this case in principle, so that, but for the statute, this case would come within the principle?

Mr. BROMWELL. I understand that a number of bills similar in purport to this have been passed. I get this information from the report of the Senate committee on a similar bill. This bill went through this House unanimously last winter. The language of the Senate committee is:

The principle upon which this bill is based has been repeatedly established in cases to which this one pertains, particularly in the case of Captain Pullman, and in an omnibus bill now on the Calendar for the relief of officers designated by name.

That was the language of the report of the Senate committee in connection with a similar bill passed at the last session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, without being entirely familiar with the ruling in the cases referred to, I know that there have been a large number of cases of officers in the Navy where they have come in after great lapse of time—possibly a generation or possibly almost two—and sought relief, upon findings of the Court of Claims, affirmed, perhaps, by the Supreme Court. There have been cases, possibly, similar to this of parties entitled to longevity pay under the ruling, they never having dreamed of such a construction of the law during their term of service or during their lifetime. I think Congress has, in the main, refused to remove the bar of the statute of limitations in that class of cases.

But we all recollect Mr. Young, a late member of this House from the State of Ohio; and if the committee is right in holding that his legal representatives are entitled to $478 I would greatly prefer that the bill be amended so as to make an appropriation of that amount for the widow, if there be one, or for the children.

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is a widow, and she is very poor.

Mr. CANNON. I would rather make an appropriation of that kind at once without establishing a precedent by sending this case to the Court of Claims. I think the action I now suggest would be less embarrassing to the House. The passage of this bill in the form proposed might prove somewhat mischievous as a matter of precedent.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand that this is a new proposition at all. My understanding is that in a great many cases of this kind longevity pay has been allowed by private bills passed through Congress, each case being in the first instance adjudicated by the Court of Claims, and an appropriation subsequently made by Congress for the payment of the longevity pay.

Mr. CANNON. But this case goes beyond that. This bill does not propose to refer this claim under the Bowman Act to the Court of Claims, allowing the facts to be found by that court and the case then to be brought back to Congress for its action. This bill makes a new precedent. It proposes to send this matter outright to the Court of Claims, giving that court authority to deliver judgment, which judgment would, as a matter of course, be reported for appropriation. Now, I do not want that done.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the provision to which he refers was not originally contained in this bill, but was inserted by a subcommittee of the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will amend his bill by striking out that provision, or if he sees proper to amend the bill so as to allow this sum of $478 outright to the widow of Mr. Young, I shall not object; otherwise I shall be obliged to do so.

Mr. BROMWELL. Upon that statement of the case by the gentleman from Illinois, I will consent that the provision requiring the Court of Claims to enter judgment be struck out, and that the court be merely authorized to investigate and make a finding of the facts in the case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill with the proposed amendment? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, it has been suggested to me that if there be no objection it may be well to adopt the course indicated by the gentleman from Illinois and pass the bill in such a form as to make at once a direct appropriation of the $478, which the committee reports to be due. Of course this would be preferable to having the case go to the Court of Claims, where it might be tied up for a long time, and then come back here for further appropriation. If there be no objection to such a modification of the bill, I hope it will be passed in that form.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must state the amendment which he proposes, so that the House may understand it.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest to the gentleman that he allow this bill to lie over until to-morrow morning, retaining its present privilege, and in the meantime he can prepare the modified proposition.

Mr. BROMWELL. Very well; I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The bill is temporarily withdrawn.

DULUTH AND NORTH DAKOTA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4254) granting the right of way to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota.

Before the request for unanimous consent is submitted, I wish to state that this bill was reported by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PENDLETON], and meets the approval of the entire committee.

This road has been built the entire length of the route, with the exception of that part of the line through the reservation. The bill has been submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, and has been amended according to their suggestion. I do not think that there can be any serious objection to the bill, which, as I have said, has received a favorable report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of North Dakota, and its successors and assigns, the right of way for the extension of its railroad through the Winnibagoshish, Chippewa, White Oak Point, and Red Lake Indian reservations, in the State of Minnesota, such right of way to be 50 feet in width on each side of the center line of said railroad; and said company may also take land adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of one station for every 10 miles of road constructed within the limits of said reservations.

SEC. 2. That before said railroad shall be constructed through any land, claim, or improvement held by an individual occupant according to any agreement, treaty, or law of the United States, full compensation shall be paid such occupant or claimant for all property taken and damage done by reason of the construction of said railroad. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to fix, in such manner as he shall designate, the amount of compensation to be paid individual occupants and claimants; and the amount of damage resulting to the tribe or tribes of Indians, in their tribal capacity, pertaining to said reservations, by reason of the construction of the road through such lands of the reservations as are not occupied in severalty, shall also be ascertained and determined in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, and be subject to his final approval. But no right of any kind shall vest in said railroad company in or to any part of the right of way and station grounds herein provided for until plats thereof, made upon actual survey for the definite location of the road, including the grounds for station houses, machine shops, side-tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, shall have been filed with and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and until the compensation aforesaid shall be fixed and paid. And said railroad company is hereby authorized, immediately after the passage of this act, to enter upon said reservations for the purpose of surveying and locating its line of road: Provided, That said line of railroad shall be located, constructed, and operated with due regard to the rights of the Indians, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

SEC. 3. That the rights herein granted shall be forfeited by said company unless said road is constructed through said reservations within three years from the passage and approval of this act.

SEC. 4. That Congress may at any time amend, add to, alter, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Has this bill been reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. JENKINS. Yes; unanimously. It meets also the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I would like to hear the report read, if it is not too long.

Several MEMBERS. The bill is all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JENKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

A MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution and have it read, after which I will ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read at length. It provides that the President be requested to transmit to the House of Representatives the report of the board of engineers who have investigated the route and other subjects connected with the Nicaragua Canal.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CANNON. Before consent is given I would like to ask the gentleman a question. What is the object of this resolution?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is to secure the transmission to the House of the report of the board of engineers who have investigated the route and other matters connected with the Nicaragua Canal.

Mr. CANNON. Has there been a report made on the subject?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There has been, as I am informed, and I understand that it was transmitted to the President before the opening of Congress.

Mr. CANNON. Well, let us have it read.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is simply a resolution asking that the report be transmitted.

Mr. HITT. Let me suggest to the gentleman that this ought to have in it the usual provision "if not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well; let that be incorporated. I am willing to have the amendment inserted.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution as proposed to be modified?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I know no reason why this resolution should not take the usual course, and go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Well, then, I ask to have it referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, where it properly belongs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that reference will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

HON. THOMAS F. BAYARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read by the Clerk:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 28, 1895, I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, and accompanying papers, relating to certain speeches made by Thomas F. Bayard, ambassador of the United States to Great Britain.

In response to that part of said resolution which requests information as to the action taken by the President concerning the speeches therein referred to, I reply that no action has been taken thereon by the President except such as is indicated in the report and correspondence herewith submitted.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 20, 1896.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I believe under the rules that message will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and printed.

The SPEAKER. It will be so referred, according to the rule of the House, and printed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and prior years, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CANNON. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill and report are already in print, and can be found in the document room. I desire to give notice to the House that on conclusion of the Military Academy appropriation bill, if it shall be speedily concluded, or at a convenient opportunity in the near future, I will call up this bill.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HULL, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the consideration of appropriation bills, with Mr. PAYNE in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897.

Mr. HULL. If there be no objection, I will move that all general debate be considered as closed, and that we proceed to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, this bill was largely prepared by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS]. He will probably desire an opportunity to explain the bill before proceeding to its consideration by paragraphs.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Has the first reading of the bill been dispensed with?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I suggest that that is the first thing in order.

Mr. HULL. I intended to ask that the first formal reading be dispensed with. I now ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the first formal reading of the bill be considered as dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I will detain the House but a few moments——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to proceed by unanimous consent, as there is nothing before the House until the first paragraph of the bill is read.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed now, and that he have such time as he may need for his explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from New York be heard for the purpose of explaining the bill.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. For what length of time?

The CHAIRMAN. No length of time has been suggested.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We are operating under the five-minute rule, are we not?

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the gentleman be allowed such time as he may desire. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been prepared so as to state the several items under different heads, and in the order of arrangement it differs from bills which have been heretofore presented to the House. The subdivisions of the appropriations are as follows: For permanent establishment; for extra pay of army officers at Military Academy; for pay Military Academy band, field music, enlisted men on detached service, and extra pay of enlisted men on special duty at Military Academy; for pay of civilians employed at Military Academy; for current and ordinary expenses; for miscellaneous and incidental expenses, and for buildings and grounds.

In the appendix will be found the sum appropriated annually for the regular pay of officers on duty at the Military Academy.

It is well, also, to inform the House that previous to the last Congress the pay of enlisted men on duty at West Point was appropriated for in the army appropriation bill, but in the last Congress it was contemplated, on the advice of the Secretary of War, to increase the Army by the number of men then on duty at West Point. That failed, however, so that the appropriation for West Point last year, for the first time—and that system follows in this bill—was made in the Military Academy bill; and it should be considered as not only an appropriation for the Military Academy proper, but for the military post at West Point.

It is $58,154 this year; and when we consider the amount annually appropriated in the past, which is about the amount recommended to the House in this bill, it shows a large saving and is a large deduction from the amount asked for, and is believed by many to be too small for an efficient management of the Military Academy.

When the Clerk reads this bill you will see the amount appropriated—how much less it is than the estimates, and how much less than in the appropriation bill of last year. In the report will be found a list of the appropriations for the last six years, and the amount of the recommendations for the Academy this year. At the end of the report will be found a reference to every item submitted by the Secretary of War that has not been, in some part at least, recommended to the House for an appropriation. Should any member of the House desire to ascertain what has been the action of the committee upon any one of the estimates made by the Secretary of War, he can find it recommended in the bill or a written statement in the report, giving the reason why the particular item is not included in the bill.

This bill contains no provision of general legislation which will render any part of it obnoxious to a point of order, in my opinion.

If any gentleman desires to ask any question, I will gladly answer him.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I notice from examining hurriedly the bill as reported by the committee, it seems to be, as compared with former enactments of appropriations for the Military Academy, almost entirely recast and rearranged.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Now, I am not prepared to say, from the slight examination I have given it, that the arrangement of the committee as reported is not wise, but I am prepared to say that there should be very grave reasons for entirely recasting an appropriation bill. Whether the sins, the errors, the hardships of the former arrangement were such as to justify throwing aside the form of the other bills and adopting this as reported now I do not know; but I have no doubt it will breed very much of extra work to the accounting officers of the Government. Well, the gentleman shakes his head. I have not consulted the accounting officers; but I take it that it amounts to an entire closing, substantially, of the accounts and the opening of a new set of accounts, and for that reason it seems to me not desirable. However, I throw that out more by way of suggestion than anything else.

The truth is, if the gentleman will allow me, that the Government of the United States has so increased in its public service, the appropriations, permanent and annual, amounting away up to almost $500,000,000 a year, that where the appropriations have proceeded from year to year in certain forms and under certain headings, and been followed by the opening of an account by the accounting officers, so that the people who enforce or execute the law are thoroughly familiar with the ordinary system of appropriation, that when that is changed, it must necessarily breed much of doubt and trouble. Gentlemen are aware that even in the matter of punctuation touching appropriations (as well as in the matter touching legislation) that frequently becomes very important. Now, I must confess, so far as I can see, I doubt the wisdom of this departure, and having said this much, I desire to say nothing further.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the criticism of the gentleman from Illinois, I want to say that the uniform custom of officers of the various branches of the Government charged with the preparation of estimates is to take up the last appropriation bill and make their estimates on the items as they appear in that bill, and without some authority such as the House of Representatives, which is the source of all authority for appropriations, to change that system, it never will be changed. This bill in the past has had items for pay, items for repairs of bookcases, items for improving the public grounds, items for current expenses and incidental expenses, for the compensation of civilians, and for extra pay to officers. These items have been distributed throughout the bill, and it was absolutely impossible to give a prompt answer to an inquiry as to what each special subdivision amounted to.

In preparing this bill the estimates relating to pay of officers belonging to the permanent establishment were put down first. The extra pay to officers on detached service followed; pay of enlisted men; then that of civilians; and there will be found no modification in the estimates except in the order of their presentation. It will not affect the system of bookkeeping except to facilitate it and lessen the labor.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is well known to everybody conversant with public affairs that there is no business concern in the United States that could afford to maintain the system of bookkeeping which is practiced by the Federal Government. There is seemingly an effort made in every Department to so manage the bookkeeping that it shall require a constant increase of the force instead of a reduction. The last Congress made some modifications in the Treasury Department.

The last visit to this city by the man for whom it was named was in the month of December, 1799. He came on horseback to Alexandria, by rowboat from there to the new city of Washington, and returned during the night to his home, which he never left. Were Washington to come back this day he would find the steamboat, the railroad car, the electric car—now running almost to the door of his old residence—and every modern improvement of the past one hundred years; but were he to come into Congress he would find the same old system and regulations for conducting affairs which existed when he was President, and in the Departments the same old system of bookkeeping. We have gone on a hundred years with almost no advance in the direction of abandoning cumbersome methods or adopting the improvements which civilization and intelligence have brought, and while it may be satisfactory to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to go on in this listless, idle, careless manner, I think it is rather to be commended than criticised that we should stop and make some little reform at least once in one hundred years. John Locke said that there were no laws enacted that ought not to contain within themselves a provision for their repeal at the end of a century. I will read from the estimates the exact items as they appear in this bill. Every single estimate as submitted by the Secretary of War has been taken note of. The committee approved as they saw fit a large number of those estimates. We have disapproved others and have stated to the House those approved and those we have disapproved.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that we proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] to the third paragraph on page 13 of this bill, and to ask him to explain it for my own information and for the information of the House and of the country. I suggest that that paragraph as it stands may excite alarm among the temperance people of the country. As I understand that, the effect of alcohol and narcotics on the human system shall be one of the studies in these military schools. I regard this law as of supreme importance. A Massachusetts lady, Mrs. Mary Hunt, is the author of this legislation, and this provision is now a law in every State and Territory but three, as well as in the military schools at Annapolis and West Point. Now, I see that the paragraph in the bill to which I have called attention, and which reads as follows——

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts accept a suggestion?

Mr. MORSE. I certainly will, if it is satisfactory.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I suggest that when that paragraph in the bill is reached will be the best time to discuss it. Unless the gentleman will be satisfied with a very brief explanation now, I think it better to wait until we reach that item in the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORSE. I think the gentleman can make a sufficient explanation now, and I prefer to hear it, as possibly I may not be in my seat just at the time when that paragraph is reached. I want the gentleman to explain to the House and to the country just what the scope of this paragraph is. I have no doubt that his explanation will be satisfactory, but I should like to hear it for my own information as well as for that of the temperance people of the country. As I said a moment ago, the existing law requires the teaching in the Military Academy as to the effect of alcohol and narcotics upon the human system, and I believe that the existing law is construed to mean and specify a certain text-book on this important subject.

Mr. TARSNEY. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TARSNEY. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked leave to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from New York. The gentleman from New York responded that it would be in order to answer that question when the paragraph to which it related was reached in the regular order. My point of order is that the gentleman from New York having declined to yield, the gentleman from Massachusetts is not in order in proceeding with his discussion of this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say that I think it is due to the House and to the country that some explanation should be made of the scope and effect of the paragraph to which I have called attention.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I can assure my friend from Massachusetts that the paragraph to which he directs attention in no way lessens the authority or the obligation of the officers of the Military Academy to give instruction as to the effect of alcohol and tobacco upon the human body, but it does allow them to give such instruction in their discretion, and does not require them, as the present law does, to use a particular text-book, the publishers of which seem to have derived great benefit from the peculiar phraseology of the law. This paragraph leaves the obligation to give such instruction as the gentleman from Massachusetts desires, and as I and many others desire to have it given, but it does not require the use of a particular text-book.

Mr. MORSE. That explanation is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of this bill to some inconsistencies in the figures. The gentleman's report states that the amount here appropriated by this bill is $14,714.05 less than was appropriated last year. The appropriation for that year was $464,261.66. Now, on page 25 of this bill, I find that the total amount appropriated here is $562,447.61, so that the amount appropriated in this bill appears to be nearly $100,000 more than last year, instead of less.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I believe I neglected to say, Mr. Chairman, that some of the figures in the printed report are erroneous, but the errors have been corrected by the assistant clerk of the committee, and will be read from the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending bill is closed, and it will now be considered by paragraph under the pending rule.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The following paragraph was read:

For extra pay of twenty-eight enlisted men of cavalry detachment employed on additional duty with the instruction battery of field artillery, United States Military Academy, at 30 cents per day when employed, $840.

Mr. HULICK. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether the extra pay provided in this paragraph is a peculiar provision of this appropriation bill applying only to the present year, or whether it is in accordance with a uniform policy?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. This is the appropriation uniformly made for detached men employed on special duty.

Mr. HULL. I will say to my friend from Ohio [Mr. HULICK] that not only has it been universally customary in the past to provide this extra pay, but the employment of these enlisted men instead of civilian experts on this special duty is a great saving to the Government.

Mr. HULICK. Then these extra men are employed by officers of the Academy every year——

Mr. HULL. Every year.

Mr. HULICK. Just as their services are demanded?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. They are employed in giving instructions to the cadets.

Mr. HULL. They are enlisted men who have special skill in certain lines; and although they receive extra pay the expense to the Government is considerably less than if civilians were employed for this sort of duty.

Mr. HULICK. Then this is a permanent provision?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

For clerk to the disbursing officer and quartermaster, $1,350.

Mr. ODELL. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$1,350" and inserting "$1,500." I desire to state that in 1872 the officer here appropriated for was paid $1,650 per annum. Somewhere about 1893 the salaries of the three civilian clerks, of whom this is one, were reduced to $1,200 each. In 1894 the salaries were raised to $1,350; and the following year the salaries of the clerk to the adjutant and the clerk to the treasurer were raised to $1,500 each. But the salary of this clerk to the disbursing officer and quartermaster was left at $1,350. In the Book of Estimates the quartermaster and the commandant at the Military Academy have recommended that the salary of this officer be placed on an equality with those of the other two clerks whom I have named; but for two Congresses this recommendation has been ignored. I ask that the amendment I have offered may be adopted, as a matter of justice, because this clerk performs an equal amount of work to that performed by the other two, who are each receiving $1,500.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The amendment of my associate [Mr. ODELL] proposes to add $150 to the salary of an old clerk whose salary was cut down some time ago. It has been thought desirable to increase his salary to equal that paid to others doing similar duty. This matter was brought to the attention of the committee, and the amendment has their approval.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for civilians employed at the Military Academy, $25,770.

Mr. HULL. The aggregate of appropriation in the paragraph just read should be increased by the sum of $150, in view of the addition which has been made to the salary of one of the clerks appropriated for.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, that amendment will be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I wish to strike out lines 17, 18, 19, and 20, on page 9, as they reappear on page 17.

The CHAIRMAN. Those lines have not yet been read.

Mr. WHEELER. On that question of the contingent fund I wish to say a word.

The CHAIRMAN. It appears that some corrections have been made in the printed bill which the Clerk is reading. The Chair thinks the Clerk should read the bill as reported from the committee.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. He is reading the bill as reported; there are no modifications in it. There are merely references placed on the margin of the pages.

The CHAIRMAN. The printed bill which the Clerk is reading appears to carry various corrections.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Those are simply memoranda.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well. The Clerk will now proceed to read the paragraph which the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS] desires to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

Contingent fund, to be expended under the direction of the academic board: For instruments, books, repairs of apparatus, and other incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, $1,000.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. I move to strike out the paragraph just read, as it reappears on page 17.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I will postpone what I wish to say until the paragraph on page 17 is reached.

The amendment of Mr. CURTIS of New York was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, for current and ordinary expenses, $68,379.

Mr. HULL. It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, at this point, lines

13 and 14, on page 16, that the amount has been reduced from the printed bill to $68,379, which is the correct amount.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent funds, to be expended under the direction of the academic board; for instruments, books, repairs to apparatus, and other incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, $1,000: Provided, That all technical and scientific supplies for the departments of instruction of the Military Academy shall be purchased by contract or otherwise, as the Secretary of War may deem best.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word expenses, in line 20, on page 17:
"Including the expenses incurred by ministers of the gospel who may be invited by the academic board to preach in the cadet chapel."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering that amendment is to call the attention of the House to a matter that I think is important to the Academy. The late most excellent and distinguished gentleman, Professor Postlethwaite, died a few days ago. He occupied most creditably the chair of professor of history, geography, and ethics, and under the law was also the chaplain of the Military Academy, and before the appointment of a successor I think it is generally conceded by the friends of the Academy that some provision of this character should be made.

Several bills have been introduced and have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for the purpose of separating the chaplaincy of the Academy from the professorship of ethics, his-history, and geography, and I think it would be well to consider the advantages which would result from having a fund provided, not a very large one, but a fund out of which the academic board could from time to time pay the expenses of eminent divines from all parts of the country who would be invited to preach to the cadets. Everyone will realize that for the same minister to preach Sunday after Sunday to the same audience is doing himself an injustice, and the history of a hundred years shows that such a course has not been well calculated to attain the very best purposes or results in connection with such ministrations.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, his amendment is to pay the expenses of the chaplains from time to time who may be invited. Is it large enough, in his judgment, to cover the payment to the evangelists who may be called in for revival purposes?

Mr. WHEELER. I think it might become necessary to make some increase in the contingent fund. It would not require a large sum. I think the academic board can be trusted to use their best discretion in the invitations they extend, and it would benefit the cadets in many ways to have the opportunity of listening to the preaching of the eminent divines who could be called to hold service for the young men in the Academy. The academic board, by correspondence with the eminent divines throughout the country, can learn at what time they would probably be in New York or Philadelphia or in the vicinity of the Academy and could probably make advantageous arrangements with them, inviting them to come to the Academy and preach to the cadets. It is well known to all that the eminent divines of the country like to have this privilege of preaching to young men like the Corps of Cadets at the Military Academy, and there is no doubt that these invitations would be accepted, in many instances to the great advantage of the young men there.

I simply make this suggestion, so that when the bills should come up to be considered I hope a sufficient sum for this purpose will be set apart.

Mr. TALBERT. Let me ask the gentleman from Alabama if his amendment would include the Salvation Army?

Mr. WHEELER. It makes no limitation whatever; it leaves it entirely within the discretion of the academic board, and, Mr. Chairman, as we trust that board entirely and wholly in the administration of the Academy, in the course of instruction of cadets, in the making of the men who are to lead our armies, and in whom the honor, safety, and integrity of this great Government is to be reposed, we can certainly trust them in the matter of selecting or inviting the eminent divines of the country to come to the Academy and preach to them. I think it would have the effect of improving the tenor of religious sentiment of the Army; it would be of unquestioned advantage to the young men at the Academy, and involves a very insignificant expense.

Young men from 17 to 20 years of age leave their homes and parental care and go to the Academy from every part of the United States, and these men are trained to hold high positions in our Government. It seems to me that a plan similar to the one proposed by the amendment is worthy of the most painstaking consideration of Congress. The years spent by the young men at the Academy are the forming years of a young man's character. That is all I desired to say upon the subject.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, without undertaking to answer the reasons that have been suggested by the gentleman from Alabama for the amendment, I would simply say that there is now before the Committee on Military Affairs one or more bills providing for the separation of the duties of the chaplain at the Academy from those of professor of history, geography, and ethics, and that one at least of these bills will probably be brought before the House during the present week. If at that time the House shall deem it advisable, merely at the cost of their traveling expenses, to secure the services of the eminent divines who will be asked to preach at the Academy, that will be the proper bill in which to insert such a provision. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Alabama will not insist upon his amendment at this point.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, in the several footings of the bill there were some errors, and those have been corrected. They really form no part of the bill, but I ask that the modifications in the footings be made as they appear in the copy of the bill at the Clerk's desk. I think they have all been adopted except the last one, and I ask that that one be adopted.

Mr. HULL. The total should be corrected by adding $150 to the amount reported by the gentleman from New York. The committee has added $150 to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state the correct figures?

Mr. HULL. The correct amount would be $448,967.61, with the addition of $150. The Clerk can make the addition.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The bill foots up $448,967.61, to which an addition was made, on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ODELL], of $150. I ask that that sum be added and the total corrected accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "four hundred and forty-nine thousand five hundred and forty-seven dollars and sixty-one cents," in the printed bill, and insert in lieu thereof the words "four hundred and forty-nine thousand one hundred and seventeen dollars and sixty-one cents."

Mr. HULL. That is right.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to submit the report on this bill, which contains the facts in reference to it in concise form.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the estimates for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, submit the accompanying bill therefor, and recommend the passage of the same.

The total amount appropriated by the bill is $448,967.61, which is $172,002 less than the estimates, and $15,294.05 less than appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896. A detailed statement of the appropriations for the Military Academy during the last six years is subjoined.

Appropriations Military Academy for the fiscal years 1891 to 1896, inclusive.

Year.	Pay.	Current and ordinary expenses.	Miscellaneous items and incidental expenses.	Buildings and grounds.	Total.
1891	$229,518.96	$61,431.15	$21,020.00	$123,326.00	$435,296.11
1892	231,436.09	62,576.60	18,770.00	65,672.70	378,455.39
1893	230,890.08	70,981.25	22,020.00	114,646.00	438,537.35
1894	233,627.08	79,935.90	25,737.50	90,065.69	429,366.17
1895	233,223.78	73,698.60	27,540.00	101,993.00	436,455.38
1896	232,712.01	79,867.10	29,310.00	50,451.25	464,261.66

Recommended for 1897.

Permanent establishment	$199,000.00
Extra pay of army officers at Military Academy	22,000.51
Pay of band, field musicians, enlisted men, and extra pay on special duty	58,154.10
Pay of civilians at Military Academy	25,770.00
Current and ordinary expenses	68,379.00
Miscellaneous and incidental expenses	15,894.00
Buildings and grounds	59,770.00
Total	448,967.61

Pay for the professors, the extra pay of officers on detached service, the pay for the Military Academy band, the field musicians, and enlisted men on detached service, and extra pay of enlisted men on special duty is fixed by law, and any change in the appropriation on that account is required by the difference in the length of service of those so detailed.

The expenditures recommended for new works and improvement of the grounds seem to be required, and vary slightly in amount from those heretofore annually made for buildings and grounds.

The most expensive improvements are for new guardhouse at the south entrance, the removal of peat from the new reservoir, and the reconstructing of the cable coal railway. Two estimates for the reconstruction of this work were furnished the War Department, one to be made of wood, at a cost of $10,000. The present trestles were constructed of wood six years ago, and are now practically worn out. The second estimate was to construct it with iron and steel trestles, at the cost of $20,000. The War Department submitted the first estimate, but the committee on investigation of the subject concluded that iron should be used instead of wood, and have recommended the appropriation, $20,000, therefor. The Superintendent of the Academy stated that the saving in the last six years by carrying the heavy freight on this road to storehouse, over its transportation by teams, was $16,000, and as it will be required for all time, the committee were unanimously of the opinion that it should be constructed of the most enduring material.

The following items in the estimates the committee believe to be desirable, but not essential, to the preservation of the property or the actual needs of the institution, and have not, on account of the depleted condition of the Treasury, recommended them to the House.

For1 senior assistant inspector, ordnance	$400
For 1 senior assistant instructor of military engineering	400
For 12 civilian janitors	7,200
For reimbursing contractor for extra labor and material not specified in the contract	298
For cases and materials for new ordnance museum	1,000
For fitting up operating room, cadet hospital	2,629
For building iron stairway in halls of engineer barracks	2,800
For completion and repairs of barracks, army service men, quartermaster's department	2,000
For repairs and improvements of cavalry barracks	1,000
For repairs to soldiers' chapel	800
For 168-foot iron porch, and tin roof for new cavalry barracks	4,200
For enlarging coal house at boiler house	4,100
For beginning work reconstructing sidewalks	1,000
For leading water mains for connecting new reservoir with present system of water distribution	20,000
For rebuilding superstructure of engineer boathouse	1,200
To build addition in rear of wing to quarters No. 35	1,900
For enlarging dining room to quarters No. 41	1,200
For renovation of library building	70,000
For granolithic pavement	2,600
For building one set of hospital steward's quarters	3,050
For pay as assistant plumber	600
For pay as keeper post cemetery	1,000
For repairs and improvement of quartermaster's stables	1,500

On motion of Mr. HULL, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments of the Committee of the Whole. If there is no objection, they will be considered together.

There was no objection.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of New York, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DESTRUCTION OF INCOME-TAX RETURNS.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means upon which I ask immediate action. It will take but a moment.

The SPEAKER. Is the motion to adjourn withdrawn?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, I withdraw it temporarily.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution reported by the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 24) providing for immediate destruction of income-tax returns, etc.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to cause the immediate destruction of all income-tax returns and any copies thereof, with all statements and records relative thereto, now in possession of the Treasury Department, by reason of "An act to reduce taxation," etc., in effect August 28, 1894.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommends the passage of this joint resolution, and it is unanimously reported.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I should like to ask my colleague on the committee whether his resolution does not cover rather too much ground? I call his attention to the fact that it directs the destruction of any records kept of those income taxes. My friend knows that some taxes were voluntarily paid under the act, and there ought to be some record kept of those payments in order that they may be refunded.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that there is an independent record of all the payments, and the audit has been made upon those accounts. This relates only to the returns of income taxes.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. As I understood the reading of the resolution, it provided for the destruction of all records.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This resolution was drawn, as I understand it, by the Internal Revenue Department, and I presume that abundant precautions have been taken about the matter referred to by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. I only wanted to call the gentleman's attention to it. I accept his statement.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This resolution will have to go to the Senate, and if there is anything wrong about it, it can be corrected. A letter was received only this morning from the Department approving of the passage of the resolution, and my understanding is that it is in the proper form.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the report which accompanies this joint resolution, a bill on the same subject, but different in its terms from the joint resolution just passed, should lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill H. R. 3560 will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ANDERSON, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BELL of Texas, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BROMWELL, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. COLSON, for ten days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. CANNON (at 2 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A letter from the Attorney-General of the United States, transmitting a list of judgments rendered against the Government by the circuit and district courts of the United States, in which the records have been received since February 27, 1895—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the cases of Maria J. Fowler, executrix of Edward Fowler, deceased; James S. Hamilton, administrator of Turner Patterson, deceased; James W. Myers and Sarah E. Nichols, administratrix of William P. Hackney, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from Jacob P. Clark, president of the Washington and Great Falls Electric Railway Company, transmitting a report of the operations of the said company for the year ended December 31, 1895—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a copy of a communication from the Treasurer of the United States recommending additional clerical assistance for his office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the assistant treasurer at New York setting forth the need of increased clerical force in his office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting certain reports of the details of the business relating to the carrying of the mails, including particulars of all contracts, with names of contractors, allowances, fines, curtailments, etc.—to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the concurrent resolution of the Senate (No. 6) to print, under the direction of the Department of the Interior, 6,000 copies of a paper entitled "The public lands and their water supply," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 87); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DRAPER, from the Committee on Patents, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3455) to establish a classification division in the United States Patent Office, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 88); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE: A bill (H. R. 4322) relating to the compensation of United States attorneys, clerks, marshals, and other court officials, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GIBSON: A bill (H. R. 4323) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GRAFF: A bill (H. R. 4324) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to deliver one condemned cannon to the city of Elmwood, Peoria County, Ill.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 4325) providing for the preferment of wages of employees in cases of assignment, execution, in payment by receivers, etc.—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4326) relating to the liability of employers in the District of Columbia to make compensation for personal injuries suffered by employees in their service—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GRAFF: A bill (H. R. 4327) relative to immigration and naturalization—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. McCORMICK: A bill (H. R. 4328) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals, and to define and regulate, in certain cases, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WHEELER (by request): A bill (H. R. 4329) to amend section 3282 of Revised Statutes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. POWERS (by request): A bill (H. R. 4330) relating to the forfeiture of lands granted in aid of the construction of the Union Pacific Railway and the Union Pacific Railway, Eastern Division—to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

By Mr. WOODMAN: A bill (H. R. 4331) to regulate the manning of vessels on the Great Lakes—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. LINNEY: A bill (H. R. 4332) to enlarge the jurisdiction of United States commissioners—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 21, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. HOAR. I observe that the clerks in making up the Journal state that several bills "on motion of Mr. HOAR" were referred to committees. The Journal should state that I reported the bills from the Judiciary Committee; that the committee desired to be discharged from their further consideration, and recommended their reference to other committees severally, instead of having it appear simply as the motion of a Senator. It was not a motion; it was the recommendation of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The correction suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts will be made. The Journal stands approved as corrected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution providing for the printing of 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 for the use of the Post-Office Department; in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate.

TELEPHONE SERVICE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 30, 1895, calling for information as to the number of telephone companies now doing business in the District of Columbia and the city of Washington, the name of each of said companies, when and where they were incorporated, etc., a report of the superintendent of the telegraph and telephone service of the District of Columbia on the subject; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Historical Society of Jefferson County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation modifying or repealing the present homestead entry and preemption laws relating to Indian reservations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of sundry citizens of Anderson, S. C., praying that Congress empower the President to send aid and relief to the suffering people in Armenia; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Boston Merchants' Association, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation directing the Secretary of the Treasury to keep his gold reserve and note redemption transactions separate from other receipts, and not to use notes which have come into the Treasury for redemption, except in accordance with the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and also that a commission of experts be appointed to study the banking systems of the world; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PEFFER. I present a petition of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, through a number of their officers, setting forth, among other things, that they represent not fewer than a million people, not limiting them to this country. They believe that the protection of the home is the supreme duty of statesmen, and they therefore earnestly and solemnly beseech the Congress of the United States to take such action as shall put our home-loving Republic on record as having used the moral and material influence of the country for the relief of the Armenians. They therefore beg the Congress as the legally constituted representatives of the wives and mothers of the nation to give heed to their devout prayer and aspiration that America, through her highest legislative authorities, may give expression to all the world of her abhorrence of the atrocities in Armenia, and may make an appropriation from the people's money for the relief of our brethren and sisters who have been driven to the last extremity by the fatal fanaticism of the Sultan and his soldiers.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented petitions of the Board of Trade and of the Lumber Dealers' Association of Saginaw, Mich., praying for the improvement of the harbors at Ludington, Mich., and Manitowoc, Wis.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of representatives of sundry women's associations of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of legislation to make parents the natural guardians of their children, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented the petition of James W. Dunn, of Elizabeth City, N. C., praying that he be granted an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Thomas Green, of Bakersville, N. C., praying that he be granted arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Pawtucket, R. I., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present the petition of Mrs. Helen Carrothers, of Hennepin County, Minn., praying relief for injuries received by her at the hands of the Sioux Indians while she was held a captive by them in August, 1862. I move that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I present sundry petitions in favor of a bill introduced by me some days ago to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company of the District of Columbia. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Salladasburg, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. WARREN presented the petition of E. U. Snider and 44 other citizens of Buffalo, Wyo., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committtee on Immigration.

Mr. IRBY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Anderson, S. C., praying that Congress empower the President to send aid and relief to the suffering people in Armenia; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BAKER presented a petition signed by Charles Charles, president of the National Protective Labor Association of Washington, D. C., and George Charles, president of the African Emigration Association of Topeka, Kans., praying that ex-slaves of the United States be granted a reasonable pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN presented the petition of Mrs. Zachariah L. Windsor, widow of Zachariah L. Windsor, deceased, of Montgomery County, Md., praying that her claim for supplies and stores be referred to the Court of Claims under the act of March 3, 1883, known as the Bowman Act; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brinkley, Ark., representing various church denominations, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

WINNEBAGO AND OMAHA INDIAN AGENCY.

Mr. ALLEN. Before introducing certain evidence in the nature of a petition and asking its reference, I wish to make a brief statement regarding it, and then I shall ask for its publication as a document.

Last summer there was widespread discontent in the State of Nebraska as to the management of the Indian agency known as the Winnebago and Omaha Agency, on the reservation in Thurston County, Nebr. Public charges were made in the press of Nebraska, and possibly some of the adjoining States, that the administration of this agency was not upon correct principles, and that possibly its management involved somewhat the integrity of some of the employees at the agency. This charge was so notorious and so general that it was necessary that the Nebraska delegation in Congress should take some notice of it. While we had no authority to act in the sense of reaching a finding as a committee of either branch of Congress, or a joint committee, we did act as a committee, and sat two days, the 24th and 25th of July, taking testimony and investigating the charges as far as we could do so within that time. We employed the official court stenographer of that district to take the evidence.

I have the evidence before me, properly transcribed, being evidence taken ore tenus, affidavits, petitions, and letters. In the light of the fact that there is to be an investigation of all the Western Indian agencies this year by the Committee on Indian Affairs, I ask that the testimony and the reports which I now present be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VILAS introduced a bill (S. 1675) to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State or Territory into another State or Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 59) extending the provisions of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 60) for the relief of employees in the Government mail repair workshop; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Census, and ordered to be printed.

PAYMENT OF GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. PUGH on the 15th instant; which were ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GIBSON, it was Ordered, That James S. Crawford be permitted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers pertaining to the bill for his relief in the Fifty-third Congress, there having been no adverse report thereon.

WESTERN CHEROKEE INDIAN CLAIM.

Mr. PRITCHARD submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Whereas the following resolution was adopted by the Senate of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, on March 2, 1895:

"Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to withhold any further distribution and payment of the money derived from the 35 per cent of the judgment in favor of the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians against the United States in the sum of $800,386.31, set apart for the payment of expenses and for legal services justly and equitably payable on account of the prosecution of said claim, until otherwise authorized by law, except allowances already made for legal services, and to report to the Senate any and all payments and distributions from said fund already made, with copies of all papers in any manner connected with said payments and distributions filed in the Interior Department and the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the action had thereon."

And whereas it is not the intent nor the purpose of said resolution to prevent payment out of said 35 per cent of said judgment of the amounts that shall be found by the Secretary of the Interior to be justly due and payable to attorneys or to their representatives, if deceased, for legal services rendered by them in the prosecution of said claim of the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians: Therefore

Be it resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that no part of said resolution shall operate to prevent payment of whatever sum or sums, if any, that may be found by the Secretary of the Interior, after investigation, to be due to the estate of C. M. McLoud, deceased, and Marcus Erwin, deceased, both of Asheville, N. C., and T. H. N. McPherson, of Shippensburg, Pa., for legal services rendered by them under contract, in the prosecution of the claim of the "Old Settler" or Western Cherokee Indians, against the United States: Provided, That the total amount that shall be allowed and paid under this resolution shall not exceed ——.

ADALINE V. BASSETT.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Adaline V. Bassett, widow of Isaac Bassett, deceased, late assistant doorkeeper of the Senate, a sum equal to one year's salary at the rate allowed by law to said assistant doorkeeper, out of the "miscellaneous items" of the contingent fund of the Senate; said payment to be considered as in lieu of all funeral expenses or other allowances.

REPRINT OF THE NAPHTHA LAUNCH BILL.

Mr. FRYE. I ask an order for the reprinting of what is known as the naphtha launch bill. The edition is entirely exhausted, I understand.

The order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,000 copies of Senate bill 1646, providing for certain requirements for vessels propelled by gas, fluid, naphtha, or electric motors.

REPORT ON IRRIGATION.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed under the direction of the Department of the Interior 10,000 copies of a report on irrigation in the Western part of the United States, prepared for the Eleventh Census, together with accompanying maps and illustrations; also an appendix bringing the water supply information up to date, and an index. Of this number 3,000 copies shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 5,000 copies for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR SENATE LIBRARY.

Mr. GRAY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Whereas the number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD provided for the Senate library by section 73 of the act in regard to public printing approved January 12, 1895, has proved insufficient to supply the needs of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Government Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to supply the Senaet library, for the use of the Senate, in addition to the 10 copies provided in the new printing law, 10 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for each and every session of Congress hereafter, beginning with the third session of the Fifty-third Congress.

DAMS AT OUTLETS OF THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. CULLOM submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, That 500 copies of a report by the Interstate Commerce Committee, to whom was referred Senate bill 1339 and Senate resolution No. 42, be printed for the use of the Senate.

ARREST OF AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inquire into the arrest and forcible removal of Mark E. Rodriguez, a citizen of the United States, on board the United States mail steamer Olivette in the harbor of Habana on Wednesday, the 15th instant; also into the arrest of Luis Someillan and his son, citizens of the United States, in the city of Habana; and, if no just cause for such arrest exists, to demand their immediate release.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that if the Senate is to take any action on the subject at all the better form of resolution would be, in the first place, to ask the President for such information as the Department of State may have, or as he has. Will the Chair direct the resolution to be read again?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be again read.

Mr. CALL. Before the resolution is read, I will read for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts a telegram which I received last night.

Mr. HOAR. Will not the Senator have the telegram read at the desk?

Mr. CALL. I send the telegram to the desk to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The telegram will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

KEY WEST, FLA., January 20, 1896.

To Senator WILKINSON CALL, Washington, D. C.:

Mark E. Rodriguez has been taken from steamer Olivette. Last Wednesday Luis Someillan and his son also arrested in Habana. All American citizens. Use your influence with Secretary of State to get them out of the Spanish grasp.

CARLOS RECIO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read for information.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me the proper mode of resolve should be, in the first place, to inquire of the President what information he has. Directing him to make an inquiry may imply certainly that he has not made any himself. There seems to be a notion in some quarters that the Senate of the United States is a constantly loaded cannon which any single member of the Senate can touch off at his discretion. I think it would be better to go a little more slowly in all these cases. I trust the Senator from Florida will modify his resolution into a mere resolution of inquiry of the President, which would undoubtedly have the same effect.

Mr. CALL. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, although it is quite obvious that the State Department can have no information upon an occurrence so recent. I had thought, as this matter of the unlawful and unreasonable arrest of citizens of the United States as contradistinguished from subjects of Great Britain and other countries has become so frequent, and the protection of the flag and the fact of citizenship of the United States really amounts to so little, that it were well that this instance should receive immediate consideration on the part of the Senate, to the end that foreign Governments should understand that all departments of the Government of the United States are vigilant to protest and prompt to demand proper treatment and complete immunity from wrongful treatment of citizens of the United States. I have introduced the resolution, but I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution as modified?

Mr. HALE. What is the resolution as modified?

Mr. GORMAN. Let it be read as modified.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution as modified be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Florida to modify the resolution.

Mr. CALL. The modification suggested is simply that the President of the United States be requested to communicate the information.

Mr. HOAR. The information he has in regard to the arrest of those persons.

Mr. HALE. Strike out all that part of the resolution that makes an imperative demand for release. That should be stricken out.

Mr. CALL. There is no such part of the resolution. There is a part of the resolution that directs that if no just cause be found the immediate release be demanded. But to avoid any question about it I will consent to strike out that part, although I can not understand why any Senator should object to an unconditional demand for the release of a citizen of the United States after it has been ascertained that he has been unlawfully arrested and is innocent of offense against the foreign Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read as modified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think this is setting an example that may give us a great deal of trouble in many cases that will arise. I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which meets to-morrow, and it will no doubt be promptly reported back. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALL. If there be any desire on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to refer the question whether the Senate of the United States shall act upon this information given to it of the arbitrary and unjust arrest of citizens of the United States in foreign countries, and that a committee, a small part of the Senate, shall decide what it is the business of the whole Senate to decide, I shall not object. I wanted to show the people of the United States, and of my own State in particular, that I am prepared as a Senator to demand their protection in foreign countries without reference to the action of any other department of the Government.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to state that a resolution has already been introduced and passed by the Senate which I think substantially covers the question the Senator is seeking to get light upon.

Mr. PLATT. I guess not.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not know exactly, as I was not present when the resolution was read. At any rate, I desire to state for the information of the Senator from Florida that perhaps to-day a report will be received from the Secretary of State giving information as to the arrest of American citizens who are naturalized in this country and upon other questions pertaining to the general subject. I hope the Senator will consent to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me to make a suggestion before he sits down?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I am informed by a member of this body that several communications have come to him in the past in regard to the arrest of American citizens in foreign countries, not by the Spanish Government, but by other Governments, and that on taking them to the Secretary of State the Secretary of State instantly sent a cable dispatch abroad inquiring into the facts and had the proper means of redress set in motion. Why this one case which has come to the notice of the Senator from Florida should be singled out and made a means of applying a spur to the President or the Secretary of State or to the Senate I can not see.

It seems to me that when the Senator from Florida received the dispatch he should have instantly communicated it to the Secretary of State, who is the proper officer of the Government to take cognizance of the matter; and he would have found, I presume, that in ten minutes inquiry would be made by cable. If the Secretary of State had refused, then the Senator would have exercised his discretion as to calling upon the Senate to interpose.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, one word further. I understand that the resolution does not pertain to the country to which I supposed it did; but I still think it pertains to the general question involved in an inquiry already made of the Secretary of State by this body. Whether that is the case or not, I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as suggested by the chairman of that committee.

Mr. CALL. I desire to say for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts that I did send this telegram immediately to the Secretary of State; but I think the Senate of the United States owes a duty to the people of the United States, irrespective of what the President or his Secretaries may do. I think that to this body belongs the protection of the honor of the American flag and American citizens in a higher degree than is devolved upon the executive officers of the Government. Therefore I thought that it was well for the Senate to show its care and consideration upon this subject.

I do not accept the theory that there is any department of this Government in which so large powers are vested and so great a responsibility as the Senate and House of Representatives, in whom is vested the power of removal by impeachment of the officers of all other departments.

I have no censure to imply upon the President of the United States or upon the Secretary of State; but the idea that we can not act, but must ask information of the President of the United States before we strengthen his hands by resolving that he should take especial care and immediate action in an instance of great enormity, where the flag of the United States has been violated, and in a state of war, an atrocious war, citizens of the United States are taken from on board an American mail steamer, and that attention should not be called at the instance of the Senate to that particular case of outrage seems to me to have no justification in the reasons which have been given by the Senator from Massachusetts.

But I have no objection, if it be desired by Senators here to refer so plain a question of duty to a committee, that it shall be done, and therefore, if the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, desires this reference, I will consent to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the conclusion of the routine morning business, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I will ask the Senate, if the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has no objection, that the resolution which was introduced by me a few days ago, asking the Secretary of State to communicate to the Senate the reports of the consuls of the United States to the Island of Cuba, be taken up and passed. If it be desired to modify it by providing that the communications be made in confidence to the Senate, I have no objection to that modification. I ask the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, if he has any objection to the consideration of that resolution and its passage by the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the resolution? I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

Mr. CALL. I will state further, before the resolution is read, that it is particularly desirable that the Senate should have, either in confidence or in open session, full information in regard to the condition of affairs in the Island of Cuba and the arrest of American citizens there without just cause. I am informed that the difference in the protection and respect shown to citizens of the United States and subjects of Great Britain and other foreign countries is marked in favor of the subjects of those Governments and in detriment and disparagement of American citizens and the American flag. I hope, if that fact be true, as I am advised it is, that the information contained in those reports may be communicated to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Florida will prepare a resolution requesting the Committee on Foreign Relations to give a statement of the condition of affairs in Cuba, that committee will do so. If he will send such a resolution as that to the committee, they will no doubt promptly respond.

The objection I had to the resolution offered a while ago was to taking any individual case of arrest and endeavoring to investigate that, when other subjects of much greater importance, involving many thousands of people, were also pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations. I have no doubt that in a short time the committee will report the subject to the Senate, when there will be ample time to discuss the whole matter.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands the resolution. The resolution to which I refer is a resolution which was considered very briefly a few days ago, to which objection was made, asking the Secretary of State to send to the Senate the reports of consuls of the United States in regard to the condition of affairs in Cuba, not an individual case, but referring generally to all reports which touched upon that question. I have no objection to that resolution being referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, if that be the only method to get action upon it; but I am very desirous, as I am informed that these reports contain information which we can not otherwise get, that they shall be communicated to the Senate either in confidence or in open session. That is the resolution to which I refer. It relates to no particular case.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt the matter will be reported to the Senate very soon by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALL. The resolution to which I refer has not yet been referred to that committee. It lies upon the table, and I am asking that it may be taken up in order that some disposal may be made of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the request of the Senator from Florida?

Mr. CALL. That the Senate proceed to consider the resolution calling for the reports of the consuls of the United States touching the condition of affairs in Cuba.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. CALL January 16, 1896:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate the dispatches of the consuls of the United States relating to the war now carried on in Cuba.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that as a matter of common safety to our consuls abroad we ought not to do this. Those consuls are scattered through the Island of Cuba. If the communications of those consuls to the State Department should be sent to the Senate, they would undoubtedly be subject to exposure, and the lives of many people might be involved by the betrayal of the correspondence of those consuls. It does seem to me that the Senate of the United States ought not to seek to explore the mysteries, if there be mysteries, in the State Department, and that the State Department ought not, under any circumstances, to communicate what is reported by consuls in time of war, which might attract attention to them and probably endanger their lives. I think, therefore, that we ought not to call for this information, unless there is some allegation that the Secretary of State is not doing his duty in protecting American citizens. The ordinary correspondence going on between the State Department and the various consuls of this country ought not to be disclosed while a war is raging.

There is another thing I wish to say in respect to the resolution. The resolution is not in the usual form. When the Senate of the United States directs a thing to be done by the head of a Department, it directs it positively, without any condition. It is only when we address the President as a separate department of the Government that we leave the question of propriety and expediency to be determined by him.

Mr. CALL. I introduced the resolution originally in conformity with the present suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, but I changed it upon suggestions from some Senators on the other side of the Chamber. I am indifferent as to the form in which it is put, and I am entirely willing that it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; but I think that the Government of the United States ought to be able to protect its consuls and foreign ministers in the discharge of their official duties in all countries, and that such timely respect and consideration of the determination of this Government to protect its citizens and the honor of its flag abroad should exist as would be a sufficient protection to them when their official acts were considered.

I will consent, therefore, inasmuch as it seems to excite so much objection, to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the absence of objection.

POSTAL LAWS AND REGULATIONS OF 1893.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution received from the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 20, 1896.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893 for the use of the Post-Office Department.

JOHN FINN.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yesterday the Senate passed the bill (S. 227) to permit the withdrawal of certain papers and the signing of certain receipts by John Finn, or his attorney. It has not yet gone to the House of Representatives, and I notice that there is a misrecital in the body of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed may be reconsidered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the votes are reconsidered. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I move, in lines 10 and 11, to strike out the words "Third Auditor of the Treasury" and to insert in lieu thereof "Auditor for the War Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PUGH January 15, 1896, as follows:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt"; and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to the nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

Mr. HILL. Before I proceed, I ask the Senator from Alabama what disposition he proposes to make of that resolution this morning?

Mr. PUGH. I propose to have it considered by the Senate with a view of having a vote taken upon it.

Mr. HILL. I was going to suggest whether it would not be wise at this time to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PUGH. They have already considered all the matters involved in this resolution, and have substantially made a report covering every question that arises on the resolution.

Mr. HILL. A written report?

Mr. PUGH. I mean they have reported a bill, which is now the unfinished business.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Does the Senator from New York desire to address the Senate?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I thought the question put by the Senator from New York implied that he did not desire to go on with a speech this morning. I do not, of course, wish to interfere with him if he does, but I was going to suggest, if nobody was prepared to address the Senate at this time, that the resolution go over informally, and that the hour between now and 2 o'clock be devoted to unobjected cases on the Calendar; but I shall not interpose if the Senator from New York desires to proceed.

Mr. HILL. That will be far more profitable if the Senator from Alabama will consent.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator want to do?

Mr. HILL. I want to oppose the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Alabama to let the resolution stand in its place and that we proceed to consider the unobjected cases on the Calendar for an hour. Of course there can be no considerable debate on them.

Mr. PLATT. There appears to be a colloquy going on on the other side which none of the rest of the Senators here, except those engaged in it, can hear. We on this side of the Chamber would be glad to know what is taking place.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Senator from Alabama, without displacing it, be set aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. PUGH. Several Senators who are friends of the resolution that I offered suggest to me that it would be well not to object to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HILL. I also concur in that proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be laid over without prejudice. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

PAYMENT OF PENSION MONEY.

The bill (S. 242) to require payment of pension money to wives in cases where male pensioners desert or abandon their families, or are habitual drunkards, or for any reason fail and neglect to support their families, was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

Mr. PEFFER. That bill needs to be amended slightly, and the report of the committee points out the amendments. In line 5 after the word "drunkenness," I move to strike out "or where, for any reason or cause, such pensioners," and insert the word "and."

Mr. PALMER. I ask to have the section read as it will appear if the amendment be agreed to.

The Secretary read the section as proposed to be amended, as follows:

That in any and all cases where male pensioners of the United States desert or abandon their families, or where such pensioners are addicted to habitual drunkenness and do not use their pension money for the support of their families and do not support them, and when they have no other sufficient means of support, the Commissioner of Pensions, on such facts being made to appear by competent testimony and on application of the wife of any such pensioner, shall pay the money due such pensioner from time to time to his said wife so long as such conditions of failure or neglect to support continue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. In line 11, after the word "pensioner," I move to insert the words "she being a woman of good character."

Mr. SHERMAN. Who is to examine and determine such a question as that? I hope that such a provision will not be inserted in a pension law which would require every woman who applied for a pension to have her character examined.

Mr. HOAR. I enter an objection to the present consideration of the bill. Let the amendments be printed, and this will be the first bill to come up the next time the Calendar of unobjected cases is considered. The Senator by that time can then have his amendments printed.

Mr. PEFFER. Does the Senator suggest that the bill be printed with the amendments proposed?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. PEFFER. I am very well satisfied with that, Mr. President. Let the bill be printed with the amendments as they appear in the report.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Massachusetts will withdraw his objection for a moment, it seems to me that perhaps it would be better if the Senator from Kansas would consent to have the bill recommitted to the committee in order that it may be recast.

Mr. PEFFER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PLATT. I wish, while on my feet, to make a single suggestion about the bill as it would stand if these amendments were all adopted. It would pay, as I understand, the pension money to a wife whenever the husband was not properly applying it for the support of the children, and it would do so whether the wife was living with the husband or was separated from him, and it would do it also whether the wife were applying, or would apply, the money for the support of the children. I think all these things should be taken into consideration, and the language of the bill should be so framed by the committee as to carry out the idea which is involved, which is a good one.

Mr. PEFFER. Let the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to make a single observation before the bill is recommitted. I am satisfied that some legislation ought to be had on this subject.

Mr. PLATT. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. GALLINGER. But I confess that I have not myself given the attention to this bill that I think, as chairman of the Committee on Pensions, I ought to have given, and I promise to give it careful consideration if it shall be recommitted, as I trust it may be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, in the absence of objection. The next business on the Calendar will be stated.

EXCHANGE BETWEEN GOLD AND SILVER STANDARD COUNTRIES.

The next business on the Calendar was the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART December 12, 1895, directing the Committee on Finance to inquire what effect the difference of exchange between gold-standard countries and silver-standard countries has upon the agricultural and manufacturing industries of the United States, etc.

Mr. HILL. I suppose that resolution was offered by the Senator from Nevada for the purpose of making some remarks upon it, which have already been made, and the resolution may as well be taken off the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Nevada, who introduced the resolution, is absent, but may desire to address the Senate upon it when it comes up. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. VILAS. Let it go over without prejudice.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

CORPORATE INFLUENCE IN POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. CALL December 17, 1895, providing for the investigation of organized efforts of corporations to control the election of members of Congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. CALL. By unanimous consent, it was agreed that that resolution should lie upon the table, without losing its place, to be called up at any time. Objection was made that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] was not in the Chamber and desired to be here. As he is not now here, I ask that that order may be continued and that the resolution may be passed over without prejudice in the order of resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

CONGRESSIONAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The bill (S. 238) to prohibit officers of the Government from refusing to pay moneys appropriated by act of Congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. That is a very important bill. I think it had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the bill will go over.

PORTRAIT OF MRS. DOLLY MADISON.

The bill (S. 420) for the purchase of the oil portrait of Mrs. Dolly Madison by E. F. Andrews was announced as next in order.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to have that bill go over until I am able to examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

ISSUANCE OF INTEREST-BEARING BONDS.

The bill (S. 1341) to prohibit the further issuance of interest-bearing bonds without the consent of Congress was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will go over.

MAP OF THE UNITED STATES.

The joint resolution (S. R. 29) to print, with certain additions, the last map of the United States published by the Interior Department was announced as next in order.

Mr. CALL. I think there can be no objection to that joint resolution, and I desire at the proper time to insist on its passage, if I may do so. It exhibits a condition of things in the State of Florida which I think will justify the publication of this map.

Mr. HALE. Let the joint resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the joint resolution will go over.

LANDS WITHIN FORT PEMBINA MILITARY RESERVATION, N. DAK.

The bill (S. 1344) providing for the selection of the lands within Fort Pembina Military Reservation, N. Dak., by the State of North Dakota was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL MEN FOR THE NAVY.

The bill (S. 1404) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to enlist additional men for service in the United States Navy, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HALE. That bill is one upon which some Senators who are not present desire to be heard. I shall not ask that it be taken up now, but I give notice that at some early day I shall move to go to the Calendar for the purpose of having it considered, and, I hope, passed.

ELIZABETH MOORE ENGLISH.

The bill (S. 1271) granting a pension to Elizabeth Moore English was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Elizabeth Moore English, widow of Rear-Admiral Earl English, at $50 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES E. JONES.

The bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty," and in the same line, after the word "month," to strike out "said Jones having become practically blind, the result of a gunshot wound received while in the line of duty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles E. Jones, late photographer for the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers, said pension to be at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. GALLINGER January 8, 1896:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 249) granting a pension to C. E. Jones, have examined the same, and report:

The bill passed the Senate during the Fifty-third Congress.

Claimant was not an enlisted man, and hence not pensionable under the general law. He was employed as a photographer, and in that capacity rendered valuable service to the Union cause. Not only did he faithfully perform his duties as a photographer, but the evidence clearly shows that he performed actual military service, and that while thus engaged he received a gunshot wound which has resulted in almost total blindness.

There seems to be no question as to the incurrence of the disability, the affidavit of Capt. R. B. Ward, herewith appended, being conclusive on that point. Many other affidavits are on file which tend to confirm Captain Ward's statement. Had claimant been an enlisted man, there can be no reasonable doubt of his right to pension, and having performed actual military service, and being wounded while thus engaged, the duty of Congress to come to his relief is clear and imperative.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

AFFIDAVIT OF CAPT. R. B. WARD.

STATE OF MISSOURI, County of Jackson, ss:

In the matter of Charles E. Jones, claimant.

On this 5th day of September, A. D. 1890, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said county, duly authorized to administer oaths,

Robert B. Ward, aged 61 years, a resident of Kansas City, in the county of Jackson and State of Missouri, whose post-office address is Kansas City, Mo., well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly sworn, declared in relation to aforesaid case as follows:

"I have known above claimant, Charles E. Jones, since the spring of 1862, when he came to and joined the Eleventh Pennsylvania Cavalry as photographer, I being captain of Company D of said regiment. Said claimant was not an enlisted man, but I know of him being in several engagements under military orders, and in April, 1863, I know of my personal knowledge that the said Charles E. Jones was ordered to take photographic view of Longstreet's fortifications at the siege of Suffolk, in the State of Virginia, and while performing his duty, acting under orders of Gen. John Peck, commanding officer, said claimant, Charles E. Jones, received gunshot wound from Longstreet's sharpshooters in the small of back, across the spine, which affected his eyesight and has caused blindness of both eyes to such an extent that said claimant has to be accompanied with a guide at all times to walk around, rendering him as good as totally blind.

"R. B. WARD."

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 5th day of September, 1890.
[SEAL.] ROBERT S. RODGERS, Notary Public.

AFFIDAVIT OF W. D. HOOVER, M. D.

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Miami, ss:

In the matter of appeal for pension through special act of Congress by Charles E. Jones, regimental photographer, Eleventh Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers.

On this 29th day of October, A. D. 1894, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for the said county, duly authorized to administer oaths, W. D. Hoover, aged 60 years, a resident of Paola City, in the county of Miami and State of Kansas, well known to me to be reputable and entitled to credit, and who, being duly affirmed, declares in relation to aforesaid case as follows: "That I have been acquainted with the said Chas. E. Jones since 1867, when he first came to Paola, Kans., and that his eyes were diseased then, and that they continued to grow worse until he became totally blind, or nearly so. He can just barely grope his way with the use of his cane. He received a gunshot wound across the small of his back while in the line of duty in the Army during the late war. The ball passed across the back just over the second lumbar vertebræ, and has left a scar over one-half an inch across and more than an inch in length. It is a wonder it did not cause paraplegia. His eyes became affected before he recovered from the wound in the back, and I am of the opinion, taking the prostrated condition of his system, especially the nervous system, into consideration, if the wound in the back was not a primary cause of the disease of the eye it certainly was a secondary cause. Said Jones has been a good citizen during his residence here.

"The above is from my personal observation of the case, and is written by myself."

His post-office address is Paola, Kans., and further declares that he has no interest in said case, and is not concerned in its prosecution.

W. D. HOOVER, M. D.

STATE OF KANSAS, County of Miami, ss:

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day by the above-named affiant, and I certify that I read said affidavit to said affiant, including the words erased and the words added, and acquainted him with its contents before he executed the same. I further certify that I am in no wise interested in said case, nor am I concerned in the prosecution; and that said affiant is personally known to me, and that he is a credible person.

(My term expires March 27, 1895.)

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EZRA S. HAVENS.

The bill (S. 54) for the relief of Ezra S. Havens was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Ezra S. Havens, late captain of Company G, Eighteenth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of a captain of infantry in the late volunteer service from the 11th day of March, 1862, to the 2d day of February, 1863.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. DAVIS.

The bill (S. 56) for the relief of John M. Davis was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to set aside the general order issued by Major-General McPherson approving and confirming the sentence of the court-martial dismissing John M. Davis, captain of Company H of the Sixty-third Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAPOLEON B. GIDDINGS.

The bill (S. 57) for the relief of Napoleon B. Giddings was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated the circumstances of the alleged taking from Napoleon B. Giddings, in January, 1847, at Santa Fe, N. Mex., and deposit with A. B. Dyer, lieutenant of ordnance, United States Army, by order of Sterling Price, colonel commanding the army in New Mexico at that time, of 140 kegs of gunpowder, and to ascertain the reasonable market value of such powder at that time and place, and whether the same, or any part thereof, was ever returned or delivered back to Giddings, and the final disposition of such powder; and if the same, or any part thereof, was never returned to or delivered back to said Giddings, then to certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount of the reasonable market value at that time and place of the powder so never returned or delivered back to Giddings. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cause to be paid to Napoleon B. Giddings the amount so certified by the Secretary of War to be the reasonable market value of such powder as aforesaid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN S. NEET, JR.

The bill (S. 58) for the relief of John S. Neet, jr., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to John S. Neet, jr., late a private in Company C, Third Regiment Missouri State Militia Cavalry, afterwards Company L, Sixth Missouri State Militia Cavalry, $100 in full payment of the sum allowed him in October, 1878, by the Third Auditor of the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH W. CARMACK.

The bill (S. 59) for the relief of Joseph W. Carmack was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Joseph W. Carmack, late of Company A, Sixth Missouri Cavalry, the pay and allowances of a first sergeant of cavalry from the 1st day of May, 1862, to the 30th day of September, 1862, less any pay received by him during such period.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK GRAMM.

The bill (S. 61) for the relief of Frederick Gramm was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the military record of Frederick Gramm, late a private soldier in Company B of the Fifty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, so as to remove the charges of desertion, and to show that Gramm was captured by the enemy on June 25, 1862; paroled on June 28, 1862; permitted by Major-General Grant, commanding the district, to pass from Memphis, Tenn., to his home in Ohio to remain until notified of his exchange or otherwise ordered; duly exchanged and ordered to return to his command, and absent without leave until March 5, 1863, when he enlisted in the Navy of the United States for two years, served faithfully, and was honorably discharged at the expiration of his service. No pay or allowances are to become due by reason of the proposed act.

Mr. HILL. What will be the effect of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. The effect of it is to remove the charge of desertion which was entered against the soldier as in the military service and substitute for it the facts in the case, that he was captured, went home by permission of General Grant, was exchanged and required to report, and was absent without leave. Then he enlisted in the Navy, served faithfully, and was honorably discharged.

Mr. HILL. I merely wish to ask for information whether all those recitals exist and the record still shows that the man deserted?

Mr. COCKRELL. The record shows he deserted on a certain day, and that is all it does show. It does not show that he was captured or paroled, or anything else. The object of the bill is to make the record correspond with the facts.

Mr. HILL. I thought I understood from the reading of the bill that a discharge from the Army was given.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE A. ORR.

The bill (S. 60) for the relief of George A. Orr was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay the claim of George A. Orr as acting assistant provost-marshal at Mount Vernon, Mo., from May 28, 1863, to January 30, 1864, at the rate of $100 per month for his services and such sum for legitimate expenses during the period as may be shown and found to have been actually expended by him in the lawful discharge of his duties and necessary for the public service.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NORTHRUP & CHICK.

The bill (S. 360) for the relief of Northrup & Chick was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to examine and adjudicate the claim of Northrup & Chick, late licensed Indian traders with the Pottawatomie Indians in Kansas, for supplies furnished those Indians for their subsistence; to determine the amount thereof justly due Northrup & Chick, and whether there is any fund belonging to those Indians which can be applied to the payment of such claim, and, if so determined, to report and certify the amount found due to Northrup & Chick, without interest, to be paid from the funds of those Indians to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be so paid by him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SILAS P. KELLER.

The bill (S. 361) for the relief of Silas P. Keller was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to examine and adjudicate the claim of Silas P. Keller, late licensed Indian trader with the Pottawatomie Indians in Kansas, for supplies furnished those Indians for their subsistence; to determine the amount thereof justly due, and whether there is any fund belonging to the Indians which can be applied to the payment of such claim.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RULES FOR CANAL NAVIGATION.

The bill (S. 565) providing for the establishment and enforcement of rules and regulations for the use and navigation of United States canals and similar works of navigation, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. I should like to hear from the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], who reported the bill, a statement of it.

Mr. FRYE. It is a bill the draft of which was sent to the Senate by the War Department, and is regarded as absolutely essential for the protection of canals. There is one canal governed by law, but since then the Government has assumed charge of several other canals and there are no laws protecting them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Three canals, the Des Moines Rapids Canal, the St. Marys Falls Canal, and the Louisville and Portland Canal, and the Mississippi jetties will be affected by the bill. The bill proposes to apply the same law to all canals.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, to all canals.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEES FOR CERTIFICATES OF TITLE TO VESSELS.

The bill (S. 564) providing for the collection of fees for furnishing certificates of title to vessels was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes that collectors of customs shall collect $1 for each certificate provided for in section 4194 of the Revised Statutes of the United States from persons or corporations requiring the same; and repeals section 1 of the act of June 19, 1886, entitled "An act abolishing certain fees for official services," so far as it authorizes the payment by the United States of any fee for furnishing such certificate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DECORATIONS FROM LATE HAWAIIAN GOVERNMENT.

The bill (S. 153) authorizing the persons herein named to accept of certain decorations and testimonials from the late Hawaiian Government was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the word "of" in the title, which is probably a misprint, be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). That correction will be made.

UNLADING OF VESSELS.

The bill (S. 661) to amend section 2880 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing time for vessels to unlade, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 2880 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2880. Whenever any merchandise shall be imported into any port of the United States from any foreign port, in any vessel, at the expiration of ten working days if the vessel is less than 500 tons register, and within fifteen working days if it is of 500 tons register and less than 1,000, and within twenty working days if it is of 1,000 tons register and less than 1,500, and within twenty-five working days if it is of 1,500 tons register and upward, not including legal holidays and days when the condition of the weather prevents the unlading of the vessel with safety to its cargo, after the time within which the report of the master of any vessel is required to be made to the collector of the district, if there is found any merchandise other than has been reported for some other district or some foreign port, the collector shall take possession thereof; but with the consent of the owner or consignee of any merchandise, or with the consent of the owner or master of the vessel in which the same may be imported, the merchandise may be taken possession of by the collector after one day's notice to the collector of the district. All merchandise so taken shall be delivered pursuant to the order of the collector of the district, for which a certificate or receipt shall be granted."

Mr. FRYE. The bill is rendered necessary on account of the largely increased size of vessels. When the original law was passed, nearly a hundred years ago, the largest vessels were only 800 tons, but now the largest are from three to five thousand tons, and sufficient time is not given to unlade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

S. W. MARSTON.

The bill (S. 69) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to settle the claims of the legal representatives of S. W. Marston, late United States Indian agent at Union Agency, Ind. T., for services and expenses, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALE OF BONDS.

The resolution submitted by Mr. ELKINS, December 31, 1895, providing that hereafter no bonds of the United States shall be sold at private sale or under private contract, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ELKINS. Let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

STATUE OF MAJ. GEN. JOHN STARK.

The bill (S. 130) for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark in the city of Manchester, N. H., was considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Library with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty"; so as to read:

That the sum of $40,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 16, after the word "until," to insert "a design for said statue shall be accepted by the Secretary of War and the Joint Committee on the Library, and until"; so as to make the additional proviso read:

And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be so expended until a design for said statue shall be accepted by the Secretary of War and the Joint Committee on the Library, and until a suitable lot of land in said Manchester for the erection of said statue shall be conveyed, with all the right, title, and interest therein of the owner thereof, to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply wish to say upon the bill that a similar measure has been up in past Congresses and I voted against it and opposed it. I merely desire to enter on record the fact that I do not approve of the appropriation made in the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state that a similar bill has passed the Senate three different times.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand, and that is the reason why I simply make my record without consuming the time of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is all right.

The bill was passed.

COLUMBIA AND RED MOUNTAIN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The bill (S. 259) granting to the Columbia and Red Mountain Railway Company a right of way through the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out all of the bill after line 20, in the following words:

There is also hereby granted to said company the same right to locate, appropriate, acquire, and use, for all the purposes for which said company is organized, so much of the waters of any streams in said reservation, and not navigable, as may be necessary for such purposes, and the right of way for all necessary ditches, flumes, and pipes to be connected therewith, to the same extent and as fully as said company might or could acquire the same under the laws of the United States if the lands in said reservation were open to settlement and sale, together with the right to locate and select a mill site not to exceed 10 acres, upon which to erect shops or other works; and upon the erection of such shops or other works a patent to such mill site may be acquired in the same manner as mill sites on the public lands.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, granted to the Columbia Red Mountain and Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Washington, a right of way to the extent of 100 feet on each side of the center line of said railway across the Colville Indian Reservation, in the State of Washington, commencing at a point at or near the Little Dalles on the Columbia River, in Stevens County, in said State, and running thence in a northerly direction by the most feasible route to the international boundary line between the United States and British Columbia, together with all the rights granted to railroads by the act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads a right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875; and for the purposes of this grant and the construction of said railway all the provisions of said act are hereby declared to be applicable thereto to the same extent as though the lands in said reservation were open to settlement and sale.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELVIRA BACHELDER.

The bill (S. 147) granting a pension to Elvira Bachelder was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at the rate of $12 per month, the name of Elvira Bachelder, dependent mother of J. K. P. Bachelder, late a private in Company D, Seventh New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HORACE TOWNSEND.

The bill (S. 136) granting an increase of pension to Horace Townsend was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Horace Townsend, late of Company A, Tenth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM W. FRENCH.

The bill (S. 137) granting an increase of pension to William W. French was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William W. French, late of Company B, Sixth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. WISE.

The bill (S. 140) granting a pension to Mary A. Wise was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary A. Wise, widow of Capt. Peter Wise, late of Company I, Eighteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. MURRAY.

The bill (S. 836) for the relief of William J. Murray was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William J. Murray, who served in the Department of the Gulf in the telegraph department in the year 1862, and in the Red River campaign in 1864, the pension to be at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT GAMBLE.

The bill (S. 944) granting a pension to Robert Gamble was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Robert Gamble, a soldier in the Florida Seminole war of 1836.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORENCE W. BUSKIRK.

The bill (S. 619) granting an increase of pension to Florence W. Buskirk was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Florence W. Buskirk, widow of John W. Buskirk, late a corporal in Company G, Forty-ninth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HELEN M. JACOB.

The bill (S. 149) granting a pension to Helen M. Jacob was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Helen M. Jacob, of Rochester, Ind., widow of Benjamin Oden West, deceased, late private in Company C of Mounted Riflemen, in the war with Mexico, and to pay her a pension of $16 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. HELEN MORRELL CARROLL.

The bill (S. 730) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Helen Morrell Carroll, widow of Samuel Sprigg Carroll, late a major-general in the United States Army, at the rate of $75 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH NEW.

The bill (S. 1051) granting a pension to Elizabeth New, widow of Jethrow New, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Elizabeth New, widow of Jethrow New, late captain of Company D, Twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, of the war of 1861.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADA J. SCHWATKA.

The bill (S. 710) granting a pension to Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Frederick Schwatka, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Ada J. Schwatka, widow of the late Frederick Schwatka, late first lieutenant, Third Cavalry, United States Army, at the rate of $30 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAUD ARDELLE BLISS.

The bill (S. 145) granting an increase of pension to Maud Ardelle Bliss was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, after the word "month," at the end of the bill, to insert "payable to her legally constituted guardian"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Maud Ardelle Bliss, dependent and invalid daughter of John W. Bliss, late of Company B, Fourth Regiment Vermont Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, payable to her legally constituted guardian.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Maud Ardelle Bliss."

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understand that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is to address the Senate on the unfinished business. He has very kindly suggested to me that if I ask permission to lay it aside informally until the remaining pension bills on the Calendar are disposed of that course will be agreeable to him. I make that request.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose it will not take very long.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will take a very short time.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask whether the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] prefers to go on to-day after the pension bills are disposed of or at a later day?

Mr. TELLER. It is perfectly immaterial to me whether I shall go on to-day. If anyone desires to proceed with the Calendar that course is entirely satisfactory to me and I shall go on to-morrow.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest, then, that we go on with the Calendar after the pension bills are disposed of. The whole Calendar is very short, and I suggest that we go on with it to-day.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator who has the unfinished business in charge does not object, I certainly do not; and I shall seek an occasion to take the floor to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I have no objection to the arrangement suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire accept the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. Which is, to go on with the Calendar for the rest of to-day's session.

Mr. GALLINGER. That course will be agreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, as modified by the Senator from Massachusetts, that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, without being displaced, and that the Senate proceed with the Calendar under Rule VIII? The Chair hears none. The next bill on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

ELIZABETH E. DONOHOE.

The bill (S. 746) granting a pension to Elizabeth E. Donahue was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 6, to strike out the word "Donahue" and insert "Donohoe"; and, in line 7, to strike out the word "Donahue" and insert the word "Donohoe"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth E. Donohoe, widow of the late Col. Michael T. Donohoe, of the Tenth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. In drafting this bill I made an unfortunate mistake in the amount named. General Donohoe was a very distinguished officer. He was very severely wounded. He never applied for a pension. He might have drawn a great many thousands of dollars from the Treasury. He was a very distinguished member of the Democratic party, a candidate for office, both in New Hampshire and Massachusetts. He died in poverty, leaving a widow. I meant to draft the bill so that she would receive a pension of $50 per month, which is the minimum amount for widows of that class. I move to amend the bill, in line 9, by striking out the word "thirty," before "dollars," and inserting the word "fifty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth E. Donohoe."

DUDLEY F. BROWN.

The bill (S. 1311) granting an increase of pension to Dudley F. Brown was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty-four" and insert "twenty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Dudley F. Brown, late private of Company A, Sixth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving, payable to his legally constituted guardian.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER January 14, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1311) granting an increase of pension to Dudley F. Brown, have examined the same and report:

Claimant under this bill had an honorable military record, and was wounded while in the line of duty. He applied for pension under the general law, but pending the consideration of his claim became so necessitous that he sought relief under the act of June 27, 1890, and was pensioned at the rate of $12 per month, which amount he now draws. Shortly after being pensioned he showed signs of insanity, and is now confined in the New Hampshire Asylum for the Insane, at Concord, N. H., a hopeless lunatic. The affidavit of Dr. Charles P. Bancroft, superintendent of said asylum, is as follows:

"NEW HAMPSHIRE ASYLUM,
"Concord, N. H., January 7, 1896.

"DEAR SIR: At the request of Weare N. Shaw, the guardian of Dudley F. Brown, I hereby depose and say that Dudley F. Brown is in a state of chronic delusional insanity. He has been here twice. The first time he was committed here on the 11th of August, 1892. He had a history then of having been insane about three years. His case apparently was one of organic disease of the brain.

"He had hallucinations of hearing and the persistent delusions that are characteristic of long-continued insanity.

"After his commitment at the asylum he continued very nicely for a while, and so far improved that his wife thought it was reasonably safe to try him out again. He was discharged from the asylum after this first commitment on the 5th of May, 1893.

"Two months after he left the asylum he appeared quite rational, and then he began to make unusual remarks. He complained of the heat of the sun, and was unable to work out of doors except in the cool of the day. He endeavored to make shoes, his trade being that of a shoemaker, but he could not apply his mind continuously. He complained of his head quite constantly, and it was not long before he began to manifest delusions that batteries were at work on his head and that somebody was discharging electricity through his body.

"He could not sleep nights because of these morbid ideas and sensations. He finally grew more confused and dazed, remaining out in the woods all night without any covering, and was recommitted at the asylum on the 9th of February, 1894.

"His condition is evidently one of structural brain disease, and there is no probability that he will ever regain his natural state of mind, and it is also quite certain that he can never be self-supporting and must always depend upon the charity of others for his maintenance.

"CHARLES P. BANCROFT, M. D.,
"Superintendent New Hampshire Asylum for Insane.

"Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER."

"Personally appeared before me the above-named Charles P. Bancroft and took oath that the above statements made by him concerning the mental condition of Dudley F. Brown are true.

"J. H. CASE, Justice of Peace.

"JANUARY 7, 1896."

This case is one that strongly and properly appeals to Congress for relief. Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out, in line 8, the word "twenty-four" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twenty," and that as amended the bill do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA R. HITCHCOCK.

The bill (S. 585) granting an increase of pension to Martha R. Hitchcock was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "fifty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Martha R. Hitchcock, widow of Maj. Gen. Ethan Allen Hitchcock, for forty-three years a soldier in the Army of the United States, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAPOLEON B. BREEDLOVE.

The bill (S. 341) granting an increase of pension to Napoleon B. Breedlove was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 8, before the word "dollars," to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll as entitled to increase of pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Napoleon B. Breedlove, late of Company G, Fourth Louisiana Volunteers, Mexican war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER January 14, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 341) granting a pension to Napoleon B. Breedlove, have examined the same, and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, referred to the Committee on Pensions, examined, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The facts are as follows:

The petitioner, Napoleon B. Breedlove, was a private in Company G of the Fourth Regiment of Louisiana Volunteers. He enlisted on the 13th day of May, 1846, and was discharged the 8th of August, 1846, having served two months and twenty-seven days, and has been receiving a pension of $8 per month from January 29, 1887, and subsequently increased to $12, which he is now receiving on account of his services in the Mexican war of 1846; is 68 years of age and totally blind, and in such destitute circumstances that $12 a month is insufficient to provide him with the necessaries of life. It is alleged that he is suffering with a lame back and wholly unable to do any manual labor of any kind, and has no property, either real or personal, and no income except his pension as furnished by the Government.

Mr. F. G. Audran testifies by affidavit that he has been acquainted with the petitioner for the past twenty years; that he knows him to be a constant sufferer from sore eyes ever since he knew him, both eyes being affected all the time, which has incapacitated him for any and all kinds of work, and for the last ten years his eyes have been very decidedly growing weak, and now he is in a pitiful and helpless condition, not being able to see his way, and is also a sufferer from pain in back or lumbago and disease of the kidneys, which has troubled him constantly for the past fifteen years. Whatever income he had, he spent all his means for remedies for relief for his troubles during his family's destitute circumstances, and is now suffering with all the disabilities mentioned, and with no means of having himself treated. He is very old and quite feeble, is totally unable to do any kind of work, and he has no property, either personal or real, which brings him any income. His only means of subsistence is the $12 pension he gets from the Government.

William Wilson, aged 82, of Fansland, Ind. T., testifies that he has been acquainted with the petitioner for the last forty years and intimately for the last twenty years, and he knows that he has suffered with the eyes and has become so blind that he can not make his way anywhere without assistance, and also suffered from a lame back caused by an affliction of the kidneys, and for years has been unable to do any manual labor of any kind; has no property, either real or personal, and only the income which he receives from the Government of $12 per month. A petition is also signed by a number of reputable citizens, certified by the president of the First National Bank of Muscogee, Ind. T., which citizens state that he is so blind that he has to use a staff to be guided, and is not able to make a living for himself or for his family; that he is entirely helpless, and was compelled to cease all active pursuits some years ago on account of his failing—blindness.

The mayor of Seneca and other citizens testify that they knew him to be an honest and upright man; that he is unable to do anything toward the support of his family on account of feebleness. A number of other citizens of Prairie City, Ind. T., certify to the same effect.

The fact of his poverty and blindness and present condition in life, that he is unable to maintain his family by reason of his disabilities, is abundantly supported by a mass of evidence indisputable, and it is therefore unnecessary to make it cumulative by setting forth, specifically, affidavits. It also appears that all his business has to be transacted by other persons, and that he was postmaster at Prairie City for nearly four years, and his affliction was the prime cause of his discontinuing the service as postmaster, and his efficiency as a business man, before he became totally disabled by the loss of his sight, added materially toward the support of his family, which is also certified to by the president of the bank of Seneca and other reputable citizens.

Your committee, therefore, in view of the fact of his total blindness and inability to provide either for himself or for his family at his advanced age, and the abundant and high character of the citizens who testify in his behalf as to his condition, therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment.

Strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "thirty."

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHARINE DILLON.

The bill (S. 148) granting a pension to Catharine Dillon was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twelve"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catharine Dillon, of Logansport, Ind., widow of Patrick Dillon, deceased, late a private of Company E, Ninth Regiment of Illinois Cavalry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER January 14, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 148) granting a pension to Catharine Dillon, have examined the same, and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, referred to the Committee on Pensions, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The facts are as follows:

She is the widow of Patrick Dillon, deceased, who served in Company E, Ninth Regiment Illinois Cavalry, from 1861 to 1863. The husband, from the evidence, was a good and faithful soldier up to the time of his death, in 1863, while he was yet in the service.

The pension claim of the widow has been rejected by the Bureau on the ground that the death of the soldier did not occur by reason of the service, although it occurred while he was in the service, but we are strongly inclined to the opinion, as shown by the circumstances in evidence, that the death of the soldier was actually due to his military service, though the precise manner of his death is not known.

The claimant is 66 years of age. She is very poor, having no property or income, and has been supported by the charity of her friends for some time past. She is broken in health and unable to do manual labor of any kind.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "twenty," in line 9 of the bill, and insert the word "twelve" instead thereof, so that the petitioner shall be pensioned at the rate of $12 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH W. FISHER.

The bill (S. 640) to increase the pension of Joseph W. Fisher was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "one hundred"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Joseph W. Fisher, late colonel of the One hundred and ninety-fifth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, at the rate of $72 per month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. GALLINGER January 14, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 640) granting a pension to Joseph W. Fisher, have examined the same and report:

A similar bill was introduced in the Fifty-third Congress, referred to the Committee on Pensions, examined, reported favorably, and passed the Senate.

The facts are as follows:

The object of the bill is to increase the pension of Gen. Joseph W. Fisher, late colonel of the One hundred and ninety-fifth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, from $30 per month to $72 per month.

General Fisher, at the breaking out of the civil war, entered the service as a lieutenant-colonel of the Fifth Pennsylvania Reserves, and in July, 1862, he was promoted to the colonency of the regiment. He served as such for a full term of three years, the time of enlistment. Being mustered out, he raised the One hundred and ninety-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and at the expiration of their term of enlistment he again raised a regiment known as the One hundred and ninety-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. He continued in the service until January 31, 1866, when he was finally mustered out.

He was engaged in all the battles in which his regiments participated, frequently received the compliments of his superior officers, was recommended for the position of brigadier-general, and was appointed brigadier-general by brevet in 1865. He performed conspicuous service at the famous Little Round Top at the battle of Gettysburg.

At the time General Fisher first enlisted he was past the military age, but he served during the entire war and came out of the war broken down in health, and has suffered from the exposures and hardships of the war ever since. He has had four different strokes of paralysis; he is 80 years old, and is well-nigh helpless. He is by profession a lawyer. He held the office of associate justice and the office of chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Wyoming for a number of years. He has no means of support, and is totally disabled for mental and physical work.

A petition signed by several hundred representative citizens of his town (which is hereto annexed with the omission of the signatures) gives a statement of his condition mentally and physically, while the affidavits of two representative physicians, who are members of the pension board of examiners (hereto annexed and made a part of this report), confirm the statements contained in the petition.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out in line 7 of the bill the words "one hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "seventy-two," as this will grant to General Fisher a pension equivalent to that provided for privates in the volunteer service who are totally disabled.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN CLYDE SULLIVAN.

The bill (S. 1037) for the relief of John Clyde Sullivan was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the President to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reappoint John Clyde Sullivan a paymaster in the Navy with the relative rank of lieutenant-commander at the foot of the list of paymasters having the relative rank of lieutenant-commander.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let a part of the report be read. I do not call for the reading of the entire report, as it is very voluminous, but some reason ought to appear on the record for the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read from the report submitted by Mr. PERKINS January 14, 1896, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1037) for the relief of John Clyde Sullivan, after careful consideration, make the following report:

This bill was favorably reported by this committee at the last session of Congress and passed the Senate, but failed to receive action in the House.

Mr. Sullivan was a paymaster in the Navy. He was tried before a court-martial at the navy-yard, Mare Island, Cal., July 26, 1893, on charges of rendering false and fraudulent returns and making a false and fraudulent official report, in violation of article 14 of the Articles for the Government of the Navy; of disobeying the lawful order of the Secretary of the Navy, and of embezzling the public moneys. The court, in August, 1893, found him guilty of these charges and sentenced him to be dismissed from the service, and the President, on January 31, 1894, approved the sentence.

The bill authorizes the President to reappoint Mr. Sullivan as a paymaster at the foot of the grade which he occupied at the time of his dismissal.

The committee are well aware that in no ordinary case of this character would they be warranted in making a favorable report. Such report is now made upon the conviction that a serious wrong has been done to an upright and worthy officer. In saying this it is not intended to charge that any injustice was intended either by the court, Secretary, or the President. The committee do not believe there was. But upon a careful examination of the evidence adduced before the court-martial and such additional evidence as has been brought to their attention they are satisfied the sentenee was an error that should, so far as possible, be rectified.

A paymaster in the Navy is required by the regulations to make two kinds of reports, or periodical statements, to the Navy and Treasury Departments. The first is to be rendered at the close of each calendar month, and is known as a monthly summary statement. Copies of this are sent to both the Navy and Treasury Departments. The name indicates, to some extent, its character. While it purports to give expenditures and receipts, and the disbursements of clothing and small stores, it is not accompanied by vouchers, and is not the report upon which the accounts of the paymaster with the Government are settled.

The other report required is called the quarterly account current. Upon this report the Treasury Department settles the paymaster's accounts every three months. The regulations require it to show all receipts and expenditures, with vouchers for open purchases and all contingent bills, properly approved by the captain and receipted, and a complete statement of the small stores and clothing account, with the receipts of other disbursing officers; also a full statement of all moneys received for provisions. The original of this report, with its accompanying papers, goes to the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury for official action, and a duplicate is also forwarded by the paymaster to the Navy Department. Upon this report only is predicated the financial relation of the paymaster to the Government.

The monthly summary statement has its use in informing the Navy and Treasury Departments at more frequent intervals of the condition of the paymaster's accounts, whether he is or is not in need of stores or funds, and serves as a check upon undue requisitions for either. But in the instructions printed upon the blanks furnished for this kind of report, the amounts which the paymaster credits to the hospital fund during the quarter on account of pay, and on account of rations for sick in hospital, are only required to be entered in the reports for March, June, September, and December. Thus there are two months in each quarter that the monthly statement is not required to set forth all the paymaster's expenditures. It is in evidence from the officers of the Treasury Department that these monthly statements are not used in any way in making the quarterly settlement. They seem to have no function ordinarily other than as here stated.

The distinction between these two kinds of reports which are required of the paymasters is important, as the material charges before the court-martial rest upon the monthly statements made by Mr. Sullivan, and do not rest at all upon his quarterly accounts current.

The committee find that the gravamen of all the charges is embezzlement. If the accused is innocent of having appropriated the funds of the United States to his own use, then the most that can be deduced from all the other accusations would be want of accuracy and carelessness in signing his monthly statements. The committee are fully convinced there was no embezzlement.

Mr. Sullivan kept a paymaster's account with the subtreasury in San Francisco, and one with the subtreasury in New York. A portion of the public funds was always kept in a safe on board for daily current use. If he embezzled any money it would have to be taken from one of the depositories by check, or taken from the funds he kept on hand. It is now perfectly evident that all checks made on the subtreasury accounts were proper and legitimate. Those accounts have been closed and the vouchers examined by the proper officers and found correct. It is true that a list of checks drawn on New York was submitted by the Navy Department to the President with the findings of the court-martial, with the allegation that part of them must have been drawn by the accused for his own illegal use. All these are now duly accounted for, and the committee allude to this point in another part of their report.

If, then, Mr. Sullivan embezzled, he must have taken the money from the amount which he kept aboard. Let us see if that was possible. The summary statements upon which the charges of embezzlement were based begin with the one rendered for July, 1891. The court found that during that month the accused appropriated to his own use the sum of $6,279.09. A copy of this report is before the committee; also a copy of the report for the month previous. The June report shows that Sullivan had on board in cash at the close of that month $17,223. Hence he commenced July with that much money. During July the deposits in his money chest aggregated $555, making total cash receipts aboard for the month of $17,778. The summary shows that he disbursed, all told, during the month $4,650.95. Of this amount he paid by checks, which were cashed at the subtreasury the following month, $699, leaving a balance to be paid in coin of $3,951.95, which, being deducted from the cash on hand, left in the ship's chest, according to this calculation, at the end of July, the sum of $13,826.05. The commander of the ship, who counted the money on the 31st day of July, duly certifies on the summary statement that he found there on hand $13,970.05, being an excess of $44.

Owing to the difficulty of determining exactly what portion of the disbursements was made by check on the subtreasury, we do not claim absolute accuracy for the above deduction. Yet it is sufficiently accurate to utterly disprove any allegation of embezzlement to the extent of $6,279.09, as found by the court-martial.

Another analysis of the various returns made by the paymaster during the first quarter of the fiscal year 1892 also completely meets the allegations of embezzlements made during the first two months. The summary statement for the last month of the preceding quarter showed the paymaster to have on hand in the depositories and in the ship's chest $43,669. This was taken up on the July summary statement. The three statements for July, August, and September show receipts as follows:

In July, taken up from June		$43,699.00
In July, current receipts		555.00
In August, current receipts		1,005.00
In September, current receipts		5,510.00
Total receipts for the quarter		50,739.00
The expenditures, as per the monthly statements, were:
For July	$4,650.95
For August	4,035.79
For September	12,057.09
		20,743.83
Balance due United States September 30		29,995.17
The accounts from the two depositories show, on September 30, as follows:
Balance in New York	$7,633.33
Outstanding checks	628.00
Actual balance		$7,005.33
Balance in San Francisco	13,468.78
Outstanding checks	2,510.10
Actual balance		10,938.68
Total to his credit in depositories		17,964.01
He had on hand, as counted by the commander		12,490.92
Grand total to his credit		30,454.93

The amount due the United States at the end of this quarter, as shown by his three summary statements given above, was $29,995.17. This leaves a balance in his favor of $459.75.

Again, in the charges made before the court, based on the summary statements for July and August, 1891, it is alleged that Sullivan embezzled during July $6,279.09, and during the month of August, $5,309.99. There is no charge made against the accuracy or honesty of his summary for the month of September. If the quarterly return made to the Fourth Auditor for the quarter composed of these three months was found accurate, and fully accounted for the funds which he had on hand at the beginning of the quarter and such additional amounts as were placed to his credit during the three months in question, then he either did not embezzle and appropriate to his own use the $11,589.08 of which the court found him guilty during July and August, or else he returned the amount by depositing it at the subtreasury, or adding it to the "balance due the United States in hand." But the subtreasury accounts show that there were no deposits, great or small, to his credit during either month of the quarter. Did he then add the large amount to his cash on hand during the month of September, and previous to the count for that month? This is not conceivable.

At the end of July the cash in the chest was $13,970.05; at the end of August, $12,336.26, and at the end of September, $12,490.92. Either these sums were on hand at these several dates, or the commander of the ship (Commander C. S. Cotton) was in a conspiracy with the paymaster to rob the United States. He certifies at the bottom of each return:

"I have examined all the above money items of receipts and expenditure, as well as the balance of cash on hand, and find the same correctly stated."

Commander Cotton also testified at the court-martial that he always counted this cash with great care, having it brought from the safes and placed on his table, and counted by himself, and counted in his presence by the paymaster and his clerk.

Having in mind the three items of "Cash on hand" at the end of each month, can it be possible that the paymaster brought from some private source and placed in his safe, to be counted on the last day of September, the large sum of $11,589.08? It is not probable that he would have restored in August any of the money alleged to have been embezzled in July. According to the finds, he was still embezzling.

On the 31st day of August (September 1) there was on hand, as counted by the commander, $12,336.26. If to this be added the alleged embezzlements for the two preceding months ($11,589.08) we have $23,925.34. The deposits that month in the ship's chest aggregated $5,510, making all told to be counted as cash $29,435.34. The returns and vouchers show the expenditures for September to have been $12,057.09. Of this amount about $7,560.75 was paid by check on the subtreasury. This would leave but $4,496.34 to be paid from the money chest. Deducting this from the money which must have been on hand under the circumstances as above stated, to wit, $29,435.34, we have a remainder, ostensibly, in the paymaster's safe of $24,939. Yet the commander certifies that he found only $12,490.92.

By an inspection of the various charges and specifications presented to the court-martial it will be seen that most of the allegations of fraud are predicated on entries in the summary statements, showing larger sums to the credit of the paymaster in the subtreasuries than really existed. And upon these alleged shortages are based the charge of embezzlement. There are two ways apparent upon the record, as it is now before us, that these discrepancies are subject to explanation,

1. It seems to have been a custom of the paymaster, while the ship was on a cruise, to make purchase of supplies, such as coal, from time to time during the current quarter, paying for such purchases when made by checks and taking receipts. These receipts he did not enter on his summary statements for the first or second months of the quarter, but reported his balances in the subtreasuries as if such checks had not been given. During the third month of the quarter these receipts were frequently consolidated into a new receipt, which the parties furnishing the supplies would sign. The accumulated receipts were at the end of the quarter forwarded to the Fourth Auditor as vouchers to the quarterly current statement. They had not appeared upon either of the summary statements for the first two months.

This is illustrated in the three summaries for the first quarter of the fiscal year of 1892 (July, August, and September, 1891), of which we have already had occasion to speak. Neither the July nor the August summary shows any purchases of coal, but the September summary shows disbursements for coal to the amount of $5,832, and the itemized statement attached shows that 131 tons were purchased July 11, 120 tons August 4, 91 tons August 24, and 95 tons September 15. All of this coal was paid for on the days when purchased. The Mohican was then cruising in the Bering Sea. The coal was bought of Rudolph Neumann, as general agent of the Alaska Commercial Company, at Unalaska, in Alaska. Thus the Navy Department was apprised, by the summary for the third month in the quarter and its accompanying abstract of "public bills," of what had been expended during the whole quarter in this class of purchase.

Of the wisdom or propriety of this course the committee express no opinion. But it was a custom that must have been known to the Navy Department if these summary statements received any inspection, and it readily explains certain apparent misstatements in the entries on the summaries for the first two months of the quarter. For instance, Mr. Sullivan purchased 131 tons of coal, at $13.50 per ton, in July, and gave his check for the amount. This would amount to $1,768.50. The receipt for this amount was in his safe on the last day of the month, when the summary for that month was made up. He was not sure the outstanding check had reached the depository and been paid. Then, instead of charging his summary account with an expenditure of that amount, he simply made the entry against the subtreasury, as if the check had not been issued.

When the Navy Department came to make up the case against Mr. Sullivan they had the itemized accounts from the subtreasuries, and found that, at the end of a given month, where he had reported certain sums to his credit, there was a less sum, as checks issued during the month in question had been paid, and, further, what was found to his credit was subject to further diminution by reason of outstanding checks.

2. Another way in which the differences between what Sullivan alleged in his statements to be in the subtreasury at the end of the month and what was actually found to be there when the subtreasury account came to be stated can frequently be accounted for, in this: It often occurred that on the last day of the month, or the last day but one, he would make a check for cash to be used on board. This check would be placed in the hands of an express company to collect at the subtreasury and return the proceeds to the ship. When the summary was made up this check was outstanding. It may have been in transit to San Francisco, or the proceeds may have been on the way to the vessel. In any event the coin was not on board, and the amount of the check was not deducted from his balance at the subtreasury. Such checks, of course, were dated within the month for which the summary was made, and, in some cases, may have been actually paid within that month. If not so paid they were "outstanding checks," as set out in the specifications, chargeable to the account.

An examination of the account of the San Francisco subtreasury shows the entry of such checks, as follows:

Made.	Paid.	Amount.
November 30, 1891	December	$1,800
December 30, 1891	January	1,500
January 30, 1892	February	3,000
February 29, 1892	March	4,000
April 28, 1892	May	2,500
July 26, 1892	August	1,580
November 30, 1892	December	1,000
December 30, 1892	January	3,000
February 27, 1893	March	1,000

The paymaster evidently considered the summary reports as an approximate statement from month to month of a continuous open account. There was no attempt to make them absolutely accurate. His obvious thought was that such apparent inaccuracies as grew out of his retaining vouchers for coal and other supplies during the first two months of the quarter, and reporting the several amounts as in the subtreasury, and of reporting in the subtreasury the amount of checks drawn the last days of the month for cash to be used on board, would be set right in the quarterly current statement.

That he did render the required quarterly statements with regularity, and duly transmit with them the necessary vouchers, throughout his entire connection with the Mohican and the Independence, the time within which he was charged and convicted of embezzling, in the aggregate, the enormous sum of $52,151.99, is apparent from the following letters addressed to a member of the committee from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury and the Fourth Auditor:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 24, 1894.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 19th instant, asking for information in regard to the accounts of John Clyde Sullivan, late a paymaster in the United States Navy, for use of the Committee on Naval Affairs in connection with Senate bill No. 1655, I have the honor to transmit herewith a report of the Fourth Auditor of the 22d instant, covering the information desired.

Respectfully, yours, W. E. CURTIS, Acting Secretary.

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, United States Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE FOURTH AUDITOR,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1894.

SIR: Your letter of the 19th instant to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury relative to the accounts of John Clyde Sullivan, late a paymaster in the United States Navy, has been referred to this office.

"In reply thereto you are informed that the accounts of Paymaster John Clyde Sullivan, of the Mohican and Independence, were rendered to this office for settlement with but little delay, which delay was satisfactorily explained, and he has accounted to the Treasury for all moneys intrusted to him for disbursements, and has deposited all balances due the United States except the sum of $150.88, due by his final account current of the Independence, which amount was offset by pay due him at the date of rendering his final accounts of that ship.

"He has never been called upon to make any deposits of Government funds in consequence of the proceedings and finding of a naval court-martial.

"Respectfully,

"C. B. MORTON, Auditor.

"Hon. GEO. C. PERKINS,
"United States Senate."

There will also be found attached, as an exhibit to this report, a copy of a certified statement made by the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury, in which is set out the total expenditures and total receipts of John Clyde Sullivan, paymaster, United States Navy, from March 31, 1891, to May 5, 1893, covering the time he served on board the two steamers, Mohican and Independence. The summary found at the foot of this statement is as follows:

Total receipts as shown by account current	$234,211.19
Total expenditures	220,117.83
Balance deposited	14,093.36

Attached to this statement, and as a part of it, is a further statement entitled: "Expenditures, as shown by summary statements, from December 16, 1890, to May 5, 1893."

In this latter statement the expenditures are put down for each month, but the months are grouped into quarters and the footings for each quarter given. An examination shows that the aggregate expenditures for each quarter thus made up by months from the summary statements rendered the Paymaster-General by Mr. Sullivan tallies exactly with the expenditures set forth on the quarterly returns on which the Treasury Department settled his accounts, with the exception of a single quarter. The "Quarterly" for December 31, 1892, showed total expenditures of $34,034.93, while the sum of expenditures on the three monthly statements for that same quarter showed $34,176.95—a discrepancy of $142.02. This is remarkable. Here are summary statements running through more than two years, most of them being made while the paymaster was on board his vessel cruising in the Bering Sea. But the vouchers which accompany the quarterly statements, when all rounded up, tally with the disbursements set down in the summaries, with only a difference in a single quarter of the small item of $142.02.

It will be seen that the committee have thus far confined their report largely to the question of whether or not the paymaster could have been guilty of embezzlement. As was said at the outset, this is the material matter in the charges upon which he was tried. If he was not guilty of this crime he should not have been dismissed. It is evident from a statement in the files of the case, made by the Secretary to the President, that the Navy Department takes the same view. In a long letter reviewing the case the Secretary deals principally with the question of embezzlement. It is not the purpose of the committee to follow and discuss all the topics he touches upon. But it is apparent that the Secretary felt that the case of embezzlement was not strong if it rested simply upon the discrepancies between the statements made by Sullivan in the summaries as to the amounts to his credit in the subtreasuries on a fixed date and the amounts actually found there on that date. It was necessary to find where and when he had drawn money from those accounts to appropriate to his own use. Accordingly, on pages 16 and 17 the Secretary makes the following statement:

"By reference to Exhibit Z-20 of the record it will be seen upon the credit side of the account that after Paymaster Sullivan left the Mohican he paid, on account of that ship, bills amounting to $118.50 only, and deducted for pay of himself and clerk $1,127.52, or a total of $1,246.02. Turning to Exhibit Z-29-30 of the record, Paymaster Sullivan's account with the subtreasurer at New York, it will be seen that he checked out—

March 11	$45
March 14	100
March 13	50
March 13	264
March 13	274
April 12	100
April 22	500
April 21	21
April 3	133
April 24	25

"If we deduct the amount, $1,246.02, with which he credited himself in his monthly summary statement for March and April, 1893, which included the pay of himself and clerk and all other moneys he had a right to draw for, we find that Paymaster Sullivan must have used the sum of $1,516.98 for his own purposes. There is no escaping this conclusion. The two exhibits named above are both in evidence, and Mr. Sullivan has never attempted, either by testimony or argument, to make any explanation of this fact. Remembering that he drew during the months of March and April and up to the 3d of May from the Mohican deposits in the subtreasury this large sum, drawing it from day to day as he seemed to have use for it, and as he would naturally do if using it for his own purposes, the proof that he was converting Government funds to his own use is conclusive beyond the possibility of a doubt."

Now, whatever may have been the omissions of the accused or his counsel at the trial before the court-martial to explain the items appearing to have been checked from the subtreasuries, it is now in proof before us that each check set out above, making up the aggregate of $2,763, was drawn for a proper and legitimate purpose and duly paid. The committee had the canceled checks brought from the Treasury Department to the committee room. It will be seen that the Secretary admits that of the whole amount the sum of $1,246.02 might have been properly drawn. The latter sum was due to meet the paymaster's salary and that of his clerk, and pay $118.50 of bills for the ship.

The evidence of the checks themselves show that the following ones appearing in the Secretary's list were drawn against the paymaster's own salary:

March 11	$45
March 14	100
April 12	100
April 22	500
April 21	21
April 3	133
Making in all	924

Then the check drawn March 13 for $50 was to pay the clerk (Norbey). Deducting these amounts from the whole sum given leaves $1,789. This amount is accounted for by the following four checks, the first three being given in payment of bills due merchants, and to their respective orders, for provisions furnished the messes of the U. S. S. Mohican, and the one for $1,000, drawn May 3, for the transfer of funds from the subtreasury in New York, for disbursements while on duty, as follows:

March 11, to James Brownlie	$251
March 13, to James McCudden	264
March 12, to Corcoran & Collins	274
May 3, to John Clyde Sullivan	1,000
In all	1,787

The receipts for the above amounts paid for provisions are in the possession of the committee. Thus every item that the Secretary has given, and on which he founds the allegation that they furnished "the proof that the accused was converting Government funds to his own use is conclusive beyond the possibility of a doubt," is proven to have been quite legitimate.

There is one item of $1,552.20 received from the sale of provisions to officers and their messes on board the Mohican, which Mr. Sullivan charged against himself, but it is not accounted for on his cash returns. This item deserves separate and special attention. When the Mohican started for an extended cruise in Bering Sea an unusual supply of provisions was taken aboard. These were stored in all parts of the vessel where room could be found, and outside of the usual storerooms provided, thus preventing the ordinary supervision and care of such stores. Throughout the cruise the quarterly statements of Paymaster Sullivan were duly made and verified by the commanding officer of the ship. It was at the end of the cruise, extending through more than two years, when the final inventory was taken for transfer to his relief that a shortage of $1,520.62 was discovered.

This amount is equal to at least three times the amount of provisions which could have been sold on any ship of the Navy of that class during one quarter. In the confusion resulting from a summary removal an inventory was hurriedly made and the shortage developed. Knowing that in this alleged shortage there must be an error which would be straightened when the accounts came to be settled finally, Mr. Sullivan very properly charged himself with the entire amount for which he was liable, leaving an open question between himself and his bondsmen and the Treasury Department, which question was to be settled when his affairs were finally adjusted. The committee can not find in this transaction anything other than an honorable course on Mr. Sullivan's part, and the settlement effected at the Treasury Department in regard to this item sustains the committee in its opinion.

In closing this report the committee unhesitatingly state that they give some weight in determining the probabilities of the innocence of the accused to his long and honorable career in the service of his country. He entered the Army during the late war of the rebellion as a drummer boy at the age of 12 years. He served throughout the war, and upon the recommendation of a number of eminent soldiers, who knew of his most creditable services in the Army, he was appointed by President Grant an assistant paymaster in the Navy, and served in that office for more than twenty-three years. During that time he disbursed more than $1,000,000 of money, and the Treasury Department passed all his accounts without question. Up to the time of the court-martial in question no breath of defamation had touched his high character for honor and honesty. It will be a sad day for the Republic when such a reputation counts for nothing in meeting charges of crime.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MOUNTAIN VIEW CEMETERY ASSOCIATION.

The joint resolution (S. R. 15) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to donate to the Mountain View Cemetery Association, at Oakland, Cal., certain cannon, etc., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, to add the following:

Provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense in connection with the donation of the articles referred to.

So as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to donate and deliver, under such conditions as he may deem necessary in order to insure the proper fulfillment of the purposes of this resolution, to the Mount View Cemetery Association, at Oakland, Cal., such old and unused cannon, muskets, swords, and other implements of war, of copper, tin, bronze, iron, and steel, as are not now and will not hereafter be required for naval uses, for the purpose of being used for parades, anniversary celebrations, and salutes: Provided, That such articles only be donated, under the authority herein contained, as in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy may be spared without detriment to the public interests: Provided further, That the United States shall not be subjected to any expense in connection with the donation of the articles referred to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read in that case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, January 14, 1896.

The committee recommend the passage of this bill, with the provision suggested in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, which is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 11, 1896.

SIR: In reply to the letter of the committee, dated the 7th instant, referring to joint resolution No. 15, "authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to donate to the Mountain View Cemetery Association, at Oakland, Cal., certain cannon, etc.," and requesting to be advised as to the views of the Department in regard to said resolution, I have the honor to inform you that, the matter having been referred to the Bureau of Ordnance for report, that Bureau has submitted the following expression of opinion:

As this resolution donates only such articles as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy, can be spared without detriment to the public interests, the Bureau sees no objection to its passage.'

The Department concurs in the views expressed by the Bureau of Ordnance, but would suggest that a further provision be inserted in this resolution to the effect that the United States shall not be subjected to any expense in connection with the donation of the articles referred to.

Very respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM BROWN.

The bill (S. 466) granting a pension to William Brown, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of William Brown, late of Company D, Eighth Regiment Michigan Cavalry, at $20 a month, in lieu of the pension he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to William Brown."

MOLLIE CRANDALL.

The bill (S. 507) to pension Mollie Crandall was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mollie Crandall, widow of Clark P. Crandall, deceased, and late captain of Company C, First Regiment Oregon Volunteer Infantry, and pay her $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES F. HOLLY.

The bill (S. 1303) granting an increase of pension to Charles F. Holly was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "rate of," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "fifty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles F. Holly, late captain of Company H, of the Second Colorado Cavalry, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HELEN L. DENT.

The bill (S. 748) granting an increase of pension to Helen L. Dent was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 7, after the words "rate of," to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "fifty"; so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Helen L. Dent, widow of the late Frederick T. Dent, colonel, retired, United States Army, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the sum of $30 per month now received.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY DOUBLEDAY.

The bill (S. 1203) granting an increase of pension to Mary Doubleday, widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary Doubleday, widow of Maj. Gen. Abner Doubleday, and to pay her a pension of $100 per month, in lieu of the pension she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1176) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River, between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post road," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT ST. LOUIS.

The bill (S. 214) authorizing the construction of a bridge over the Mississippi River to the city of St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, from some suitable point between the north line of St. Clair County, Ill., and the southwest line of said county, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 9, line 1, after the first word, "That," to strike out "all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are repealed, and"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE NEAR CHAMBERLAIN, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 636) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Chamberlain, in Brule County and Lyman County, in the State of South Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That it shall be lawful for the Dakota Pacific Bridge Company, a corporation now being organized for that purpose under the general corporation laws of the State of South Dakota, or its assigns, to construct under and subject to the conditions and limitations hereinafter provided, a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, within 5 miles above or below the city of Chamberlin, S. Dak., and lay on and over said bridge railway tracks for the more perfect connection of any and all railroads that are now or which may hereafter be constructed to the Missouri River at or within 5 miles above or below the city of Chamberlain, S. Dak., or to the river on the opposite side of the same, near the city of Chamberlain, S. Dak., and build, erect, and lay on and over said bridge ways for wagons, vehicles of all kinds, and for the transit of animals, and to provide ways for foot passengers, and to maintain and operate said bridge for the purposes aforesaid; and that when said bridge is constructed all trains of railroads terminating at said river and on the opposite side thereof, at or within 5 miles above or below the city of Chamberlain, S. Dak., shall be allowed to cross said bridge and its approaches for reasonable compensation to be made to the owners of the same; and if the amount of said compensation can not be agreed upon by the parties, the same shall be fixed by the Secretary of War. The owners of said bridge may also charge and receive reasonable compensation or tolls for the transit over said bridge of all wagons, carriages, vehicles, animals, and foot passengers: Provided, That the Secretary of War may at any time prescribe such rules, regulations, and rates of toll for transit and transportation over said bridge as may be deemed proper and reasonable.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the corporation building the same, be built as a drawbridge, or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the same shall be made of unbroken or continuous spans, it shall not be in any case of less elevation than 50 feet above extreme high-water mark as understood at the point of location to the lowest part of the superstructure, with straight girders, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than 300 feet in the clear at low-water mark; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river at high water, and the main spans shall be over the main channels of the river: And provided also, That if a bridge shall be built under this act as a drawbridge, the same shall be constructed as a pivot drawbridge, with one or more draws, as the Secretary of War may prescribe, and with spans of not less than 200 feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot piers of the draws, and the next adjoining spans over the river to the draw shall not be less than 250 feet in the clear, measured at low water; and said span shall not be less than 10 feet above extreme high-water mark, measuring to the lowest part of the superstructure of the bridge; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river at high water: And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly, upon reasonable signal, without unnecessary delay, for the passage of boats and rafts; and said company or corporation shall maintain, at its own expense, from sunset till sunrise, such lights or other signals on said bridge as the Light-House Board shall prescribe, and such sheer booms or other structures as may be necessary to safely guide vessels, rafts, or other water craft safely through said channel spans or draw openings, and as shall be designated and required by the Secretary of War: And provided further, That the corporation building said bridge may, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, enter upon the banks of said river, either above or below the point of location of said bridge, and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel, and to do whatever may be necessary to accomplish said object, but shall not impede or obstruct the navigation of said river, and shall be liable in damages for all injuries to private property, and all plans for such works or erections upon the banks of the river shall first be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval: And provided further, That any bridge built under the provisions of this act shall be at right angles to the current of the river at high water.

SEC. 3. That no bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and the said company shall submit to the Secretary of War for his approval drawings showing the plan and location of said bridge, and until the said plan and location of the bridge are decided by the Secretary of War to be such as will not materially affect the interests of navigation and are approved by him the bridge shall not be commenced or built; and any change in the plan of such construction or any alteration in the bridge after its construction shall be subject to the like approval; and whenever said bridge shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, substantially obstruct the free navigation of said river, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge, or the persons operating or controlling the same; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of the Missouri River, at or near the crossing of said bridge, caused or alleged to be caused thereby, the cause shall be commenced and tried in the circuit courts of the United States of either judicial district of South Dakota in which the said bridge or any portion of such obstruction touches.

SEC. 4. That any bridge built under this act and according to its limitations shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of the mails, the troops, and the munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for the transportation over the railroad or public highways leading to such bridge. The United States shall also have the right to construct, without charge therefor, telegraph or telephone lines across said bridge.

SEC. 5. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

SEC. 6. That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Chamberlain, S. Dak."

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4043) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

BRIDGE OVER OBION RIVER, TENNESSEE.

The bill (S. 25) authorizing the Dyersburg and Mississippi River Railway and Improvement Company to bridge the Obion River in the State of Tennessee was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 1, line 22, after the word "piers," to insert "at the low-water line," and in line 30, after the word "clear," to insert "at the low-water line"; so as to read:

Said span shall have a clear opening of at least 150 feet between the piers at the low-water line, measured at right angles to the current, and shall be over the main channel of the river; and the bridge shall be at right angles to and the piers parallel with the current of the river. And if the bridge over the said river shall be constructed as a draw or pivot bridge, the draw or pivot pier shall be over the main channel of the river at an accessible navigable point and the openings on each side of the pivot pier shall not be less than 100 feet in the clear at the low-water line unless otherwise expressly directed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM P. BUCKMASTER.

The bill (S. 90) for the relief of William P. Buckmaster was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William P. Buckmaster, surviving partner of James Murphy & Co., $22,386.61, the balance due for labor and material furnished by James Murphy & Co. in the construction of the machinery for the double-ender vessel Otsego in 1862.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the report in this case read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The report will be read.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the report read.

Mr. ALLEN. It may consume an hour or two to read the report.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps the Senator from Nebraska can state briefly the substance of the report.

Mr. ALLEN. I think a similar bill has been reported favorably several times.

Mr. COCKRELL. Such a bill was passed at the last session.

Mr. ALLEN. It was passed at the last session of Congress. The bill proposes to allow the surviving partner of James Murphy & Co., who built this vessel during the days of the war, under a guaranty from the Navy Department that they should not lose money in its construction, the balance due for labor and machinery. They did not seek to make any money, but the rise in the price of materials and labor was so rapid and constant at that time that a guaranty was exacted from the Navy Department. The matter was considered by the Selfridge Board several years ago, and a similar bill has been reported favorably heretofore and passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF JOHN C. HOWE.

The bill (S. 32) for the relief of the legal representatives of John C. Howe, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the legal representatives of John C. Howe, deceased, $66,907, compensation in full for the use by the United States in cup-anvil cartridges of the invention secured to John C. Howe by letters patent of the United States.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to have the Senator who reported the bill make a short explanation of it, or let the first part of the report be read.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I can make a statement as to the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I think perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts can state even better than I can the object of the bill. The parties for whom the bill is to be passed were the owners of a patent for the manufacture of cartridges, and the parties interested in it are the people who bought it from the original inventor upon an understanding that they were to manufacture the cartridges, and with an understanding as to the amount they were to pay to the inventor from any profits which they might derive from it. The inventor is now dead and his daughter takes his place.

There was a suit upon this invention brought in the State of Connecticut against the superintendent of the Springfield Armory, and the patent was adjudged to be valid. There was no accounting at the time of the suit, but this is one of the first cases which was referred to the Court of Claims under the Bowman Act. The court went into the matter fully, and it found that the parties who were plaintiffs in the suit were entitled to $69,000, which is the sum proposed to be paid by the bill, without interest. One-third of it is to be paid to the daughter of the inventor. I believe that is a fair statement of the case. The Government was represented by the Attorney-General before the Court of Claims. A similar bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, I believe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 1712) granting to the First Regiment North Carolina State Guard two condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. 3265) donating one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to Stone River Post, No. 74, Grand Army of the Republic, Sedan, Kans.;

A bill (H. R. 3544) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish not more than four pieces of condemned cannon to the village of New Rochelle, N. Y.;

A bill (H. R. 3982) granting to Lincoln Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Hope Valley, R. I., one condemned cannon; also, to the Woman's Relief Corps of Taylorsville, Ill., four condemned cannon and four condemned cannon balls for the purpose of decorating a soldiers' monument lately erected there by said corps; and, also, to the town of Newton, in the State of New Jersey, four pieces of condemned cannon and twenty cannon balls, for the decoration of the new soldiers and sailors' monument in that town; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 24) providing for immediate destruction of income-tax returns, etc.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 1712) granting to the First Regiment, North Carolina State Guard, two condemned cannon;

A bill (H. R. 3265) donating one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to Stone River Post, No. 74, Grand Army of the Republic, Sedan, Kans.;

A bill (H. R. 3544) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish not more than four pieces of condemned cannon to the village of New Rochelle, N. Y.; and

A bill (H. R. 3982) granting to Lincoln Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Hope Valley, R. I., one condemned cannon; also to the Woman's Relief Corps of Taylorsville, Ill., four condemned cannon and four condemned cannon balls, for the purpose of decorating a soldiers' monument lately erected there by said corps; and also to the town of Newton, in the State of New Jersey, four pieces of condemned cannon and twenty cannon balls, for the decoration of a new soldiers' and sailors' monument in that town.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 24) providing for immediate destruction of income-tax returns, etc., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PALMER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Illinois give way for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois withdraw his motion so as to enable the Senator from New York to be heard?

Mr. PALMER. I am willing to hear a suggestion from any quarter, but I am very anxious that there shall be an executive session this afternoon.

Mr. HILL. I simply wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that here are three or four bills just passed by the House of Representatives and duly referred to the appropriate committee, relating to the giving away of condemned cannon or allowing various posts of the Grand Army of the Republic to receive condemned cannon. A year or two ago I had a bill of that character passed. Senators will find such bills upon the Calendars of each House very frequently.

Now, I suggest to the committee to whom those bills are referred whether there can not be a general bill passed authorizing some executive officer of the Government, the Secretary of War, for instance, to allow those various people or organizations to have condemned cannon. Why should it require a special bill every time we dispose of a single cannon throughout the country?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Hearing the captions of the bills read I remarked to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who sits on my right, that when they came to the Naval Committee I thought it would be a fitting thing to have a general statute reported prescribing that whenever any of those cannons or when munitions of war have become useless the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War should be allowed, in their discretion, to distribute them. Thus our Calendar would be rid of these numerous cases. I am glad the Senator from New York has called attention to the matter, because I propose when the bills reach the Naval Committee to submit a proposition for a general statute on the subject.

Mr. HILL. I have said all I care to say. The Senator from Illinois can now have a vote on his motion.

Mr. HOAR. The suggestion made by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Maine has come after I had made a like suggestion in regard to bridge bills. I should like to have the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, consider the matter. At the end of nearly every session of Congress, when we are very much pressed for time, when every minute is precious, when measures of great importance are going over, there come in long bridge bills of several pages of our printed documents, setting forth in detail the precautions for the safety of commerce and the public convenience which the Secretary must take before allowing a bridge to be built.

It seems to me it might be possible for the Committee on Commerce to devise a general bill providing that all bridges should comply with certain conditions, and then, when we pass a bill, say that the corporation is authorized to construct its bridge subject to the provisions of such a statute, or, if the provisions are not uniform in all cases, have some items or articles numbered in the general statute to which the subsequent legislation could refer. I presume we could save hours of very valuable time if that could be accomplished.

Mr. VEST. I wish to state, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the matter of which he has spoken has been before the Commerce Committee for the past four years. We have twice reported a bill, which I had the honor in a large measure to draft, with a view to emancipating the Senate from the nuisance of which he speaks. After debate in the Senate on each occasion something intervened under our rules, which we all know to be perfect, so that the bill was not considered to its final determination.

Such a bill is now before the Committee on Commerce, and it will be reported again. It emancipates the Senate from all bridge bills, so far as the Western rivers are concerned, and that is the source from which legislation of this character comes, there being very little from other parts of the country.

Mr. HOAR. I will pledge to the Senator from Missouri one vote in favor of the bill when it comes into the Senate.

Mr. VILAS. I merely wish to suggest, in the same line, that it would be well for the Committee on Indian Affairs to prepare the draft of a general law giving to railroad companies the privilege of passing through Indian reservations, another class of bills somewhat lengthy. It would be far better, and in the interest of the Government, if the Secretary of the Interior were to dispose of the subject under such general regulations as Congress might provide.

Mr. HALE. What has become of the motion of the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois to have withdrawn the motion.

Mr. VILAS. I will renew it, if there is nothing to be brought before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. There are two bills that I should like to have passed to-day. It will not take five minutes. The Senator is absent who has charge of the next bill on the Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that No. 79 and No. 80 on the Order of Business be taken up. They are very short bills.

Mr. COCKRELL. We shall reach them in a moment.

Mr. FRYE. If some one does not move an executive session.

Mr. COCKRELL. That will not be done for a little while.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

NEWBERRY COLLEGE, SOUTH CAROLINA.

The bill (S. 271) for the relief of Newberry College, Newberry, S. C., was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to the trustees of the Newberry College of the Evangelical Lutheran Synod of South Carolina, in Newberry, in said State, $15,000 for injuries to the buildings of the college, resulting in its destruction, and caused by the troops of the United States while in possession of it and occupying it as a barrack, after the close of the war, in 1865, in South Carolina, this sum to be in full payment of all claims by the college on account of the use, occupation, and loss of the buildings.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

The bill (S. 708) to amend section 4 of an act to provide for the adjustment of land grants, made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that bill be passed over for the present, without losing its place.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I hope the Senator from Missouri will allow the bill to be passed. It is a very short bill and has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Lands. I do not think there is any objection to it at all. It is wholly in the interest of the settlers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Very well. I see that the Senator who reported the bill is present. I thought he was out of the Chamber at the moment.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the adjustment of land grants made by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads and for the forfeiture of unearned lands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1887, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided further, That where such purchasers, their heirs or assigns, have paid only a portion of the purchase price to the company, which is less than the Government price of similar lands, they shall be required, before the delivery of patent for their lands, to pay to the Government a sum equal to the difference between the portion of the purchase price so paid and the Government price, and in such case the amount demanded from the company shall be the amount paid to it by such purchaser."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FINANCIAL POLICY.

The resolution introduced by Mr. MILLS on the 14th instant relative to United States legal-tender notes outstanding, coinage of the silver bullion now in the Treasury, etc., was announced as the next business on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let that go over.

Mr. FRYE. That will lead to debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over without losing its place.

TITLES OF NOBILITY.

The bill (S. 654) to prevent citizens of the United States from soliciting or receiving and accepting titles, patents of nobility, or degrees of honor from foreign nations, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. There is an adverse report in that case, which operates as an objection to the consideration of a bill under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without losing its place.

ARKANSAS STATE CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 502) to approve a compromise and settlement between the United States and the State of Arkansas was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. HALE. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without losing its place.

INTERNATIONAL MARINE CONFERENCE.

The bill (S. 1450) to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the International Marine Conference of 1889 was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce whether he has reason to believe that the reconvening of the conference will be followed by a successful attempt to adopt international regulations.

Mr. FRYE. I have myself no idea that there will be any necessity to reconvene the delegates, but Great Britain has not yet consented to the rules which the Maritime Congress unanimously reported. We enacted them into a law, to become law when the President of the United States should issue a proclamation to that effect. Great Britain then entered an objection to one of the rules and no action has been had since. The Commissioner of Navigation saw the English Board of Trade and they informed him that at the opening of Parliament they should submit these questions to the Parliament and undoubtedly there would be an agreement; but Parliament might seek to amend. If they desired to amend, we thought it very proper indeed that the Secretary of State should be in a condition to call our delegates together to act upon the amendments proposed by Great Britain; that is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF WAGES OF SEAMEN.

The bill (S. 1423) to protect the wages of seamen was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments: In line 18, to strike out the words "It is hereby further enacted that" and insert "and"; in line 19, to strike out the word "paper" and insert "order or decree"; and after the word "void," in line 21, to strike out the remainder of the bill, in the following words:

And any officer executing the same shall be punished, upon conviction thereof before any State or United States court, by fine not to exceed $300 or imprisonment not to exceed three months, at the discretion of the court, for each and every offense.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4536 of the Revised Statutes be, and it is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4536. No wages due or accruing to any seaman or apprentice shall be subject to attachment or arrestment from any court; and every payment of wages to a seaman or apprentice shall be valid in law, notwithstanding any previous sale or assignment of wages, or any attachment, incumbrance, or arrestment thereon; and no assignment or sale of wages or salvage, made prior to the accruing thereof, shall bind the party making the same, except such advance securities as are authorized by this title; and the provisions of this section shall extend to and embrace seamen and apprentices in the domestic or coasting trade and the trade between the United States and ports in the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland and the West India Islands and Mexico, and to seamen in the whale or other fishing business. And any writ or attachment or other order or decree for the enforced collection of a seaman's wages, in contravention of this section, shall be void."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARTHA ALLEN.

The bill (S. 248) granting a pension to Martha Allen was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Martha Allen, of Topeka, Shawnee County, Kans., widow of Robert Allen, deceased, late a private in Company I, Second Regiment Kansas State Militia Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE FEDERAL CENSUS.

The joint resolution (S. R. 47) relating to the Federal census was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Census with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Commissioner of Labor, now in charge of the Eleventh Census, is hereby authorized and directed to correspond with the census officers of other Governments for the purpose of securing uniformity in the inquiries relating to the people to be used in future censuses; and that said Commissioner is also hereby directed to report to Congress for its consideration, as soon as practicable, a plan for a permanent census service.

Mr. HALE. In line 5, after the word "correspond," I move to insert the words "and confer," so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Labor, now in charge of the Eleventh Census, is hereby authorized and directed to correspond and confer with the census officers of other Governments, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

HEIRS OF JAMES BRIDGER.

The bill (S. 82) for the relief of the heirs of James Bridger, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to the heirs of James Bridger, deceased, $6,000, in full satisfaction for his improvements made at Fort Bridger, Utah Territory, which were appropriated by the United States Army, in the fall of 1857, under command of Brig. Gen. Albert S. Johnston.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM A. STARKWEATHER.

The bill (S. 535) for the relief of William A. Starkweather, of Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William A. Starkweather, of Oregon, $2,170, being the amount paid out by him to Owen Wade for clerk hire in the United States land office at Oregon City while Starkweather was register of the land office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER GRANT STEWART.

The bill (S. 529) for the relief of Peter Grant Stewart, of Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Peter Grant Stewart, of Gervais, Oreg., $7,500, in full for property owned by him and taken by the United States, and included within the military reservation near the mouth of the Columbia River, in Pacific County, now State, then Territory, of Washington, taken under and by virtue of an executive order dated Washington, D. C., February 26, 1852.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. L. ADAMS.

The bill (S. 709) for the relief of W. L. Adams, of Oregon, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to W. L. Adams, late collector of customs at Astoria, Oreg., $461.02, found to be due him as such collector on the settlement of his accounts in the Treasury Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KANSAS CITY, PITTSBURG AND GULF RAILROAD.

Mr. HALE. I suggest that we have an executive session.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, there is a bill on the Calendar which will be reached the next in order. I understand the joint resolution which intervenes will go over. It is necessary to pass that bill now if at all. I hope the Senator will not object. It is a mere formal matter.

Mr. HALE. What is the bill?

Mr. VEST. It is the bill (S. 1046) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to my colleague to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered now. The joint resolution that intervenes will not be considered to-day, as the Senator who reported it has given notice that he will call it up to-morrow. The bill to which I refer is simply a bill in regard to a right of way through the Indian Territory, and it is necessary to have action upon it immediately.

The joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. That goes over until to-morrow, I understand, by notice from the Senator who reported it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over without losing its place on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 1046) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf Railroad Company to construct and operate a railroad, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved February 27, 1893, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, to strike out section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That said act be further amended by adding thereto the following, which shall be known as section 13 of said act; that is to say:

"SEC. 13. That the said railroad company shall have, and is hereby given, the right to sell and convey its bridges across the Arkansas River and the Poteau River in the Indian Territory, or either of them, together with their approaches and supports, to any bridge company or companies which may be organized for the purpose of purchasing them, or either of them; and any company which may purchase either of said bridges shall have the power to own and maintain and operate the same, and to charge and collect toll for the use thereof by railroad companies or others, and may from time to time issue bonds and secure the same by giving one or more mortgages on said bridge and its appurtenances and franchises; and that all mortgages executed by any such bridge company conveying either of said bridges, with its appurtenances, supports, and franchises, shall be filed for record in the Department of the Interior, and such filing shall be evidence and notice of their execution, and such mortgages shall have the effect of conveying all rights and property of such bridge company as therein expressed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VEST. After the word "war," in line 19, I move to insert:

And with the right to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a spur of this railroad from a point on said branch about 4 miles northeast of Scullyville, by the most practicable route, to a point on the west line of the State of Arkansas about 10 miles south of Fort Smith, and with the right to build in the line of said spur a bridge over the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall first be approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PLATT. Is it proposed to provide for two bridges over the Poteau River, or does the amendment relate only to the bridge which is spoken of in the bill?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator from Missouri will permit me, I will state that it is for a second bridge. The original bridge provides for a spur running out from the main line of the road 14 miles west of Fort Smith to the city of Fort Smith. This is a proposition to add an additional spur to the spur, turning out at the town of Scullyville, in the Indian Territory, and running to a point on the Arkansas line south of Fort Smith, intending to reach certain coal fields in the county of Sebastian south of Fort Smith.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The same amendment must be made elsewhere in the bill. It must come in in two places or it will not be right. My colleague's amendment is inserted in line 19, which is the right place; but then the whole section is reconstructed, and it must go in at line 41 as well.

Mr. VEST. It can be put in there.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the same words my colleague has offered be inserted in the bill which gives the section as it will read when amended. That will be over on page 3, line 41.

Mr. VEST. Simply repeating the provision.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is necessary to repeat it.

Mr. VEST. It will not do any harm at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "war," in line 41, on page 3, insert:

And with the right to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a spur of this railroad from a point on said branch about 4 miles northeast of Scullyville, by the most practicable route, to a point on the west line of the State of Arkansas about 10 miles south of Fort Smith, and with the right to build in the line of said spur a bridge over the Poteau River, whose plan of construction shall first be approved by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then insert the word "and" so as to continue after the words just inserted, "and with the right to construct, use, and maintain such tracks, turn-outs, sidings," etc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be agreed to, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PALMER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive business the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 22, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 21, 1896.

CHIEF OF BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

Chief Engineer George W. Melville, United States Navy, to be Engineer in Chief and Chief of the Bureau of Steam Engineering.

POSTMASTERS.

John Riley, jr., to be postmaster at North Amherst, in the county of Lorain and State of Ohio.

George T. Roof, to be postmaster at Corning, in the county of Perry and State of Ohio.

Frank P. Furlong, to be postmaster at Hartford, in the county of Hartford and State of Connecticut.

Charles E. Boehme, to be postmaster at Germantown, in the county of Montgomery and State of Ohio.

Andrew J. Ewing, to be postmaster at McComb, in the county of Hancock and State of Ohio.

John Nesbitt, to be postmaster at Chicago, in the county of Huron and State of Ohio.

James Ramage, to be postmaster at Gibsonburg, in the county of Sandusky and State of Ohio.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 21, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DOCUMENTS FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following joint resolution, and to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Printing, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which the Clerk will report to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents.

Resolved, etc., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, in addition to the usual number, and furnish the Department of State with 20 copies of each Senate and House of Representatives document and report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution reported to the House? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I did not object; but I will be glad to know why this resolution is necessary. It is a concurrent resolution, is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is a joint resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, is rendered necessary by the printing act of the last Congress. Heretofore 20 copies of each document and report have been sent to the Department of State. No provision for that was made in the printing act. Accompanying the report is a letter of the Secretary of State making the request for the additional number of documents to be filed in his office.

Mr. DOCKERY. What number?

Mr. PERKINS. Twenty of each document and report. If the gentleman requires it, I will have the letter of the Secretary of State read.

Mr. CANNON. I take the gentleman's word for it; but I want to give notice now to the House——

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It is utterly impossible to hear what gentlemen are saying.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen will take their seats, and the gentleman will suspend until order is obtained.

Mr. CANNON. Last Congress the so-called printing act was passed under the leadership of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]. Doubt was expressed at the time as to the propriety of its enactment, but from the gentleman's long experience upon that committee the House took his judgment, and the legislation was enacted. Since that time organization has been had. Perhaps the Printing Committee and God know what the organization is under this law, how many new offices, how much additional expense is covered up as against the offices that were abolished. I do not know; but from day to day somebody from that committee or some member of the House rises and asks unanimous consent that there be so many copies of such and such a document printed, and asks for the passage of a concurrent or a joint resolution. Now, then, it seems to me one of two things is to happen: Either a large portion of the time of this House from time to time is to be taken up by the enactment of concurrent or joint resolutions that will nullify or piece that printing act, or the Committee on Printing will have to mend its hold and give us such an amendment of that act as will enable it to operate so as to transact the business of the country and the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, this is about the fourth, fifth, or sixth time that the gentleman from Illinois has found it necessary in his judgment and wisdom to arraign the Printing Committee.

Mr. CANNON. No; the act, not the committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. To arraign the committee and the act which was passed, an act coming from the Printing Committee of the last Congress and also the Printing Committee of the Fifty-second Congress. I had supposed that his remarks heretofore were made in a humorous vein, and have treated his criticism in that way; but evidently from the earnest tone of my distinguished friend this morning he has lost something of what I supposed to be his equanimity or good nature in his criticism and gives vent to feeling in the matter.

Mr. CANNON. I have no feeling about it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Evidently, then, the gentleman's manner does not indicate his feelings. I thought the gentleman's manner betrayed feeling. He proceeds in an insinuating way to arraign gentlemen who were instrumental in having this printing bill passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that these resolutions which the gentleman refers to will of necessity arise. They have always arisen. This resolution simply provides that there shall be printed and delivered to the Secretary of State some additional copies of documents. The reason for it is that the printing law did what gentlemen who framed it and those who supported it in the last Congress thought and contended it would do; that is, economize or reduce the number of documents printed. As an evidence of the fact that we succeeded in accomplishing that purpose, the Secretary of State comes and says he wants 20 copies more. I am very glad to know that we did succeed in reducing the number at least in that Department. The Secretary of State comes in and says with respect to that Department, "You have economized a little too far; you have cut down this Department until we have not quite enough, and we want 20 copies more." This resolution simply gives him 20 additional copies of these documents; and that is all there is of it. I see nothing in it to provoke the animadversions of my friend, and I would not say to him and to the House what I am going to say but for the fact, as I have already said, this is the fifth or sixth time he has taken occasion since this Congress began to animadvert upon this law.

Now, what is this printing law? It is a law which was framed by a joint committee of Congress, consisting of five members. On the part of the Senate the members were Senator Manderson, who had been for many years chairman of the Senate Committee on Printing and of the Joint Committee on Printing, Senator HAWLEY of Connecticut, also very familiar with the subject of printing, and Senator GORMAN, who, however, took absolutely no part in framing the bill; so that, so far as the Senate was concerned, the work was done by Senator Manderson and Senator HAWLEY. Under the joint resolution passed in the last session of the Fifty-first Congress providing for this joint committee to consider the subject of printing, two members of the House, who were also members-elect of the Fifty-second Congress, were named by the Speaker of the Fifty-first Congress, the distinguished gentleman who now sits in the Speaker's chair. One of those members was the gentleman from Connecticut, Mr. RUSSELL, who, however, took no part in framing the bill; in fact, so far as I now recollect, he did not attend a single meeting of the committee. I was the other member appointed on the part of the House. The result was that the bill was framed by three members of the joint committee, Senator Manderson, Senator HAWLEY, and myself.

In gathering information upon which to base it, we visited every Bureau and every Department of the Government. We spent three months in this city when Congress was not in session endeavoring to collect data which would enable us to frame a judicious printing bill. We found the laws in relation to printing in an utterly chaotic state, and we put them all into this one act, which is the result of the labors of the three gentlemen I have named, but principally the work of Senator Manderson. The law is a good law, and it does not deserve the adverse criticism of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] or of any other gentleman. I repeat, that in preparing the bill we visited every Department of the Government for which printing was done or which has to have printing done. We took and considered the testimony and the suggestions of a large number of gentlemen familiar with the subject of printing, and, as the result of it all, we framed this act. It may not have been wisely framed, it may not be a perfect law, but I wished to show the House how carefully it was framed. I desire to call attention to the opinions of gentlemen in respect to this act who for years have had much to do with printing for this Government. One gentleman, not a member of the committee, but who assisted us in our labors, attending nearly every meeting of the joint committee while the work was being done—he is a man who had had more to do with the work of public printing for this Government for five or six years than any other man, a Republican, a man who had honored a seat in this House for, I think, three terms, and best of all, perhaps, a gentleman coming from the State of my distinguished friend, Mr. CANNON—he knows to whom I refer——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Who is the gentleman?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I refer to Mr. Palmer, than whom, in my opinion, there has not been a better or more efficient Public Printer in the history of this Government. As I have stated, Mr. Palmer was present during the labors of the joint committee in framing this bill, and in order that the House may know what his opinion of it was, I ask to have read from the Clerk's desk a letter addressed by him to Senator Manderson, the chairman of the joint committee which framed the act.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., January 13, 1892.

SIR: Your favor of the 30th ultimo, sending me a complete set of sheets containing the sections of the proposed printing bill, and asking me to give you an estimate of the probable saving to the Government that would accrue under the operations of the bill, should it become a law, came duly to hand.

In reply I have the honor to state that I have caused those sections of the proposed bill relating to the number of copies of documents to be printed to be compared with the present law and various concurrent and joint resolutions of Congress ordering extra copies of the same documents, and from this comparison it is estimated that, should the proposed bill become a law, the annual saving under its operations would be between $175,000 and $200,000.

It is impossible to arrive at even an approximate estimate of the saving which would be effected by having documents distributed from a building within a block of the Government Printing Office, instead of from the Capitol. In order to haul the documents this one square they will have to be loaded into wagons, and the only saving which would be effected would be the difference in hauling those documents which are to be distributed upon orders of Senators and Representatives, say, one square instead of six squares. Wagons would have to be used then, as now, to deliver work to the Capitol which is required for the daily use of Congress.

Very respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, that is the testimony of this experienced gentleman to the merits of the bill submitted to him, which was substantially the bill afterwards enacted into law. With all his knowledge and all his experience of the business of public printing, he gave that testimony as to the bill. He held office for four years as Public Printer under President Harrison, a Republican President, and was continued in that office for sixteen or seventeen months under the present Administration. He gave that testimony with regard to the merits of the law which my friend from Illinois criticises so seriously. Dr. John G. Ames, the former very efficient superintendent of documents, gave testimony similar to that given by Public Printer Palmer in a letter which I hold in my hand.

I desire now to call attention to the testimony of the present efficient and highly competent Public Printer, after he has served nearly two years. In his annual report he says:

All the details called for by this public printing act it is possible to present in an intelligent form are included herein. The office has experienced no difficulty in carrying out the provisions of the new law.

So, Mr. Speaker, the present Public Printer recognizes this printing law as a wise law, and I undertake to say that every gentleman who examines it will be impressed with the idea that it is a wise and economical law. I am not vain in saying that, because I claim no credit for its enactment. I do admit I made an earnest and strenuous effort to put it through the House of Representatives. The act was framed by Senator Manderson, assisted by the other gentlemen. I am not going into any further defense of that law now. It speaks for itself. Mr. Palmer said that it would only save about $200,000 a year in public printing, and I, after an experience of eight or nine years on the Committee on Printing, am quite satisfied that it will save much more than that in money, and also a great deal of trouble in the modes and methods of disposing of matters connected with printing.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is a mistake to suppose that any law can be passed which will prevent the Committee on Printing from coming here from time to time to ask for the printing of extra copies of documents. Occasions for such resolutions as the one now pending will continually arise. This case simply confirms what I have said heretofore, that in our efforts to cut down we perhaps cut the State Department a little too deep, and they now ask for 20 additional copies of this document. That is all that this resolution amounts to.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, because of my being on the Committee on Appropriations for several years past I have had some experience in the matter of making appropriations for the support of the Public Printing Office.

Now, I take no part in the contest between the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] further than to say this: That it remains to be seen whether the present printing law will stand the strain of a session of Congress, no matter whether the House of Representatives be in the control of the one party or the other. I wish to call attention to the appropriations which have been made, so that it may be seen that so far we have been unable to determine whether the present printing law is an economic measure or not as compared with previous laws. In 1893 the appropriations for the support of the Printing Office were $3,270,000; in 1894, $3,481,000; in 1895, $3,124,320. At this session, for the first time since 1886, the Public Printer did not submit to Congress, prior to the Christmas holidays, a deficiency estimate; but I take it that this results from the fact that at the last session of Congress we appropriated $3,110,000 for the support of the Printing Office, as against $2,504,320 which appeared in the sundry civil bill of the preceding session, and which was supplemented by an appropriation of $620,000 in the deficiency bill.

Now, this is a point to which I wish to call the special attention of the House: Notwithstanding the letter of the Public Printer and the several communications of his predecessors, and that we have appropriated for this year only $3,110,000, and that the Public Printer has not thus far asked for a deficiency appropriation, I notice that his estimates for 1897 amount to $3,560,659.40, which is more than $300,000 in excess of any estimate heretofore submitted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to explain to the House why it is that there come from the Public Printer at this session of Congress estimates $300,000 in excess of any estimates heretofore submitted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In the first place, I answer by saying, in reference to the comparison which the gentleman makes with the appropriations for last year, that those appropriations were some $200,000 or $300,000 less than those of the preceding year. Thus it will be seen that last year was not a normal year in reference to the expenditures; the amount of appropriation was not the usual amount, but was considerably less. I ask the gentleman from Texas whether I am not correct in saying that last year the appropriations were less than those of the year before?

Mr. SAYERS. But take other preceding years.

Mr. RICHARDSON. For some of the preceding years the appropriations were undoubtedly more than $3,100,000.

Mr. SAYERS. But the point I wished to make was this: That it remains to be seen whether the new printing act would bear the strain of a session of Congress and still preserve the economical features which were claimed for it during its passage through the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that point of the gentleman.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. In a moment; let us get through with this matter. The gentleman from Texas has made a statement which I wish to discuss. As I understand, he states that the appropriations for the past year amounted to $3,100,000, in round numbers. But it is to be remembered that the amount would be swelled to $3,400,000 or $3,500,000, if we should take into consideration the deficiency appropriations, because large deficiencies were asked for by Mr. Palmer, as the gentleman very well knows.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing which this printing law does to which I ask the attention of my friend from Illinois, because he and his committee will have much to do with this matter. It will necessarily come before them. The printing law puts upon the Public Printer the duty of printing, out of funds appropriated in the annual appropriation bill for public printing, the Agricultural Report, which of itself takes about $300,000. Prior to the passage of this printing law the amount necessary for the printing of that report was always carried in a separate joint resolution, which was self-appropriating, and therefore was not included in the amount annually appropriated in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for public printing.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman means the sundry civil bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; I beg pardon; I mean the sundry civil bill.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is correct in his statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am not only correct in that, but my friend from Texas will bear me witness to another thing. Before the passage of this printing law large sales of waste paper, gold-leaf shavings, and other articles of waste that I can not now enumerate were made by the Public Printer, amounting possibly to $300,000 a year. What did he do with the proceeds? I presume my friend from Illinois knows that the money thus realized was again used by the Public Printer for carrying on the public printing. Under the new printing law this can not be done. The Public Printer is required to cover into the Treasury every dollar realized from such sales. Before any of that money can be used by him for purposes of public printing it must be again appropriated by Congress. Is not that wise? My friend knows too much about public expenditures to say that it is not a wise measure. If there is any one feature of the printing law which should commend it to the favorable consideration of prudent legislators it is that one provision which does away with a "slush fund," as it has been called, in the hands of the Public Printer, to be used at his discretion.

Now, inasmuch as my friend from Illinois has not answered me, and declines to do so, I will ask my friend from Texas whether I am not correct in that statement?

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then there is $300,000 or thereabouts—of course I am not undertaking to speak accurately as to the amount—which was formerly at the disposal of the Public Printer as proceeds of these sales; money which he could twice use, but which he can not now use; which must be turned into the Treasury and remain there subject to appropriation by Congress. There is the sum of $300,000, or about that, that we might by "juggling the figures" say was an increase in funds for the public printing. It will be seen at once it is not an increase, but is a wise and eminently proper provision which should, and which I know will, commend itself to the gentleman from Illinois.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], who wishes to ask a question.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, Mr. Speaker, my question has somewhat cooled, but has not entirely congealed. [Laughter.]

I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if it is not a fact that the kind of printing—the documents and other things printed—varies very materially from Congress to Congress; so that the estimate given upon certain indications of how much the saving might be, or would be, is not a very accurate test? And furthermore if the estimate of $200,000 saving was not made on the basis of the same identical printing; and so the facts do not show whether the statement of the gentleman from Texas was correct or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I am for the public printing act as I understand it; and I merely wanted to bring out the fact that these estimates are on the same identical printing, but that the total cost of printing necessarily varies from Congress to Congress by very large sums.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman is correct; and not only that, but he will find that the printing is increasing year by year; but under the operation of this bill there will be a material saving, as has already been indicated.

Mr. SAYERS. Before the gentleman from Tennessee takes his seat, let me ask if he knows why the estimate for the coming year is so much larger than for the preceding one?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know, I will be frank to say to my friend from Texas; I have not examined the subject. The Public Printer no doubt has found it necessary, for reasons satisfactory to himself, to ask for a larger amount. I take it that the object is to take care of the very class of subjects to which I have referred. First, the $300,000 for reprinting the Agricultural Report——

Mr. SAYERS. But we have that for this year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And the other in respect to the waste and sales of waste materials.

Mr. SAYERS. But the gentleman will remember that, as far as the Agricultural Report is concerned, we have that for this year.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; I understand that; and, as I have said to the gentleman, I am frank to say that I do not understand the reason. But I know it is the policy of the present Public Printer to ask for the amount or sum he thinks will be necessary for the annual public printing, and that this necessary sum may be carried in the regular appropriation bill, and not asked for at the close of the year as a deficiency.

Mr. CANNON. Well, Mr. Speaker, in reference to this matter of saving, "the proof of the pudding is the eating of it."

A MEMBER. No; "chewing the bag."

Mr. CANNON. Very well; have your own way; I'll accept the amendment.

The gentleman from Tennessee claimed that this printing bill was and is a great economical measure—and that it is going to save a vast amount of money for the Government. Why, he flapped his wings when it was under consideration, as the record will show——

A MEMBER. "Vote!"

Mr. CANNON. Well, you will not vote just this minute.

When that bill was being considered he talked of the abolition of the Clerk's document room——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And yet, almost the first day of this session, the whole force of the Clerk's document room, with the blessing of the gentleman from Tennessee, was transferred bodily over to the other document room.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I beg pardon; not with my blessing.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, the RECORD shows.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the best evidence of the operation of the law is the effect of it that we witness here from day to day. We have seen on yesterday the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS], the chairman of the Committee on Printing, rise upon this floor and pass three resolutions for additional printing by unanimous consent.

Mr. PERKINS. No; one of them I fell down on. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, you passed two out of the three, and you hope to get another one through to-day. To-morrow, perhaps, you will have four. Whether more will follow I do not know; but I take it that on the average from this on to the close of the session we are to have one or more resolutions a day for printing not provided for by this most economical bill to which the gentleman from Tennessee refers.

Mr. CHICKERING. Do you object, if it is all right?

Mr. CANNON. I am talking of the law and the necessity for its amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman from Illinois complains because the Committee on Printing, in making up the printing act, could not anticipate the discovery of gold in the Cripple Creek region in Colorado, and that we did not provide for the printing of the geological report incident thereto. Had we known that fact we might probably have been able to provide for it in advance in the printing bill. But unfortunately that knowledge was denied to us.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the debate on this resolution has taken a very wide range. I think I can say for the Printing Committee of the House that it dislikes very much to be held responsible for whatever sins were committed in the last Congress under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Tennessee.

I dare say it is true, as the RECORD will show, that resolutions of this character have been acted upon by every Congress. I doubt if any provision of law could guard against them, or obviate the necessity of offering such resolutions. These questions will naturally arise from time to time in the House of Representatives as its business progresses; and we must, by resolution, provide for the printing as these matters develop in the Departments.

When we seek to make provision to supply the wants of the House, we are privileged; but when we undertake to supply the requests of the Department, we are subject to objection.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply calls for the printing of 20 additional copies of documents and reports for the convenience of the Department of State. It is a simple proposition. The Secretary of State, in the letter which has been sent to the Clerk's desk, represents the necessity for it. If every time the Committee on Printing have occasion to report here there is to be such a debate sprung here as the one which we have had this morning, I think I can promise for the Committee on Printing that it will make as few reports as possible. So far there has been no extravagance, at least, in the reports made from this committee, and I think it will be the policy of the committee, in the reports hereafter to be made, to guard that point. If it be true that we must first seek the approval of the Committee on Appropriations, it would be well to have that instruction now, so that we may avoid these collisions on the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I hope we may have a vote on the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise to a question of privilege for a moment. It ought to be attended to, I think. It has reference to a publication in the RECORD this morning. I do not at present see the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. HITT] in the House, and I will postpone it for a moment until he comes in. I yield now, and will call it up when the gentleman comes in, because it relates to a matter in which he is concerned.

ISSUE OF BONDS, NEW MEXICO TERRITORY.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Territories have unanimously directed me to report back House bill No. 4052 with a request for its present consideration. The report states fully the provisions of the bill and the objects of it, and I will ask that the report be read, and then I shall ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4052) approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the coupon bonds and indebtedness of the Territory of New Mexico, amounting to $75,000, authorized by section 7 of an act of the Thirty-first legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act authorizing the rebuilding of the Territorial capitol at Santa Fe, which was destroyed by fire May 12, 1892, and to provide the necessary means therefor and a board with authority to rebuild the same," approved February 5, 1895, and designated as capitol rebuilding bonds of the Territory of New Mexico;

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to $15,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to provide for the maintenance of the military institute at Roswell, N. Mex.," approved February 13, 1895;

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to the sum of $30,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to provide an addition to the insane asylum of New Mexico for the accommodation of all the insane persons of the Territory, and for other purposes," approved May 13, 1895; and

Also, the bonds and indebtedness, amounting to the sum of $35,000, authorized by section 1 of an act of the said legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to provide for the completion of the buildings for the normal schools of New Mexico at Las Vegas and Silver City, and to provide for the necessary furnishings therefor; and for additions to the New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, at Las Cruces," approved February 27, 1895, be, and the same are hereby, approved, confirmed, and made valid: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to make the Government of the United States liable or responsible for the payment of any of said bonds by this act approved, confirmed, and made valid.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, let the report be read, pending objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be read.

The report (by Mr. CATRON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4052), approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory, report the same to the House and recommend that it pass.

The committee find that this action is made necessary by reason of the provisions of a statute of the Congress of the United States, enacted in the year 1887, sometimes called the Harrison Act, by which the Territories were prohibited from creating any indebtedness in excess of 1 per cent of the assessed taxable value of the property of the Territory.

The assessed value of the property of the Territory of New Mexico amounts to about $41,000,000.

At the time of the passage of the act of 1887 by the Congress of the United States, the Territory of New Mexico had already an indebtedness in excess of 1 per cent of the assessed value of the taxable property therein, which had been created principally by the erection of a Territorial capitol building and of a Territorial penitentiary, at an expense of something in excess of $400,000 and by other outstanding indebtedness existing at the time. The present Territorial indebtedness, exclusive of the bonds in question, is near $900,000. The total amount of the bonds which it is sought by this act to validate is $155,000, making a total indebtedness by these bonds and the previous indebtedness of a little more than $1,000,000, or about 2½ per cent of the assessed value of the property in the Territory.

The capitol building, which had been constructed by the Territory at an expense exceeding $250,000, was destroyed by fire on the 12th day of May, 1892, a large amount of the material of which was saved and preserved, so that it can be made use of in the rebuilding of the capitol building. The legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, at its last session, unanimously enacted a law providing for the issue and sale of $75,000 bonds, bearing interest at the rate of 5 per cent, to be made redeemable in twenty years, and to become absolutely due and payable in thirty years, which bonds, it is asserted and believed, can be sold for a premium, and according to estimates furnished by architects will produce money enough to completely rebuild the capitol building. The said capitol building is now being worked upon by the authorities of the Territory, by aid of certain other means which have been furnished by the Territory and by private subscription by the citizens of Santa Fe, but the amount so subscribed is about exhausted, and the work on the said building will have to be discontinued unless the appropriation made by the legislature can be made available at an early day, so that much valuable material on hand may not go to waste and be lost.

The legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, previous to its last session, had also provided for the erection of an insane asylum at Las Vegas, in the Territory of New Mexico, at an expense of about $50,000, which institution has been erected and is now being operated for the care of the insane in said Territory, but said building was not erected with sufficient capacity to care for all the insane, and in order to save great expense to the various counties of the Territory in taking care of the additional insane, it is necessary that the capacity of the said institution be enlarged, for which purpose the legislative assembly at its last session, by a law approved May 13, 1895, authorized the issue and sale of the bonds of the Territory to the amount of $30,000, bearing the same rate of interest and payable in the same time as the bonds first mentioned.

Also a previous legislative assembly of that Territory had provided for the erection of a building for an agricultural college at an expense of about $40,000, which building has been erected, and that college is now in successful operation at Las Cruces, in the Territory of New Mexico. For the employment of teachers and instruction in that college ample means are furnished by the Government of the United States, but none of the moneys furnished by the United States can be used for the purpose of erecting buildings or repairing or enlarging the same. Since the erection of the building and the opening of the institution the attendance at the college has so increased that there is not sufficient room for the convenience of all the students and for rooms for instruction and laboratory purposes, and it has become necessary to make large additions to the same.

The Territory has also established heretofore two normal schools, one at Silver City and the other at Las Vegas, one being in the northeastern part of the Territory and the other being in the southwestern part, about 300 miles or more apart from each other. The building for one of the schools has been erected and the other has been partially erected. The first was erected by a levy of a tax, the second, which is partly completed, as far as it has gone has been built in anticipation of the sale of the bonds which are authorized by the last legislative assembly. The attendance at the first of these institutions has become so great that it has become necessary to enlarge it.

In order, therefore, to enlarge the said agricultural college, the first of said normal schools to a capacity to meet the wants of those attending, and to pay for the second of said normal schools, the said legislative assembly, by an act approved February 28, 1895, authorized the issue and sale of $35,000 of bonds of the Territory, bearing interest and payable on the same terms as the bonds first mentioned.

The last session of said legislative assembly, also, by an act aproved February 13, 1895, authorized the issue and the sale of the bonds of the Territory of New Mexico, bearing interest and payable the same as the other bonds before mentioned, to provide for the maintenance of the military institute at Roswell, N. Mex. This institution is in full operation, is a Territorial institution, under the control of the Territory, and is well attended by students, but there are not suitable or sufficient buildings for their accommodation and instruction. It is provided that the proceeds of these last-mentioned bonds shall be used for the erection of suitable buildings and other improvements at that institution, under the direction of the board of regents.

The indebtedness created by the various acts mentioned in the bill is entirely a debt of the Territory of New Mexico, created by the unanimous action of the Territorial legislature for the purpose of rebuilding the capitol building, enlarging the asylum for the insane, and erecting and enlarging educational institutions, all of which it is believed will be for the benefit of the Territory. Should the capitol building be erected as contemplated it will be a saving of about $3,000 to the United States, which will otherwise have to be appropriated to provide assembly rooms and committee rooms for the next legislative assembly. If this appropriation can be made available at once the building will be completed before the meeting of the next legislative assembly and much valuable material which would otherwise go to waste would be saved. The bill in question contains a proviso that the United States shall not be liable or responsible for the payment of the bonds by this act validated or conformed.

The committee, believing that the bill is a meritorious one and that the moneys appropriated will be expended for the benefit of the people of the Territory, recommend the enactment of the same into a law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Texas, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIFEBOAT EQUIPMENT OF OCEAN STEAMERS.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the unanimous action of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report the resolution which I send to the desk, and to request its adoption.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has been repeatedly charged by the Buffalo Evening News and other leading papers that ocean steamers are permitted to sail from American ports with lifeboat equipment utterly inadequate to accommodate the crew and passengers in case of accident; and

Whereas it is further alleged in these same journals that lifeboats are frequently without the detaching hooks of the disengaging apparatus required by law: Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the House of Representatives whether the present provisions for the safety of the public in ocean travel are adequate; and if so whether such provisions are strictly carried out.

The SPEAKER. This is a privileged motion. The joint resolution is reported from the committee. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the preamble read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the preamble, without objection.

The preamble was again read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the preamble will also be agreed to.

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL COPIES OF RECORD FOR MEMBERS AND SENATORS.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution providing 10 additional copies of the RECORD for Members and Senators was read.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this resolution is intended to cover one of the faults of the printing act or not, but I think it had better be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. Does the gentleman from South Dakota desire the resolution referred?

Mr. PICKLER. I will ask that the resolution be referred to the committee.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the committee will give it prompt consideration, as it is of interest to every member of the House.

CORRECTION OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report back the bill (H. R. 573) for the relief of Frances R. Jack, Elizabeth I. Jack, and Matilda W. Jack, and recommend that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

DOCUMENTS IN CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to withhold that matter for a moment, for a matter of privilege.

Mr. Speaker, the matter I think is a privileged matter, inasmuch as it relates to the conduct of the business of the House and publication of the daily RECORD. I find in the RECORD this morning that on yesterday, when the President's message was laid before the House by the Chair, a message which relates to the speeches of Mr. Bayard, that the Chair, as was right and proper, referred the message and ordered it to be printed, with the accompanying documents. Of course, Mr. Speaker, that meant that the message and the accompanying documents would be printed as a document—an executive document. I find that not only is the message, of eight or ten lines, printed in the RECORD, but it is followed by twenty-three columns of closely printed matter. The message, of course, should be printed; but it was followed by twenty-three columns of closely printed matter, which purports to be, and I suppose are, the accompanying documents. Among these documents I find the speeches of the American minister at the British court. The effect of it is to put in the RECORD these speeches of Mr. Bayard, give them the circulation which the RECORD has, and enable members to frank that matter to their constituents if they see fit to do so. This is a palpable violation, Mr. Speaker, of the rules of printing in the RECORD. I simply call attention to it, because it is a perversion of the columns of the RECORD and this twenty-three columns of matter should not have been published.

I have no motion to make. Of course, there would be just as much propriety in printing in the RECORD the documents accompanying the President's annual message, such as the reports of heads of Departments, etc. I ask that this matter be printed as a document, as ordered on yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that this was put in the RECORD by mistake of the printer.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not know how the mistake arose.

The SPEAKER. Certainly, the criticism of the gentleman is entirely just. The matter ought not to have been printed as a part of the RECORD. It should have been printed as a document. And the Chair will direct that it be kept out of the permanent RECORD.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I trust that that order will not be made. The expense has already been incurred. These speeches have been made the subject of much criticism here and elsewhere; and inasmuch as the expense of printing has already been incurred, I hope that they will not be expunged from the permanent RECORD. I think they should go along with the criticisms as a matter of justice.

The SPEAKER. It had no business to be printed in the RECORD. The RECORD is rather voluminous in a natural way.

Mr. McRAE. Perhaps it ought not to have been printed in the daily RECORD, but it has been printed, so that we shall save nothing now by striking it out.

The SPEAKER. But by leaving it in the RECORD you establish a precedent which may be troublesome in the future according as you like the matter printed or do not. [Laughter.]

Mr. McRAE. I trust that the Speaker will not make the order to expunge this from the permanent RECORD, inasmuch as it has already been printed in the daily RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Unless the House otherwise orders, the Speaker will have to make the RECORD conform to the rules of the House.

Mr. McRAE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that this matter be permitted to go into the permanent RECORD.

A MEMBER. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. McRAE. Then I understand that the Chair does not entertain my motion that this matter be allowed to stand in the permanent RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how he can entertain the gentleman's motion when the regular order is called for. The rules of the House can not be suspended except by unanimous consent. The Chair would be quite willing to have the gentleman's motion put to the House if it could be done under the rules.

Mr. McRAE. The suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] was entertained by the Chair far enough to declare that he would make an order to have this matter stricken from the RECORD unless the House orders otherwise, but now, when I make that motion, the regular order is called for and no opportunity given for the House to pass upon the question, and the Chair is left to do as it chooses about the matter. I think this unjust.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is only following the rules of the House unless he is mistaken, and if the gentleman thinks he is, the Chair will listen to argument on that point.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, is a motion in order to allow this matter to remain in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think such a motion can be at this time entertained under the rules of the House. It might be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asks unanimous consent that the documents printed in the RECORD of this morning in connection with the President's message laid before the House yesterday be continued in the permanent RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. I very much dislike to object, Mr. Speaker, but I think it would be unfortunate to set this precedent, and therefore I think we had better follow the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

POST-OFFICE, SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Mr. HILBORN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted the following report, and asked for its immediate consideration:

JANUARY 11, 1896.

Mr. LOUD submitted the following, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to inform the House what progress has been made under the act approved March 3, 1893, in the erection of a building at San Francisco, Cal., for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, and the reason for delay in the prosecution and completion of said building."

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. LOUD calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information in regard to the progress made in the erection of a public building at San Francisco, Cal., and asking the reasons for delay in the completion of said building, beg leave to report the same back with the recommendation that the said resolution be adopted.

The report was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Illinois completes his motion I would like to inquire of the Chair what has become of the unfinished business, the report from the Committee on Rules. That has never been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It has not been disposed of. The Chair understands that it will be brought up as soon as the pending appropriation bill is out of the way.

Mr. CRISP. But I understand there are some of those amendments that have not yet been acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The amendments have been acted upon.

Mr. CRISP. But not as a whole. I propose to offer a substitute for the whole of them whenever we get to the point where that can be done.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware of the intention of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. But it certainly is not proper, pending a report from the Committee on Rules, when part only of the report has been adopted, to go on acting as if the whole of it had been adopted. It does not follow, from any action yet taken, that the whole of the report may not be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if the gentleman from Georgia will examine the RECORD he will see that the amendments which were offered were offered to each article separately; that the proceeding was not a revision of the whole system of rules. The Chair was not aware that the gentleman proposed to offer a substitute.

Mr. CRISP. It was understood that each rule was amendable, and we have acted on that idea.

The SPEAKER. We have acted on every part of the report except one section.

Mr. CRISP. But the report has not been disposed of as a whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that each provision acted upon has been disposed of.

Mr. CRISP. I do not so understand it. Pending the completion of the matter, the report of the committee is undoubtedly unfinished business, and how we can go on and enforce some part of that report before the whole of it has been disposed of by the House I do not understand. This report is like a bill pending for amendment. Amendment after amendment may be adopted, but until the whole matter is disposed of there is no vital force in any of them.

Mr. DALZELL. My understanding is that all the propositions respecting the rules have been disposed of with the exception of one.

Mr. CRISP. That is to say, we have arrived at the point where all the matters proposed have been passed over except one; but we are yet to dispose of the matter as a whole.

Mr. DALZELL. Each rule was disposed of by itself as it was laid before the House. Amendments were invited. Wherever amendments were suggested they were disposed of; where there was no suggestion of any amendment the rule stands just as it was in the Fifty-first Congress. I repeat that, as I understand, the whole matter has been disposed of with the exception of one proposed amendment. With respect to that amendment as it came from the committee a number of suggestions were made on this side of the House and on the other, so that the Committee on Rules, or a majority of that committee, thought it desirable that we should further consider that proposed amendment with the view to adopting perhaps some of the suggestions made in the House. It is the purpose of the Committee on Rules, as I understand, to have an early meeting, and after disposing of that amendment in the committee to make further report to the House.

Mr. CRISP. My only desire in the matter is that there may be an opportunity to offer a substitute for the whole report when we get to that point in the consideration of the matter where it may be done. But with this report pending in its present position we do not know when it may be called up. The committee may call it up at any moment. A demand for the regular order, as I understand, would bring it up, unless some gentleman having an appropriation bill in charge should claim precedence for such a measure, which I admit would, under the rules, have priority over the unfinished business. Subject to that qualification, a mere demand for the regular order would bring up this report at any time. Now, this matter ought to be disposed of in some way.

Mr. DALZELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that the House is not suffering at all by reason of the delay. If it is proper that he should have an opportunity to make a motion or to offer a substitute, that opportunity will be afforded him when the amendment is suggested by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CRISP. If I should happen to be here, or if I should happen to be informed when the matter would be called up, I probably would have that right.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I think I can say to the gentleman that nothing will be done, or attempted to be done, on this matter in his absence.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. I now renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. PAYNE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] whether he desires any general debate on this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. I take it that no general debate is desired on this side of the House.

Mr. CANNON. Then I ask that general debate may be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman to reserve me two minutes of that time.

Mr. CANNON. Very good; I will give the gentleman five.

Mr. SAYERS. I may not want any time at all.

There being no objection, the motion to limit general debate to ten minutes was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.;

A bill (S. 790) to aid the public-land States to support schools of mines;

A bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory";

A bill (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans; and

A bill (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass; when the Speaker signed the same.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this urgent deficiency bill recommends an appropriation in the aggregate of $4,415,922.61. The largest item of deficiency is that for United States courts, aggregating $3,242,582.19. It is proper I should state that for some years the practice has obtained of making short appropriations for the Department of Justice.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman might say that such has been the practice for eight or ten years past.

Mr. CANNON. That explains a part of this deficiency in the appropriations for United States courts; the growth of business in those courts explains the rest.

It is proper I should state also that the appropriations contained in this bill exhaust upon the subjects to which they relate the appropriations for the remainder of this fiscal year. This departure from the custom heretofore with reference to urgent deficiency bills has been made for the reason that the committee intends to present only this one urgent deficiency bill for the consideration of the House; the other deficiency items will take their places in the general deficiency bill, which is ordinarily passed near the close of the session or the close of the fiscal year. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to the report accompanying the bill. I will read from the report, and hope I will have the attention not only of the Committee of the Whole, but especially of the Committee on the Judiciary, whose honorable chairman I see now before me.

The committee desire to call attention to the very large sum, $3,242,582.19, appropriated in the bill for expenses of United States courts, $3,006,000 of which sum is on account of the current fiscal year. They append herewith a statement showing the regular appropriations and the deficiencies made for the expenses of United States courts for the fiscal years 1885 to 1896, inclusive.

This exhibit shows, for the period named, a growth in the expenses of this branch of the public service of more than 100 per cent. The expenses for fees of United States commissioners have grown from $127,150 for the fiscal year 1889 to $340,000 for the current year; and the fees of witnesses have increased from $900,000 in 1889 to $1,500,000 for the current year.

Mr. HENDERSON. During what time were these expenditures incurred?

Mr. CANNON. From 1889, in these two items, to the present time; and from 1885 to the present time, covering all of the items.

The report goes on:

That these expenditures are abnormal, and that some reform in the law should be instituted, the committee are well satisfied; but under the rules of the House they have no power in the premises other than to recommend the appropriations which are necessary to meet the demands of this branch of the public service as they arise under existing law, and to express the earnest hope and recommendation that the proper committee or committees of the House will take up the matter without delay during this session, with a view to the enactment of proper legislation.

A word more and I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas. This matter of the increase of the expenses of the Federal courts has been going on all of these years, as shown by the report, and attention to it has been called by various members on the floor from time to time. Some of the increase arises from the natural increase in population; the increase in the number of courts and the increase of business being legitimate increases. Much of it, in my judgment and in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations, from what examination it has been able to give to the matter, comes from the fee system.

Now, just what the remedy is I do not know. I suspect it lies along the line of placing the United States district attorneys upon a fixed salary—possibly other officials as well. It may be the marshals ought to be salaried officers, and the United States commissioners, also; but when the maximum of a salary of a United States attorney is $6,000, as a general rule they are apt to agonize until that maximum is reached, and I have thought sometimes, from information I have received, that the fee system in this respect occasionally causes practical oppression in office against the citizen.

That is all I can say about it.

Mr. SETTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SETTLE. Has the gentleman any information that will enable him to state to the House in what districts these abnormal increases of expenditures, of which he speaks, have occurred? Is that information contained in the report of the Attorney-General?

Mr. CANNON. I will say, in response to the gentleman from North Carolina, that if I recollect aright the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] introduced a resolution recently in the House asking for that information under the Department of Justice, and I am informed that the work there approaches completion, and that the House will soon have the response to it—the complete information covered by the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I will state that I called at the Attorney-General's Office on yesterday, and examined the preliminary draft of the reports of the House. It is almost completed, and they thought it would be ready probably to-morrow or the next day for transmission. I think it will give a full answer to the inquiry propounded by my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. CANNON. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say in reference to the pending bill that it meets my hearty concurrence. I do not believe that there is an item in the bill that will not commend itself, after ample discussion, to the members of the committee.

There is only one thing that I wish to say in addition to the explanation given by the gentleman from Illinois in reference to the deficiencies for the Department of Justice. As stated by him, it has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations for very many years—and that practice has been approved by the House—of appropriating only for a portion of the fiscal year, say about one-half, and that accounts for the large deficiency which appears on the bill for the Department of Justice. This practice has obtained for eight or ten years, and no matter which party may have been in power in the House it has never varied from that practice.

Now, it would not be just to hold the Attorney-General or the Department of Justice responsible for any excess of expenditures made either by the courts themselves or by the commissioners under the appropriations made by Congress. The Department of Justice has practically no control over such an expenditure; and so, where expenses are allowed by the judge presiding, they are considered as absolutely approved, and nothing remains for the Department of Justice and the proper Auditor of the Treasury to do but to allow and pay them.

I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that there is necessity for a reform in the matter of expenditures for commissioners, and also for United States marshals and their deputies. Whether or not the salary system will result in this reform it is impossible to say; but I wish to state that unless something be done you will certainly see these expenditures enormously increasing year by year, it makes no difference what Administration may have control of the Government. They will increase from year to year, until they become so large as to awaken the attention of the people and such an earnest demand for reform is made that Congress will respond to it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. There is no way, is there, of estimating anywhere near what the expense will be during the coming year?

Mr. SAYERS. There is none.

Mr. NORTHWAY. You have just got to cover it by a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes. To illustrate: At the last session of the last Congress, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and as a member of the subcommittee on deficiencies, I can state that it was our intention to gather up every possible deficiency for prior years, and we went as far back as the years 1888 and 1889. We appropriated for every deficiency that was estimated for by the Department of Justice. We went so far that after the bill had passed the House a representative of the Department went to the Senate and stated that our bill in this respect was $80,000 too much, and it was accordingly cut down. But you will find in this bill deficiencies amounting to several hundred thousand dollars for the period for which we were endeavoring to appropriate, although we thought we had appropriated a sufficient amount under the estimates of the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have general debate extended ten minutes, so that I may yield a little time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NORTHWAY] and such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very glad that the Committee on Appropriations have brought up this question. We have had it up often before. It is a troublesome one. The growth of the expenses of the Federal courts we are all familiar with, and as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has stated, much of it can be legitimately accounted for. The growth of the country, the admission of new States, the creation of new courts, and the large growth of corporations, which in most cases have the power of transferring litigation affecting them to the Federal courts, have all tended to swell the business of those courts. In the last Congress the Judiciary Committee took hold of this question, and they had under consideration what was known as the Stone bill, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], who is now a member of the Committee on Appropriations, having charge of it; but I am informed by those who were familiar with the provisions of that bill that it fell of its own weight; that while it sought to put officials upon salaries instead of upon fees, when the committee came to figure upon the results of the bill it was found that the expense would be greater than it is under the fee system, and the bill died in the committee.

There are a number of bills now before the Committee on the Judiciary bearing upon this question, and the matter is being looked after and studied with the view to see if some remedy can be found. I know of no suggestion of any bill or legislation in detail coming from the Department of Justice. We have had able Attorneys-General who have admitted the difficulties, but still we are without the suggestion from them of a remedy. It will be impossible to run the Federal courts without heavy expenditures, because we have a big and growing country; but I believe that there are serious difficulties in connection with the administration of the offices of United States commissioners, and possibly of deputy marshals and assistant district attorneys, whose interests lie in the filing of informations before the committing magistrates, and continuing from day to day, after sessions of an hour or two, in order that they may get the per diem allowed by law, and it may be that we shall be able to find some remedy for these difficulties.

I yield for a question to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I simply desire to correct an error into which the gentleman from Iowa has evidently fallen. The Stone bill, to which he refers, did not fall of its own weight; neither has it fallen at all. As a matter of fact it makes a very considerable reduction in expenditures. The experts of the Department of Justice all substantially agree upon it. The facts are very fully set forth in the report which accompanied that bill, and, as I understand it, the bill has been reintroduced, and will be urged before the committee of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is chairman.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am very glad to have the gentleman make his statement. My statement is based upon information received from a member of the committee in the last Congress who is familiar with the details of the bill, and who told me what I have stated. I do not speak from my own information, as I did not have occasion to study the provisions of the bill in the last session. I intend to do so now. The gentleman from whom I derived my information was then and is now a member of the committee, and he worked hard upon the bill. That is all I desire to say, and if I have any time remaining I will yield it back to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, of course it will do no good, and I have not time to-day, to discuss the imperfections of the fee system in the United States courts. I do not propose to enter upon any such discussion, but to respond to one idea that may suggest itself. The large deficiency carried in this bill will surprise members, as it surprised the members of the committee when we had it under consideration; and the question may arise in your minds in this way: Can not we cut down these enormous fees and do something to reform them by declining to make this deficiency appropriation? Let me say that that was one matter under serious consideration. There are upon this committee two or three gentlemen who have served for years, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], to whom the younger members of the committee deferred. The investigation showed that the Department of Justice is not responsible for this at all, and ought not to be held responsible. The fees are all created in the United States courts throughout the various States, and whether we appropriate for them or not will make but little difference. The marshals or commissioners, whoever they may be, can go into the court, the court will certify their fees, and they will obtain judgments, and thus we would have judgments coming up to us for payment. We can not, therefore, do anything but make the appropriation. After a most thorough investigation we were entirely satisfied that the Committee on Appropriations must make this appropriation and that the House ought to pass it, as there is no help for it. The remedy is in another direction, not here. We can not help anything either by cutting down the appropriation or declining to make it here; and there is no way in which to reform this abuse as to marshals' fees except by passing a general law.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to have about five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. If I have any time, I will; and if not, I will ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has three minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from New York wants some time also.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia for three minutes.

Mr. SWANSON. I want eight minutes. I will take three minutes, and five minutes under the five-minute rule.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the time for general debate may be extended fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Now I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

[Mr. SWANSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SWANSON. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would give me two minutes more.

Mr. CANNON. I have promised to yield my remaining time, seven minutes, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS], but we shall reach this question again when we are considering the bill under the five-minute rule, when the gentleman from Virginia will have an opportunity to further discuss it.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Chairman, while I agree very fully with the gentleman who has last addressed the committee [Mr. SWANSON] as to the necessity of revising the present system and providing for the remuneration of these United States court officers by salaries, yet at the same time this bill, in my judgment, is a step in the right direction. It provides in a measure for putting the United States courts upon a basis of respectability, by furnishing them with the means of properly exercising their jurisdiction, means which they have not heretofore possessed. The district in which I reside extends from the Hudson River to the western bounds of the State of New York. It is probably one of the largest and most populous districts in the United States, but under the parsimonious appropriations that have been made heretofore for defraying the expenses the means at the disposal of the United States court in that district have been so meager that the court has been obliged to adjourn on some occasions without doing any business whatever for want of money to defray its legitimate expenses.

During the last year two courts were convened in the district, one in the city of Buffalo, having a large number of criminal cases before it, indictments already preferred; but it was without means of defraying the expense of bringing witnesses to testify in those cases so as to try the indictments. The consequence was that the court was compelled to adjourn without doing any business, and the persons who were indicted—some of them, it is true, for insignificant offenses, but others for high crimes, the court being without the power to retain them longer in custody—were discharged without any trial. Another court was convened in another part of the district during the same year and was subjected to the same disability, so that persons indicted, as well as those who had cases to be tried before the court, were dismissed for want of means of paying the ordinary expenses.

Mr. SAYERS. What year was that?

Mr. DANIELS. Last year.

Mr. SAYERS. At what time?

Mr. DANIELS. One case was in the latter part of the spring and the other in the summer season. I have before me here the charge of Judge Coxe, showing how that court felt the necessity for increased appropriations.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me a moment, when the deficiency bill which went into effect on March 4 last was being prepared by the Committee on Appropriations, the Department of Justice was asked to estimate for the amount which would be necessary to pay every deficiency during the fiscal year 1895. The estimated deficiencies, as well as those which had actually accrued, were provided for by the committee, and I say to the gentleman now, as I have said before, that the committee allowed every estimate. When the bill went to the Senate a representative of the Department of Justice went before the Senate Committee on Appropriations and stated that we had appropriated $80,000 too much, and so the amount was cut down in the Senate to that extent. The gentleman will see, therefore, that it was not the fault either of the Committee on Appropriations of the last House, or of the House itself, if there was any failure to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to pay every legitimate expense of the courts up to the 1st of July, 1895.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Chairman, I think the statement of the gentleman corroborates and sustains the position I have been endeavoring to maintain here—that the appropriation was grossly insufficient, and that on that account these failures on the part of the courts to exercise their jurisdiction took place.

Mr. SAYERS. But it was not because of any fault on the part of either the Committee on Appropriations or the last House.

Mr. DANIELS. I am not attributing fault in any particular quarter, Mr. Chairman, but simply stating the fact that this deficiency has existed, and that because of it the court failed to exercise the jurisdiction which it was called upon to exercise under the laws of the land.

Mr. SAYERS. Further, Mr. Chairman, I will say that it is almost impossible for the Department of Justice to anticipate, with any degree of accuracy, the amount which will be required by the courts throughout the country, and I think, therefore, that a reform in this matter becomes necessary. If we were paying salaries we should then know the amount due each officer, and could appropriate accordingly. But inasmuch as they do not receive salaries, I repeat it is impossible for either the Department of Justice or Congress to anticipate what will be the expenditures of the courts and of their commissioners, marshals, deputy marshals, clerks, juries, and witnesses during any fiscal year.

Mr. DANIELS. Congress nevertheless must take the responsibility of making adequate appropriations for meeting these expenses and providing the officers that are necessary for the purpose of carrying on the business of the courts.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman will allow me to ask him this question: How can Congress make its appropriations except upon estimates from the Department of Justice; and how can the Department of Justice make even approximately accurately estimates when it is impossible to tell how much these courts are going to expend? There is no way of even approximating the amount.

Mr. DANIELS. The court of which I am now speaking has made no extraordinary expenditures in any direction; it has kept its expenses within the closest possible limits. It has not, however, had the means of employing a sufficient number of officers to take care of two juries when they have been out considering their verdicts upon two different cases. This court has not been furnished even with the means of paying for the meals which should be furnished jurors when they are kept out a number of hours deliberating upon their verdicts.

In reference to this deficiency of funds Judge Coxe, the United States judge of that district, says:

Several prisoners have escaped for lack of sufficient officers to guard them. At a recent term of the court one of the prisoners left the prisoners' dock, came upon the platform behind the bench, and commenced conversation with the judge during the trial of a case. There was no officer in the court room to see the impropriety, not to say indecency, of such conduct and prevent it.

More than that, these courts have not been supplied even with the means of employing stenographers, so that the course of business in the trial of cases has been greatly retarded and these courts have not been able to proceed with the expedition which characterizes business in the State courts. A State court is supplied with all these facilities. It can employ a stenographer; it can facilitate the taking of testimony; it can dispose of its business certainly one-third more rapidly than the United States courts have been able to do.

All these circumstances tend to indicate the necessity of increased appropriations for these courts. I am not advocating extravagant appropriations, but such as will be liberal enough to meet the actual necessities, such appropriations as have not been made heretofore and the want of which has interfered materially with the administration of justice. It is certainly a reproach to the public authorities, to Congress, and to the people of the United States that men are indicted for crimes for which they would probably upon trial be convicted, and yet the courts are without funds to institute trials on the indictments and to determine whether the accused are guilty or innocent.

I consider, therefore, that this bill is a step in the right direction. It does not go so far as the circumstances would justify; but certainly it opens an avenue by which the obstructions heretofore existing in the discharge of the business of these courts may be removed and the courts be thus relieved from the reproach of being unable to execute the laws of the United States for want of proper appropriations to meet their necessities.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read the following:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1896, and for other objects hereinafter stated, namely.

Mr. SETTLE. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to oppose any of the appropriations carried by this bill, but I rise for the purpose of submitting a few remarks in the line of those submitted by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], with reference to the increase of business in the Federal courts in the State of North Carolina. On some other occasion, I hope to submit to the Committee on the Judiciary and to this House certain facts connected with the administration of the laws in the Federal courts in that State, with the view of securing some legislation for the removal of the evils which now exist. On this occasion I desire merely to have printed as part of my remarks a letter which I have received from the United States district judge of the western district of North Carolina, suggesting certain amendments of the existing law. To these suggestions I wish to invite the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary. If I can have permission to have this letter incorporated in my remarks without being read, I desire to say nothing further at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to printing the letter in connection with the gentleman's remarks? The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

GREENSBORO, N. C., January 14, 1896.

MY DEAR SIR: My brief conversation with you a few days ago induced me to hope that there was a possibility of having some judicious and needful amendments made to the internal-revenue laws in regard to the prosecution and punishment of retail dealers of liquors. Under the present law any person who sells or offers for sale spirituous liquors in less quantities than 5 gallons at the same time is regarded as a retail dealer in liquor.

Under a strict construction of this law, I am satisfied that there are more than ten thousand violations each year in this district.

By the activity and vigilance of officers the prosecutions became so numerous, were so expensive, and caused such delay in the courts in disposing of more important business, that the circuit and district judges, after careful consideration, adopted a rule of court that commissioners of the circuit court should not issue warrants unless the informing affidavits showed that the persons accused "carried on the business of retailing by frequent sales."

In my charge to grand juries I instruct them not to return a bill as true unless the evidence before them brings the case clearly within the rule of court. I am very anxious to reduce the enormous expenses of the courts incurred in these prosecutions.

The defendants generally are very poor and ignorant and have large families dependent upon them for the necessaries of life.

If judgment is prayed, I am now compelled by law to imprison them at least thirty days and impose a fine of $100, and they have to remain in prison another thirty days before they can take the oath of insolvency and be discharged.

The strict and rigid enforcement of this law does not and never will stop the petty neighborhood retailing of whisky, and I can see no public good that can result from the prosecution of every person who sells or offers for sale without payment of the special tax.

The law certainly does not advance the "cause of temperance," but rather increases insobriety. It operates somewhat as a monopoly in favor of saloon keepers in towns and cities, who realize large profits and greatly demoralize communities. Men who live in remote and sparsely inhabited sections of country want whisky. They can not conveniently procure it from regular saloons, they have not capital to "carry on the business," and this want and inconvenience give rise to illicit neighborhood traffic, where profits and business are not sufficient to sustain a regular grogshop. The prosecution of these petty country neighborhood transactions causes enormous expense, they in no way tend to increase the revenue of the Government, they produce much suffering in the families of offenders, and result in numerous neighborhood strifes and almost countless perjuries.

A remedy for these evils can not be effected by a law empowering commissioners to hear and dispose of these little cases. It would open the door to much oppression, wrong, and general disturbance in communities, and not reduce the expenses of enforcing the law.

The best remedy which I can suggest is to so amend the law so as to clearly provide that for the purpose of assessment for taxation every person who sells or offers for sale spirituous liquors less than 5 gallons shall be regarded as a retail dealer, and be liable for special tax and penalty to be collected by distraint; and that prosecutions by indictment shall only be instituted against offenders who carry on the business of retailing spirituous liquors by frequent sales, or who make such preparation for sale as indicates a purpose to engage in the traffic as a business, and that such offenders upon conviction shall be imprisoned not more than one year, or fined not more than $1,000, or both, at the discretion of the court. Minimum punishments should be intrusted to the discretion of the court familiar with the facts and circumstances of each case.

The object of restricting the maximum punishment to one year is to take such cases out of the class of infamous crimes as defined by the Supreme Court in Mackins's Case, 117 United States, 348.

In all cases where the punishment may exceed one year the prosecution must be by indictment. If retail cases could be prosecuted by "information," a large amount of expenses would be avoided and offenders would be more certainly convicted and punished. Many professional witnesses, for the purpose of obtaining fees, swear enough to have a defendant bound over to court, and then so shape their evidence before a grand jury as to defeat a bill. This could not be done in a trial in open court on information before the judge and upon the skillful examination of the district attorney.

The object of "fine or imprisonment" is to enable the court to make judicious discrimination in punishment according to the facts and circumstances of each case. A fine could often be secured from an insolvent defendant or his friends to prevent imprisonment, and it would be as effectual preventive punishment as imprisonment. When defendants are both fined and imprisoned they will pay costs and fine by taking oath of insolvency, and the cost of imprisonment will be considerable.

From long experience I find that criminal and penal laws are difficult in enforcement unless the policy of such laws is approved and sustained by the public sentiment of the good citizens of the country. I think this public sentiment is now very decidedly against illicit distilling and the illicit traffic in whisky as a regular business; but a very large number of good citizens do not approve of the rigid prosecution of petty transactions of sale in remote country sections, in small neighborhood dealings where whisky can not be conveniently obtained from regular saloons and grogshops. The revenue officers are very active and vigilant in hunting up such cases. The evidence generally makes out a clear case of violation of law, and honest juries convict, while they do not approve of such prosecutions and regard the law as too stringent and "iron clad."

If the law can be amended as I suggest, I feel confident that such amendments would be approved and appreciated by the best public sentiment, and the internal-revenue laws would cease to be such a prominent and disturbing factor in politics in this State.

My dear SETTLE, don't ask too much by way of amendment, as I fear you would fail if you ask too great a change.

Congress may well limit maximum punishment to guard the constitutional provision against "excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishment"; but surely United States judges can be safely intrusted with the discretion of minimum punishment in retail cases, and to fine or imprison. Such judges are independent and uninfluenced by political considerations. They have much experience in the enforcement of law, and they know the peculiar facts and circumstances in each case, and should be allowed to act wisely, expediently, and mercifully in the administration of justice.

Yours, sincerely, ROBT. P. DICK.

Hon. THOMAS SETTLE.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the purchase, subject to a ground rent of not exceeding $200 per annum, from the Imperial Japanese Government of the present building and site occupied by the United States legation at Tokyo, $16,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill [Mr. CANNON] whether he is informed as to the price which will probably be asked for the building and site at Tokyo, the purchase of which is contemplated by this amendment.

Mr. CANNON. The item speaks for itself:

For the purchase, subject to a ground rent of not exceeding $200 per annum, from the Imperial Japanese Government, of the present building and site occupied by the United States legation at Tokyo, $16,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MERCER. I understand that the Government is now paying $4,000 a year rent.

Mr. CANNON. So we are informed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. MERCER. The building is a two-story frame building, rather old and not in the best condition. At the present rate of exchange an American dollar is worth in Japan about two Japanese dollars or Japanese yen, so that $16,000 American money, and I am glad to add that our money is always as good as gold, would be equal in Japan to about $32,000. I do not think the house and site are worth to exceed the sum of $12,000 in gold, and I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that that paragraph be amended to read $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SAYERS. Has the gentleman seen this building and grounds?

Mr. MERCER. Yes; I have seen them.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I will state that this item is recommended by the Committee on Appropriations under the estimate set forth in the Book of Estimates and for the reason contained in Executive Document No. 124, which I hold in my hand. The Secretary of State gives the reasons, but I will save the time of reading the document, unless the gentleman desires it, by stating briefly that this purchase is based on the recommendation of our representative at Tokyo, from which it appears that the committee found in substance as follows: These premises have been occupied for this purpose, if I recollect aright, for about six years; that they belong to the Japanese Government; that the annual rental we pay there is $4,000; that we have an option to buy up to, if I recollect aright—the document states it—the 1st of May next, or possibly some time in April, but at all events during the coming spring, when the lease and option will expire. Now, our representative there states that this is an exceedingly low price for the property.

Mr. MERCER. Does the option fix the price?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; it fixes it at 30,000 yen, the equivalent of the amount recommended here, $16,000 in our currency.

It has been urged strongly by our representative there and indorsed by the Secretary of State. Speaking of the great difficulty that our representative labors under in getting proper accommodations there, we are informed that the Japanese Government itself is crowded out into leased buildings, not so well located as this one; and there is no prospect of renewing the lease or option unless we avail ourselves of it now. This appropriation, it seemed to the committee, on all grounds was the best thing to be done, in view of the statements made, provided, of course, that our representative there tells the truth, and I suppose he does; at least, he is indorsed by the present Secretary of State.

Mr. MERCER. I understand the Japanese Government is desirous that the United States Government should own a legation—house and site—in Tokyo, and have expressed to the American minister a desire that such a purchase be made by our Government. If the purchase of this property is a necessity, then I think we should make the best bargain possible.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me just there? If we buy this property for $16,000, we will own it, whereas the rent for four years would equal that amount.

Mr. MERCER. That is true enough; but I think we are paying an exorbitant rent for the property. This is an old building; it has been improved and repaired two or three times and will demand repairs continually; either that or we must erect a new building in a few years. The location, it is true, is a splendid one; and if the United States should own a legation there, I do not know of a better locality than this. There are plenty of sites to be had, however, for Tokyo extends over a very great area. Washington is spoken of as a "city of magnificent distances," but it can not hold a candle to Tokyo. There is a distance of 7 or 8 miles between different railroad stations in the city, while the main thoroughfare is broader and longer than Pennsylvania avenue, and all within the city limits. This location, as I have said, is a good one, but I think the sum of $16,000 in gold is entirely too much to pay for it, and I believe that if our minister was instructed to purchase it for less he could do so.

I suggest, therefore, that the bill be amended by making it read "$12,000," instead of "$16,000," because if we appropriate $16,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, I am quite sure that the whole amount will be expended.

Mr. CANNON. It will unquestionably be expended, because the appropriation is made with the idea of accepting the option from the Japanese Government, which is to pay 30,000 yen—the equivalent of $16,000 of our currency—for the property.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Chairman, the Japanese Government will present this property to the Government of the United States for nothing, if it will accept it, and they have so intimated heretofore. The Committee on Foreign Affairs gave attention to the matter and determined that the United States Government could not submit to such humiliation. Besides, if we accept it in that way, we will be compelled, in a spirit of reciprocity, to at once present to the Japanese Government a site in this city for a Japanese legation, and perhaps for an embassy, which will have to be in keeping with the others here, and there is not one in this city of less value than $16,000 to $60,000.

The French Government accepted a present, centuries ago, from the Turkish Government, of a residence on the Bosphorus, and they were compelled in reciprocity to present to the Turkish Government that magnificent palace in Paris which is now inhabited by the Turkish ambassador, who is so reduced in revenues that he can only keep three servants in a palace which has a dining room that seats 82 guests. At the time that the bargain was made for the renting of this residence in Japan we paid $4,000 rent because the minister said it was the best he could do, and, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has just said, it is good business to get rid of the payment of $4,000 a year by the purchase for $16,000. If you attempt any chaffering with the Japanese Government, it is very probable that the answer will be: "Eight thousand dollars? No; but take it for nothing."

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

For purchase of horses and wagons for office and mail service, to be used only for official purposes, care and subsistence of horses, including shoeing, and of wagons, harness, and repairs of the same, $1,000.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, after line 5, insert:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to cause such furniture and records, used by the Government officials in the custom-house building in Chicago, Ill., as may be necessary, to be removed to rented quarters; and for necessary expenses of such removal, for altering and fitting old counters, screens, and cases so that they may be utilized in the rooms to which they are to be transferred, and for any additional furniture that may be necessary he is authorized to expend not exceeding $3,500 of the appropriation for furniture and repairs of furniture for public buildings, made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1896."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

State and Territorial homes: For continuing aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888: Provided, That one-half of any sum or sums retained by State homes on account of pensions received by the inmates shall be deducted from the aid herein provided for, being a deficiency for the fiscal year 1895, $18,799.74.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to inquire whether that is the language used in the former bill?

Mr. CANNON. It is.

Mr. SAYERS. This deficiency was not anticipated when this item was before the Committee on Appropriations in the last Congress. We gave the entire estimate, but it has been found that the estimate was not large enough, and this appropriation becomes necessary.

Mr. PICKLER. This is the language of the former bill, as I understand?

Mr. SAYERS. Exactly so.

Mr. PICKLER. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Classification of certain mineral lands in Montana and Idaho: For compensation of the twelve commissioners appointed under the act of February 26 1895, to examine and classify certain lands within the land grant and indemnity land grant limits of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, in the States of Montana and Idaho, with special reference to the mineral or non-mineral character of such lands, $13,500: Provided, That said commissioners shall be paid at the rate of $10 a day each while actually engaged in the performance of their duties, which amount shall include their transportation and subsistence expenses, and that the total amount of compensation to be paid to each commissioner annually shall in no case exceed the sum of $2,500.

Mr. HARTMAN. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 14, page 10, strike out the word "ten" and insert the word "thirteen."

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. HARTMAN. I only ask the attention of the committee for a moment upon this amendment. The facts surrounding the services of the commissioners appointed under this act are probably not known to the Committee on Appropriations, or to the members of the House. These commissioners, under the bill, are required to examine and classify mineral lands within the grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. In order to do so they are compelled to outfit and equip themselves for camp life in the mountains.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HARTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. The members of this commission have been appointed, have they not?

Mr. HARTMAN. They have.

Mr. SAYERS. They have been in service?

Mr. HARTMAN. They have been in service since last May.

Mr. SAYERS. And receiving $10 a day?

Mr. HARTMAN. They have been getting $10 a day.

Mr. SAYERS. And they wish to continue their duties?

Mr. HARTMAN. They wish to continue their duties, and they wish to receive adequate compensation for it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Texas will give me his attention for a moment. From the very fact that these commissioners are compelled to hire horses and mules for the purpose of conveying them into the mountains to actually perform these services, the very fact that they must employ men to take charge of these animals when they are out examining these lands, the very fact that they must employ a cook for the purpose of keeping their provender in shape and enabling them to perform this work properly, it does seem to me that they ought to have more than $10 a day, because of the fact that they are compelled to pay their expenses, they are compelled to pay for the support even of the men they employ and the wages of the men, and for the forage of their horses and mules. I undertake to say it is inadequate compensation. Again, they are compelled to go away from the railroad 60, 75, and 100 miles, and they can not possibly return to their homes on Sundays. They get no compensation for staying out that time, and it seems to me, taking into consideration the hardships and the unusual expenses which they are compelled to go to, this amendment ought to be allowed. I do not care to consume any further time.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that this point of order is made because the pay of these commissioners is fixed by law at $10 a day while actually employed, not exceeding $2,500 a year. It changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I will have to do that.

Mr. McRAE. Before the gentleman asks a ruling, I desire to say a few words in behalf of these men.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve the point of order, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I indorse the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Montana. The compensation allowed these commissioners, under the strict construction of the Interior Department, is not adequate for the character of service they perform. They have to make these examinations in the field, and in doing so are required to provide their own camp equipage, to employ cooks, to hire horses, to pay their own traveling expenses, and are not allowed pay for Sundays. Their total compensation is so limited by the original law that they do not receive compensation commensurate with the difficult and important service they perform. These are exceedingly important commissions, and at present are composed of men of high character and first-class ability. They are doing an important work for the Government by segregating from the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company the excepted mineral lands, and it seems to me they ought to have for expenses what an ordinary inspector from the Land Office gets. Inspectors and special agents are allowed $3 a day for subsistence when on duty. No officer representing the Department of the Interior goes out into the field without having his expenses paid or an allowance made for such expense, except these gentlemen, who are required to do such work as makes it necessary for them to go into camp and endure the hardships of such life, while the other class of men, for whom expense money is allowed, are permitted to stop at first-class hotels and travel in sleeping cars. This amendment only provides what is usual for men in the field, as they of necessity have to be.

The circumstances under which the original bill was passed during last Congress are familiar to old members who had anything to do with it; and they will remember that it was insisted then that this compensation was not sufficient. No one, however, supposed that such a strict construction would be placed upon the law as to deny them compensation for one-seventh of the time they were actually engaged. I do not believe such a construction to be just or legal, but there is no remedy for them. So I hope that the gentleman from Illinois will not insist upon his point of order, but will allow to these gentlemen what is allowed to others who go out from the Department to do field work. I am satisfied that if he knew how important is the work required, and the high order of ability represented in the commissions, he would not insist, but would allow the committee to vote upon it.

Mr. CANNON. I ask a ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to strike out the language commencing with the word "provided," in line 13, down to and including line 19, on page 10, because that is merely repeating the provisions of the law and performs no useful purpose there.

Mr. SAYERS. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if he is quite sure now, unless this provision is retained in the bill, that it may not be held that these commissioners can receive more pay?

Mr. CANNON. My recollection is that this is substantially the language of the law.

Mr. McRAE. I think you are correct about that.

Mr. CANNON. And my recollection is reenforced by that of the clerk of the committee.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is the language of the law.

Mr. CANNON. It does not help anything, but is a standing invitation for somebody to increase it first, and second——

Mr. SAYERS. They have already endeavored to get an increase.

Mr. CANNON. And it lumbers up the statute without serving any useful purpose.

Mr. SAYERS. All I wish to be done in the matter is to hold these commissioners to $10 a day, and to not more than $2,500 per annum. They have accepted these offices at that salary. They have been at work for months at that compensation. They do not show any disposition to resign. They have been at work during this fall, they will be at work during the spring, and I do not wish the Interior Department to be furnished with an opportunity to increase the pay of these commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, there is no objection to the limitation of $2,500. There is no danger of exceeding that sum, either at $13 a day or $10 a day, because they can not work near all of the year. They are called off in the winter months.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me state to my friend that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] was before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for the appropriation because these men could work during the winter season.

Mr. McRAE. I have not said that they can not work in some of the districts during the winter season; but I know as a matter of fact that they are not at work now, and I know that in some of the districts they can not work in winter.

Mr. HARTMAN. The statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is correct, with this limitation. What I stated before the committee I repeat here, and it is absolutely correct, that in some of the districts, notably the Bozeman district, work can be done during the winter season.

Mr. McRAE. In some districts they can work and in some they can not work during the winter season. It depends on which side of the mountains they are working.

Mr. SAYERS. The statement of the gentleman from Montana as to what he told the committee is correct.

Mr. McRAE. My information is that in the Missoula district, which I had in mind, they can not work during the winter season.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is the Missoula district?

Mr. McRAE. Yes.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add after line 13 the following: "And that the Secretary of the Interior may allow each commission a surveying outfit when they are examining unsurveyed lands."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that amendment that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Arkansas upon the point of order.

Mr. McRAE. Does the gentleman from Illinois decline to hear the reasons why this is necessary?

Mr. CANNON. I do not object to the gentleman making a speech, but I give notice now that I shall insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be considered reserved.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Chairman, the reasons for that amendment are that these commissioners, in one district at least, will soon complete the examination of the surveyed lands, and when they go to examine the unsurveyed lands, embracing the larger part of the district, they will necessarily need some assistance in running lines, in order to do the work with any accuracy or with advantage to the Government. They will be in the midst of the Rocky Mountains, where it is almost impossible to get through. There are no roads and but few trails, and it will be necessary to have such an outfit.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I had so much confidence in the judgment of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] in the last Congress, when these limitations were placed upon these officials, that out of my regard for his judgment as it was last winter, I must insist upon the point of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. McRAE. But the gentleman has not heard me on this proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I listened to the gentleman last winter. [Laughter.]

Mr. McRAE. You did not hear me on this proposition last winter, for I had no information as to these difficulties. I have always endeavored to have the public-land surveys extended over this country wherever they are necessary, but I have hardly ever failed to meet the stubborn objection and resistance of the Committee on Appropriations when I have asked for this.

Mr. SAYERS. For an increase of appropriations, you mean.

Mr. McRAE. Now, if the gentlemen in charge of this bill will not authorize these surveys in the regular way, and we must send out commissioners to segregate the mineral from the nonmineral land, they ought at least to give the surveyors to help them in making the lines. Do they merely want the commissioners to go out and look at the lands without being able to mark the corners and describe the land? It seems to me that such an examination would be of but little value to the Government.

Mr. CANNON. I want them to run and glorify according to the law under which they were created with the support of the gentleman from Arkansas and his friends.

Mr. McRAE. They will glorify their work, but the gentleman must not understand that that bill was proposed by the gentleman from Arkansas; it was proposed and advocated by the Representatives of the two States affected by it. However, I will tell the gentleman that I supported that bill, believing it to be right. Now, then, we do not want to nullify all the good effects of that law by sending out commissioners to examine these lands imperfectly. Let us give them surveying outfits to run the lines, so that we can always know them. As a matter of economy this provision ought to be adopted, for this will be perhaps the only survey ever needed for much of this land.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to say a word, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas. A person reading the RECORD to-morrow morning would infer that these commissioners could not perform their duties unless this amendment was adopted, and also that the Committee on Appropriations was opposed to the survey of the public lands. I want to say in this connection that the bill providing for these commissioners was supported by the gentleman from Arkansas in the last Congress, when he was chairman of the Committee on Public Lands; the salaries of these officials were fixed in that bill; these commissioners were appointed under that law; they have been working under that law; and if they now feel that in justice to themselves they can not work any longer under that law, if the salary prescribed by it is not sufficient in their opinion, let them resign and we will find others who can and will work under that law.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, in response to the gentleman from Texas, permit me to say that this amendment is not an attempt on the part of the existing commissioners to have their compensation increased. The act to which the gentleman refers was a piece of experimental legislation. What it undertook to provide for had never been attempted before in the United States, and so far it has operated very advantageously to the people and to the Government. It was the most valuable piece of legislation for the State of Montana that has ever been enacted by the Congress of the United States. We presumed when the bill was passed that it was as near perfect as it was possible for it to be and get through the Fifty-third Congress. It was passed. We could not help the fact that certain limitations were placed upon it by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and others; we could not have passed it without acceding to those requests.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. HARTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. I have just been informed by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] that these limitations were put upon the bill by the Senate. "The gentleman from Texas" has never been a Senator.

Mr. HARTMAN. Permit me to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that at the time I was making my argument or alleged argument in support of this bill the distinguished gentleman from Texas himself proposed the amendment whereby the compensation of these commissioners was reduced.

Mr. SAYERS. And that was a good day's work.

Mr. HARTMAN. It was a good day's work for the gentleman, but it was pretty rough on the commissioners.

Now, another thing; we have discovered under the operation of this law that there is one provision which could be added to it which would secure the accomplishment of much better work. The act being an experiment, it is no wonder that it is found to be in some particulars imperfect. Now, under the provisions of the existing law, when the commissioners go upon the unsurveyed lands to determine what are mineral and what are nonmineral, they are compelled to make a report in which they are supposed to designate what lands are mineral and what are nonmineral.

Mr. SAYERS. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HARTMAN. In one moment; let me finish my statement, and then I will yield.

Now, in making that report the commissioners must have some kind of intelligent description or designation of the land which they return as mineral lands, contradistinguished from that which they define as nonmineral lands. In order to have any definite line or boundary between these two classes of lands they must have the services of a surveyor to establish the lines. Every man knows that. Now, as the matter stands to-day, if the commissioners are to have the benefit of a surveyor's services they have to employ him and pay him out of their own miserable pittance of $10 a day. After they have done this, after they have hired their horses and their mules and paid the expenses necessary for their support and their traveling expenses between the railroad and the various places where they make their examinations, how much of that $10 a day does the gentleman from Texas suppose any one of these commissioners is going to have left? Nothing at all. Thus the result is one of two things: Either you compel these men to pay out all they receive and more than they receive in order to secure good service, or else you compel them to go on without the aid of a surveyor, the consequence being inefficient and bad work. It seems to me that the chairman of the committee [Mr. CANNON] ought, out of his proverbial generosity, to withdraw the point of order.

Mr. McRAE. We do not ask any increase of pay for these commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Let me say that on this question I will take the chairman's advice. The Committee on Public Lands is a beautiful committee and a jealous committee, individually and collectively.

Mr. LACEY. It is neither beautiful nor jealous; but——

Mr. CANNON. It is both beautiful and jealous. [Laughter.] Now, under the rules of this House that committee has exclusive jurisdiction to report legislation changing this law. Yet gentlemen come in here and agonize over this bill, upon which the rules of the House make any legislative amendment out of order. In their thirst for legislation on this subject I send them to the place where the water is to be found; it is not to be found, under the rules, in this bill.

Mr. McRAE. Will you help us on a bill which we may report?

Mr. CANNON. I will make up my mind about that. [Laughter]. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. PICKLER. Allow me to say that the Interior Department has, I think, quite a number of these outfits. I know that Department has been doing a large amount of surveying under the appropriations of the last Congress in the Indian Territory, and it is possible that these outfits can be furnished without any new expenditure of money.

Mr. CANNON. That is another argument to be addressed to the Committee on Public Lands, which has plenary jurisdiction of this subject.

Mr. HEPBURN. But if the statement of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] is true, then the point of order of the gentleman from Illinois will not lie. If the Department has these outfits on hand the furnishing of them does not change existing law.

Mr. SAYERS. That appropriation was made under another law; it has no reference to this particular case.

Mr. PICKLER. It is under the Interior Department, is it not?

Mr. SAYERS. It is.

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

Mr. McRAE. In view of the suggestion made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], I am inclined to think that perhaps the amendment is in order. It will be observed that we are not asking any increase of the appropriation; so that there is no objection to the amendment on that score. The Department, I feel quite confident, has some surveying parties now under employment that it can detail to this work without any increase of expense; so, as the amendment makes no change of law, but merely seeks to control the discretion of the Department on this particular point, I submit the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, a moment only in reply to the gentleman on the point of order.

The service which has been rendered under the Interior Department in the Indian Territory is quite a different service from that referred to here. That was authorized by an appropriation and by legislation on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. McRAE. But by the general law surveys, as you know, are provided for by the sundry civil bill——

Mr. SAYERS (continuing). And it would be without authority of law for the Secretary of the Interior to divert the expenditure of the appropriation from the particular surveys provided for in the Indian Territory to the surveys mentioned in this bill.

Mr. McRAE. But the general appropriation in the sundry civil act for surveys would cover it.

Mr. SAYERS. No; it would not authorize it.

Mr. McRAE. I mean the provision of the sundry civil appropriation bill providing for the general surveys, which leaves it all in his discretion, and this allows him to authorize some of his force to assist in the work in the manner suggested without a change of law.

Mr. SAYERS. This is a service under a special law; and the Secretary of the Interior has no right to divert funds appropriated for another purpose to this particular purpose.

Mr. CANNON. If he has a right to do it now there is no necessity for this provision, and I think I must insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule upon the point of order, and sustains the point.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my friend from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] a question. He has almost convinced me that the Committee on Appropriations has made a mistake in recommending a deficiency appropriation for these commissioners. I do not want to do a vain thing, and have the money thrown away, or recommend an appropriation unless it is to be used, and can be used, for the good of the public service; and so I will ask the gentleman whether or not it can be so used——

Mr. SAYERS. And will be.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). And will be, in his judgment, for such purpose?

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, up to the extent of the examination of the surveyed lands the commissioners can do efficient service. Until the surveyed lands are entirely exhausted there is no reason why the appropriation should not be made.

But in all sincerity, and I am satisfied from the twinkling I see in the eye of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that there is some suggestion on his part or intention to overturn the "gentleman from Montana"——

Mr. CANNON. Not at all. On the contrary, I put the provision in on account of the industry and insistence of the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. HARTMAN. And the "gentleman from Montana" is very grateful.

Mr. CANNON. We thought he wanted it for a public service, but he has almost convinced me the other way. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe that this money can be appropriated with a certainty that it will be used to great advantage in the examination and classification of the surveyed lands. That will be the case until by law, either by general bill or by some appropriation bill, it is provided that surveying outfits can accompany these commissioners in the examination of the unsurveyed lands; and I frankly admit that to expend money on the unsurveyed lands unaccompanied by a surveying gang would be of no possible value.

Mr. CANNON. Are there enough of the surveyed lands to keep these gentlemen busy until the 1st of July?

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes; and probably until the 1st day of December.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. Let the Clerk proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of stenographers employed by said commissioners when authorized by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, for the purpose of reducing testimony to writing in cases where it is found necessary to examine witnesses in order to establish the character of lands examined by said commissioners, $500; in all, $20,000.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to an amendment which I propose to offer at the end of line 9, the paragraph at the top of page 11.

Mr. CANNON. Very well; let the gentleman offer his amendment.

Mr. TOWNE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 11, after line 9, insert:

"FOR SURVEYING AND ALLOTTING FOR CHIPPEWAS IN MINNESOTA.

"For completing the necessary surveys within the Chippewa Reservation in Minnesota, including expenses of examining and appraising pine lands, under the provisions of the act approved January 14, 1889, to be reimbursed to the United States out of the proceeds of their lands, $5,000."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, having heard read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE], I will say that my attention has been called to it, and I am satisfied that the appropriation should be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

For additional salary of chief of accounting division, $600.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to that item. If he will examine the official register of some twenty years ago he will find that chiefs of division were then practically unknown, and that that grade in the public service in the Departments has grown up since then, and that it costs the Government a great deal of additional money. Now, here is a provision for additional salary for one of those officers in this urgent deficiency bill, and I should like to ask for some explanation as to the necessity for it.

Mr. CANNON. I will state to the gentleman that the Joint Commission, which the gentleman recollects about——

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I recollect it very well.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). Wisely or unwisely, as the case may be, brought about a complete change in the accounting system of the Departments. In the organization of the accounting division of the Department of Justice there was an increase of force, while there was a decrease in the Treasury Department proper. Without reference to the wisdom or unwisdom of that law, it is necessary to have the proper employees under it, and from all I can ascertain the accounting division in the Department of Justice is doing good work. I do not recall the name of the gentleman to whom this appropriation will go, nor do I know where he is from, but he is a gentleman who, I believe, is really at the head of this division, receiving, I believe, $1,800 a year, along with other clerks. I will state further that he seemed to have so much merit, coming, as he did, before the committee, not in reference to this item, for he never referred to it, but in the presentation of the estimates of the Department of Justice, he seemed to have so much information touching the expenditures of the same that it seemed to the committee proper to make this recommendation.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to have the explanation given by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I wish here to call attention to this as one of the very many additions that have been made, not only to force but to salaries, under the so-called reorganization of the Departments. It was claimed during the debate on that measure that there would be a saving of some $200,000 annually; but if the whole roster of officers and salaries could be completed and brought before this House at this time it would be shown that there has not been any practical saving, while the business of the several Departments has been performed in a less accurate manner and no more rapidly than before; in fact, that the accounting divisions of the Treasury Department are in such condition that they are practically unable to tell what they have done or what they will do, and that no man knows what the condition of his account may be under this so-called revised system, and that all the records and files of the Departments have been torn up and twisted here and scattered there until it is impossible to find the papers which ought to be on file in the Treasury Department. I hope that the time will speedily come when all this will be righted, and that the accounting system of the Government will be put back into the condition in which it was from the days of Hamilton down until the last Congress.

That bill authorized a number of new officers, law clerks of this bureau and that bureau, and some of the heads of those bureaus have had the good sense and honesty to say that they have no use for the law clerks, and in most of the bureaus the law clerks have been put upon other work than legal business.

Now, in relation to these chiefs of the accounting divisions, twenty-five years ago the most important bureaus of the Treasury and other Departments transacted their business without the intervention of chiefs of divisions. It is a serious question in my mind whether that grade should ever have been established, and whether it should now be maintained. It certainly has resulted in an increased cost of several thousand dollars in addition to what the expense would have been if transacted by the regular clerks of the Treasury and other Departments, simply detailed to be at the head of their several branches of work. I do not know the chief of this accounting division either by name or reputation, and it is appropriate probably that he should have this increase of salary if such salary is to go to all others; but I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the propriety of cutting down the salaries and destroying the grade of all those known as chiefs of division in all the Departments.

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDICIAL.

To pay the salaries and expenses of the judges, district attorneys, marshals, clerks, commissioners, and constables of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, being a deficiency to the appropriation for the service of the fiscal years 1895 and 1896, $210,000.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Territory," in line 25, on page 12, insert: "To include the salary due James V. Walker, resigned, as district attorney of the central district of the Indian Territory, from April 1, 1895, to July 8, 1895, inclusive, at the rate of $4,000 per annum, and the salary due Lucius L. Stowe, now deceased, as marshal of the southern district of the Indian Territory, from April 3, 1895, to July 27, 1895, inclusive, at the rate of $4,000 per annum."

Mr. CANNON. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. DINSMORE. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that I do not think, when the chairman of the committee hears my statement, he will find that this amendment is subject to the point of order, because——

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, we can not hear the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. DINSMORE. I will speak so that the gentleman shall hear. I will state, Mr. Chairman, that this asks no increase whatever in the appropriation as offered by the committee in this bill. As a matter of fact, the bill was intended to cover the items referred to in my amendment, and the bill was based upon estimates submitted by the Department of Justice, which included these items; and the amendment was offered for this purpose solely. The district attorney was appointed after the adjournment of last Congress for the central district of the Indian Territory, and he served from April 1 until the 8th day of July, when he resigned.

The marshal was appointed for the southern district of the Territory. He served from the 3d day of April until July 28, I believe, when he died. The Department have sent up items, as I have already stated, including the salaries of both of these officers, to meet the objection, the captious objection many think, of Mr. Bowler, Comptroller of the Treasury, as to paying out money for salaries. He has held, and I suppose if he is consistent would hold again, that unless an officer has been confirmed by the Senate he is not entitled to his pay. That he did in one or two instances, as suggested to me already by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, wherein there was no money available, but he has also done it in the case of the ambassador to Mexico, Mr. Ransom, where the money was available. This does not change the bill except to name the parties, so that the Comptroller will find them provided for in this appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DINSMORE. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. Has the gentleman any communication from the Department of Justice on the subject?

Mr. DINSMORE. I have. I have a letter from the Acting Attorney-General upon the subject, which I will ask to have read. I will ask the Clerk to read the letter first and then the statement.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1896.

SIR: In complicance with your personal request, I inclose herewith a memorandum showing the date of appointment, qualification, and termination of term in the cases of L. L. Stowe, United States marshal for the southern district of Indian Territory, and James V. Walker, United States attorney for the central district of Indian Territory, with the amount of salary earned by them, respectively, during the said terms.

Very respectfully,

HOLMES CONRAD,
Acting Attorney-General.

Hon. J. H. BERRY, United States Senate.

Lucius L. Stowe, of Indian Territory, appointed marshal of the United States court for the southern district of the Indian Territory, as provided for by act of Congress approved March 1, 1895, by the President during recess of the Senate, March 20, 1895. Oath of office, April 3, 1895. Salary from April 3, 1895, to July 27, 1895 (time of his death), $1.271.47.

James V. Walker, of Arkansas, appointed attorney of the United States court for the central district of the Indian Territory, as provided for by act of Congress approved March 1, 1895, by the President during recess of the Senate, March 20, 1895. Oath of office, April 1, 1895.

Resignation accepted to take effect upon the appointment and qualification of his successor.

(William J. Horton, of Indian Territory, appointed attorney of the United States for the central district of the Indian Territory, vice J. V. Walker, resigned on July 2, 1895. Oath, July 8, 1895.)

Salary of Walker from April 1, 1895, to July 8, 1895, $1,086.96.

Mr. DINSMORE. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be observed, as I stated, that these two officers were appointed to their respective offices in the beginning of the month of April—Mr. Walker on April 1 and Mr. Stowe on April 3; that they served a portion of the time; that Walker resigned on the 8th day of July and Stowe died a little later in the month. As I have stated before, the estimates were given to the Committee on Appropriations by the Department of Justice covering these two items; and the appropriation bill is based upon them. I wish to impress upon the House that that is the single object of the amendment; that it does not change the result, except as it may include the conduct or judgment of the Comptroller of the Treasury as to the money, by specifically providing in this bill that these two officers are entitled to the payment of their salaries, and therefore I hope that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will not object to the amendment being adopted.

Mr. CANNON. I read from the bill, on pages 12 and 13, and I will ask the attention of the Chair:

To pay the salaries and expenses of the judges, district attorneys, marshals, clerks, commissioners, and constables of the United States courts in the Indian Territory, being a deficiency to the appropriation for the service of the fiscal years 1895 and 1896, $210,000.

Now, if this man was an officer, or attorney, or other official mentioned in this appropriation, he will get his money, because he is covered generally along with the other officials by the terms of the appropriation. If he was not an official, then he ought not to have the money.

Mr. DINSMORE. But, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman from Arkansas allow me?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. DINSMORE. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. I have no doubt that the men who are mentioned were officials, and that they received their appointments according to law.

Mr. DINSMORE. That has been stated by the Department of Justice.

Mr. SAYERS. But what I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to first is the fact that this amendment does not increase the sum total of the appropriation——

Mr. DINSMORE. Not one cent.

Mr. SAYERS. Second, to the further fact that the law itself is analogous to the appropriation for ambassador to the Republic of Mexico. I will read:

Schedule A: Salaries of ambassadors and ministers, envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Russia and Mexico at $17,500 each, $35,000.

Now, the point I desire to make in this connection is this: That if under this appropriation the Comptroller of the Treasury refused to pay the salary of the gentleman appointed as minister to Mexico during the vacation, there is no reason why he should not refuse to pay the salary of these parties, who were appointed during vacation and were never confirmed by the Senate, one of them having died and the other having resigned.

Mr. DINSMORE. That is the point.

Mr. SAYERS. And I understand the object of the gentleman is simply to meet the objection raised by the Comptroller of the Treasury in the case of the payment of the salary of the ambassador to Mexico.

Mr. DINSMORE. Certainly; that is it exactly.

Mr. CANNON. The general language covers every official who is performing service in that territory under the law. I do not know what the Comptroller has held about the salary of the Mexican minister, and I do not care. I do not know what the Comptroller may hold touching this matter. If he should hold as the gentleman claims that he possibly may, that will be a legitimate subject for argument to be addressed to the great and good President who sits at the other end of the Avenue and makes Comptrollers; but if we are to undertake to anticipate what the action of the Comptroller may be in the future touching all our legislation and appropriations, we shall never get through. There is no more reason why these two gentlemen should be singled out and put into this act than there is why any of the fifty or sixty others to whom the act relates should be put into it by name. As I said before, this proposition is to do away with auditing in these cases, and I do not think we care to do that. If it were necessary I would be inclined to give way, but I do not think there is any necessity for it.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that this provision can be so amended as to protect the Treasury and at the same time require the Comptroller to pass these accounts, provided they are right.

Mr. CANNON. In other words, you propose to abolish your Comptroller to this extent?

Mr. SAYERS. We have done it already. One of the first things we did in this Congress was to pass a resolution to meet his objections touching another matter of appropriation.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman from Arkansas asked the Comptroller what construction he will put upon this law?

Mr. DINSMORE. I have not, but we have precedents. We know what the Comptroller held before in a similar case, and we must assume that he will be consistent and will so hold again, because this case comes under the principle of his former ruling. These officers were appointed in vacation and never were confirmed by the Senate. One of them died before he could be confirmed, and the other resigned before the Senate met, so that there never was any opportunity to confirm them. I can not understand why the distinguished gentleman from Illinois should make objection to this proposition, because it will not be contended by anybody that these officials were not appointed, that they did not serve, or that they are not entitled to their pay. But the Comptroller construes the law to mean that there must be a confirmation in every case before an officer can be entitled to receive compensation.

The gentleman from Illinois says that we are proposing to abolish the office of Auditor. Not at all. This matter would still go before the Auditor to determine the amount due. We have not undertaken to determine the amount that is due. We have simply set forth the terms during which these men served, as shown in a statement furnished to me or to one of the Senators from my State. That statement shows the time during which they served and for which they should be entitled to their pay. This amendment does not add one single cent to the appropriation necessary for this purpose; it only makes the appropriation specific in order to prevent any confusion about the payment. Mr. Stowe, the marshal, died, and in case the Comptroller should insist on his objection, the same objection which he has made heretofore in a parallel case, if the personal representatives of Mr. Stowe should come to apply for his compensation, they would be involved in interminable trouble and expense, perhaps necessitating an application for a mandamus to make an officer of the Government perform his duty. I am sure that the distinguished gentleman in charge of this bill does not desire that, and I think that when the case is fully understood every gentleman here ought to be willing to make this appropriation specific, so that it may certainly reach the persons for whom it is intended.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will follow out that rule we shall require to have an analytical statement in each case, setting forth each man for whom each dollar and each cent is appropriated; every deputy marshal, every judge, every employee in the United States will have to be specified, and all in order to head off a Comptroller who can not at all times distinguish the difference between a fly speck and a period. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. But would the gentleman from Illinois, in a case like this, expect these men, who are fairly entitled to their pay, to go without it simply because the Comptroller of the Treasury makes a technical ruling?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know what the Comptroller's ruling may be in this case. He has never yet had a chance to rule upon it.

Mr. SAYERS. No; because no money has ever been appropriated to pay them.

Mr. DINSMORE. But the Comptroller has made a ruling in similar cases.

Mr. CANNON. It is quite enough, Mr. Chairman, to have to correct this man's rulings after he has made them, but if we undertake to anticipate the mistakes he will make in the future we shall never get through. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINSMORE. We are not assuming—at least I am not—to correct his errors.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, are we not bound to presume that the Comptroller will rule correctly?

Mr. DINSMORE. Very well; that being so, so much greater is the importance of having this amendment adopted; because here is an officer who, as nobody will deny, has served the Government. He was appointed in pursuance of law, and entered upon the discharge of his duties in pursuance of law. It is admitted by everybody—and information to that effect has come to the House from the Department of Justice—that he did perform service, and for such service is entitled to a certain amount of salary.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The money to pay these officers has already been appropriated, has it not?

Mr. DINSMORE. I will state to my friend from Pennsylvania what perhaps he did not hear stated before, that the appropriation for the payment of these men is included in this bill, which has been made up upon the estimates furnished by the Department of Justice.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I understand that; and now what you want is a specific direction in this bill to the Comptroller to do what you apprehend he will not do or has not done.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, I suppose it amounts to that, practically. I should like to have it specified in the bill——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. In other words, you want this House to strike at the Comptroller in reference to the performance of his duties in a particular matter.

Mr. DINSMORE. No; my position is not susceptible, I humbly submit, of that construction. But I want this House to specify that the appropriation here made shall be in part applied, in accordance with the judgment of every man on the committee and of every man in this House who is familiar with the purpose for which the appropriation is designed, to the payment of these two items which are intended to be included, and which we have reason to believe (the Comptroller having taken the same position with reference to similar matters) he will not otherwise permit to be paid, he holding the provision not available for such purpose because these officers have never been confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I submit that the House, in adopting the course which the gentleman urges, would take upon itself duties which do not belong to it. If we have a Comptroller whose rulings are unsatisfactory or unjust, it is the duty of the Administration to remove him. We can not undertake to lay down a line of conduct for him. We are to presume that he will follow the precedents and the law. While I think he has not done so in all cases, especially in the case of the sugar bounty, yet we can not presume to instruct him by a special direction in a bill of this kind.

Mr. DINSMORE. Is it out of deference to the views of the Comptroller that the gentleman says "we can not presume to instruct him"?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I know that Comptrollers are generally obstructionists; they are generally striving to find some excuse for withholding payments of money, especially when the Treasury is very much depleted. The present Comptroller has been a useful officer for this Administration, though an unfortunate one for some of the persons who have had dealings with him. I prefer that he shall continue to administer his office without any positive directions from this House. I think that will be better all around. If we have to put into our appropriation bills peremptory directions for the guidance of the Comptroller, there will be a larger deficit in the Treasury than there is now.

Mr. DINSMORE. Well, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me a suggestion?

Mr. DINSMORE. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. As a matter of current history we know that this appropriation is designed to cover in part the pay of two gentlemen, lately members of this House, now on the bench—Mr. Springer and Mr. Kilgore—who, as a matter of current history, we know served for months before they were confirmed. I do not know whether they have yet been confirmed.

Mr. SAYERS. They have.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman from Texas says they have been. Now, if we pick out two of these people whose cases are "on all fours" with cases of other gentlemen and appropriate for these two men by name, thereby tacitly admitting that without our special legislation nothing is due to them until they have been confirmed, do we not "turn down" every other official who occupies the same situation; and is not this a bad method of legislation? If anything is due these gentlemen, will they not get it? And if we pass this amendment, is it not legislation?

Mr. TERRY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a question. He speaks of "singling out men by name and providing for them in this bill." I wish to ask him whether in this bill the Committee on Appropriations has not, in at least three different places, "singled out men" and directed that specific sums be paid them?

Mr. CANNON. Not in connection with Mr. Bowler.

Mr. TERRY. Now, let me ask the gentleman another question. As a matter of right and justice, does he feel that it is proper to wrong one living man and the legal representatives of another who is dead in order to make a point against Bowler?

Mr. CANNON. I am not seeking to make any point against Bowler. In my judgment this appropriation will pay everybody who was an officer of the United States during the fiscal year 1895 or the fiscal year 1896; and when you commence to pick out men by name as the beneficiaries of this appropriation you may, while thus mentioning a few, be discriminating against others.

I think we had better do business in the ordinary way, Mr. Chairman; and having said that much, having stated my view of this matter, I leave the question with the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, may I ask to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment, if there be no objection, will be reported.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is there a point of order pending, or is the question now on the merits?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was made and reserved against the amendment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Illinois for a moment, for the purpose of asking him a question for information. I understand that there has been a ruling of the Department that these Presidential offices (not others) must be confirmed by the Senate before there is acquired a title to receive the pay designated by law, or, in other words, before they become officers.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. That is it; and the first ruling of the kind ever made.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the ruling of the Comptroller of the Treasury Department. Now, I understand that these people, who held the offices in question and performed the duties, or one at least of them, died when they were serving, and hence there is no possible way for the Senate ever to confirm the appointment. Is that not so?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know.

Mr. SWANSON. So the gentleman from Arkansas states, as I understand it.

Mr. DINSMORE. That is correct.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, there are but few Presidential offices; and if this ruling is to hold and these officials can not get their money by the process of law, that is, out of the money appropriated, as it has been appropriated, how is it to be expected that they will ever get their compensation unless some such provision as this is inserted?

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, well, the successor of the present Comptroller of the Treasury will rectify that error. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. I do not think the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be as powerful in the Treasury Department as he is in this House. He can not speak there.

Mr. SWANSON. I am confident that the House is desirous of doing what is right in this matter——

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Do you propose to delay people with just claims against the Government until some political battle is fought out and won or lost? It seems to be very poor politics, as well as very poor justice, to do such a thing as that. If the work was done, and a comptroller, as he construes the law, claims that these parties must have been confirmed by the Senate before they become officers of the Government and entitled to their pay, although they performed the work, surely it is our duty to see that justice is done to them. Now, until that ruling is reversed, or a change is made by Congress, there is no way by which they can possibly get their compensation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If there is no law now by which these gentlemen can have their pay, would it not be new legislation injected upon this bill to adopt the amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. But it is not new legislation. This is simply an interpretation by Congress as to what the law is.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You reverse the Comptroller——

Mr. DINSMORE. Let me say to the gentlemen that this is not new legislation, but simply making an appropriation bill clear and explicit in its terms.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentlemen will permit me, if it is now the law that these gentlemen should be paid, why are you asking to insert it here?

Mr. DINSMORE. The law gave authority in the first instance for their appointment. They were appointed and served in pursuance of the law. That service has passed, has been rendered, and it is proposed in this bill to pay them the salaries they earned.

This is an urgent deficiency bill, carrying deficiencies for the service for the year 1895, when that service was rendered. But, as has been repeatedly stated, in order that the payment may not be deferred, and thereby compelling these parties to go to the expense and trouble of bringing their claim before the courts, I only ask that this appropriation bill shall make it specific. I ask the House only to make the appropriation definite in terms.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me ask the gentleman this question: If it is now the law——

Mr. DINSMORE. We propose to make it the law.

Mr. HEMENWAY (continuing). If it is the law now, why does the Comptroller refuse to pay?

A MEMBER. Why assume that he will refuse?

Mr. DINSMORE. I do not suppose it; I do not assume it——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me conclude what I was about to ask. The Comptroller has decided that under the law he can not pay them their salaries. Now you ask us to change the law so that they can be paid notwithstanding that decision.

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to the decision of the Comptroller.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me ask how much money has been held up by the present Comptroller under this Administration?

Mr. DINSMORE. Now, if my friend from Pennsylvania will pardon me, that is an entirely irrelevant question. My purpose in coming before the House on this matter was to obtain a simple act of justice to two persons who are entitled to an appropriation, and I thought when I proposed it that I certainly should meet with no objection from anybody.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let me ask this one question: How much would the present deficit in the Treasury be increased if this Comptroller had followed the precedents of previous Comptrollers?

Mr. DINSMORE. I must decline to answer such questions.

Mr. SWANSON. Let me answer the question.

Mr. DINSMORE. No; I decline to yield. The matter is perfectly plain.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I will say that so far as I am concerned I will not press the point of order.

Mr. DINSMORE. Then I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order having been withdrawn, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DINSMORE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

UNITED STATES COURTS.

For payment of the fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, $960,000: Provided, That not exceeding $500,000 of this appropriation may be advanced to marshals, to be accounted for in the usual way, the residue to remain in the Treasury, to be used, if at all, only in the payment of the accounts of marshals in the manner provided in section 856, Revised Statutes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 13, at the end of line 12, insert:

"Provided, further, That hereafter all fees for United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and special counsel necessarily employed in prosecuting civil suits instituted by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department through the solicitor of the Treasury against the sureties on the official bonds of late postmasters, as provided for by section 292, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be paid from the appropriations for expenses of the United States Courts."

Mr. SAYERS. The object of the amendment is to cure an existing evil. Suppose that an officer of the United States court—a marshal, for instance—presents his account to the Department of Justice for the purpose of having it audited. The account may contain items for different kinds of services. Under the present law, if there should be an item for service in a suit upon a postmaster's bond, then after the account has been passed upon by the Department of Justice it must go to the Post-Office Department and be examined and passed upon by that Department also. The intention of this amendment is, not to increase the appropriation, but simply to facilitate the examination and allowance or rejection of accounts, so that when a United States marshal's or a district attorney's account, or a clerk's account, shall go to the Department of Justice, no matter for what Department the particular services may have been rendered, the Department of Justice may, under the law, examine the account and pass upon it.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is right; it ought to be done.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that a letter from the Attorney-General upon the subject, which I send to the Clerk's desk, may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., January 14, 1896.

SIR: Referring to your suggestions in a recent personal interview, relative to a proposed amendment to the present provision governing the payment of fees in post-office cases (page 8, Attorney-General's Report, 1895) I beg to say that you will find on page 265 of the Digest of Appropriations for 1896 the provision that requires accounts in civil post-office cases to be paid from the appropriation under the Post-Office Department styled "For mail depredations and post-office inspectors." If the amendment suggested is added to the urgent deficiency bill and hereafter the proviso is omitted from the Post-Office bill, accounts of this character will be forwarded by this Department hereafter to the Auditor for the State and other Departments.

The amendment might be in the language following:

"Provided, That hereafter all fees for United States attorneys, marshals, clerks of courts, and special counsel necessarily employed in prosecuting civil suits instituted by the Auditor for the Post-Office Department through the Solicitor of the Treasury, against the sureties on the official bonds of late postmasters, as provided for by section 292, Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be paid from the appropriations for expenses of the United States courts."

Respectfully,

JUDSON HARMON,
Attorney-General.

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY,
House of Representatives.

The amendment of Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That none of the sum appropriated by this act shall be paid to United States marshals or deputies for mileage or expenses in excess of the amount they are entitled to by law for carrying or taking prisoners arrested before the nearest United States commissioner or other proper officer.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve the point of order on that.

Mr. STEELE. That is not the amendment which I showed to the gentleman a while ago.

Mr. CANNON. I think it is substantially the law now.

Mr. STEELE. I think it is substantially the law. The only point is that marshals will arrest a prisoner, say, in the southern part of Texas, and although there may be a United States commissioner within 10 miles of the point where the prisoner is arrested, instead of taking him before that commissioner, the marshal will take him 600 miles away, to another commissioner, and he will not only take him, but he will employ three or four men to go with the man, although the man when cited might go of his own accord. The marshal will employ these men to help him take the prisoner before the commissioner 600 miles away, and as soon as they arrive there the commissioner will let the man go on his own recognizance. Then these excessive fees are charged up, notwithstanding the law.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read the law as it stands now.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of the marshal, his deputy, or other officer, who may arrest a person charged with any crime or offense, to take the defendant before the nearest circuit court commissioner or the nearest judicial officer having jurisdiction under existing laws for a hearing, commitment, or taking bail for trial, and the officer or magistrate issuing the warrant shall attach thereto a certified copy of the complaint, and upon the arrest of the accused, the return of the warrant, with a copy of the complaint attached, shall confer jurisdiction upon such officer as fully as if the complaint had originally been made before him, and no mileage shall be allowed any officer violating the provisions hereof.

Mr. CANNON. I trust that after hearing the law read the gentleman will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Notwithstanding the fact that the law treats the matter in that way, yet as we are appropriating this money, we may say that it shall not be paid out in cases where the law has been violated.

Mr. CANNON. By implication, would not the gentleman's amendment nullify or repeal the statute which I have just had read?

Mr. STEELE. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON. I am not so clear about that.

Mr. STEELE. It only makes it obligatory upon the accounting officer to say that the money shall not be paid out where the law has been violated.

Mr. CANNON. The safest way, I think, is to insist upon my point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I move to strike out the last word. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in reply——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois to raise the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I want to say in reply to the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has sustained the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then I move to strike out the last word. The abuses which the gentleman complains of are not confined to that particular part of the practice of the Federal courts, but they extend to the whole machinery of the courts. The law is violated every day, and the cost of running those courts is accumulating every day. This committee had that matter in full consideration, but could not change the law without violating our own rules; but it does sincerely hope that the Committee on the Judiciary will do its duty and make some changes in the law, and change this system of paying Federal officers by fees to salaries; and there is no other way of relief from this abuse.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the point of order was that the gentleman made that the Chair has sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. That it changes existing law.

Mr. STEELE. What law does it change? I would like to ascertain.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman comes rather late with his inquiry.

Mr. STEELE. If the Chair does not care to give the reason, I will not insist.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will please give his attention. The gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized on an amendment to strike out the last word, and that amendment is still pending.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Indiana, as I understood, got up to address himself to the amendment. The Chair asked the gentleman from Illinois if he made the point of order, which he stated he did, and then the Chair sustained the point of order while the gentleman from Pennsylvania was endeavoring to address the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana did not give his full attention to the Chair. The Chair inquired of the gentleman from Illinois if he insisted upon the point of order. The gentleman said that he did, and the Chair sustained the point of order. Then the gentleman from Pennsylvania arose to discuss the point of order, and the Chair suggested to him that the Chair had already ruled on the point of order, and sustained it; and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania was recognized on a motion to strike out the last word.

Mr. STEELE. I only asked, as a matter of information, what the point of order was that the Chair had sustained. No point of order was stated.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois to reserve the point of order from the commencement.

Mr. STEELE. That, too, might be; but he did not state what the point of order was that was sustained. But that is all right to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has already risen to address the Chair, and the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania has already stated and give the committee the benefit of some facts and figures that will perhaps be useful in the further examination of this question. I realize, and the committee of course realizes, the fact that we can not remedy the evils in our Federal courts by any amendment to the present bill. I will call attention, however, to the fact that the original appropriation bill for the year 1896 only carries $3,455,600, while this deficiency carries $3,240,582.19. In other words, we come within $212,000 of as much deficiency as in the original bill for the Federal courts.

The reason for this is largely due to the methods which have been perpetuated for a generation, and because the courts themselves are beyond the reach practically of legislation. Men holding a life office do not feel that sense of responsibility to the people that members of this House do, or even members of the Senate. Many of the evils that are complained of here could be cured by the judges themselves, and are cured, or partly so, in some States by the judges, by the prompt removal of offending officers. A judge has power to remove a deputy marshal who institutes or a commissioner who sends up a frivolous charge, and the courts do remove them in some instances. But such men are often retained, because they are very useful to two officers of the court, the marshal and attorney. The district attorney's fees, under existing law, depend entirely upon the amount of business that is done. I remember more than twenty years ago, perhaps twenty-five years ago, I remonstrated with the assistant district attorney in a case in which I was engaged for bringing a clearly frivolous charge. He said to me, "My friend, you do not understand the situation. The chief under whom I serve is entitled to $6,000 a year providing there is business enough to make $6,000 a year. I have to make the business, and I am bringing suits in order to create business enough so that he may earn his salary."

So with the marshal. The deputy must do business enough to bring the salary of his chief up to $6,000 a year. It is this inherent defect in the system that causes the trouble. Let me give you a few figures taken from the unfinished manuscript report in the Attorney-General's Office. The report of court expenses was called for by resolution of this House, but of necessity some delay has arisen in preparing it, and in the meantime I will give a few figures which will be embraced in that report. Take, first, the State of Arkansas, the western district of that State. It will be interesting to the House to learn that in that district the same man performs the duties of clerk of the district court, clerk of the circuit court, and United States commissioner, for which he receives the following emoluments: As clerk of the circuit court he earned last year $3,241.65; as clerk of the district court he earned $3,791.65; as United States commissioner he earned $6,032.70, making a total of $12,372.80 earned by this one man, or $7,372.10 more than the judge of that court received for the performance of his duties. Such inequalities make manifest the necessity of a revision of the laws under which such things are possible. This is not an exceptional case by any means. Take the court commissioners of the Territory of Oklahoma. Their fees last year amounted to $32,738.

Mr. SAYERS. How many United States commissioners are there?

Mr. LACEY. There is a large number. This instance is perhaps exceptional, because these officials perform all the duties performed by State courts. The total expenditure there for deputy marshals for last year in that Territory was $212,665.73.

Turning now to the commissioners in the State of Iowa, and including both districts, north and south, I find that they earned $7,781.13; while in the State of Ohio the commissioners earned only $3,890.43, and in the State of Pennsylvania only $3,144.70. It will be seen, therefore, that the commissioners in my own State earned more than all the commissioners in the great States of Ohio and Pennsylvania put together. Now, Mr. Chairman, when you find such discrepancies there must be some evil or fault underlying the system, which ought to be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary, having such matters in charge. That committee is an able one, and no doubt will give the matter the fullest consideration and report some adequate remedy.

I have introduced a bill making these officials salaried officers, so as to dig up this whole fee system by the roots. The "pernicious activity" of the deputy marshals and commissioners has done much to increase the expenditures in connection with the United States courts. Self-interest is involved.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LACEY. I should like some additional time.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be allowed time sufficient to conclude his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. LACEY. I thank the committee for their courtesy, and I shall not abuse it nor occupy any time beyond what is absolutely necessary to present a few additional figures. I know that this House is deeply interested in this general question. It is one that has come to the front in every Congress for many years, but, like all other evils, there are men whose interests are affected by any attack upon the present system, and who have friends here. It is an unpleasant duty, as we all know, to turn down one's friends in one's own district, and therefore it is difficult to work many necessary reforms. Abuses like these become strongly intrenched by long use. So it has happened that although propositions for the reform of these abuses have been presented to the House year after year, nothing has come of them, not even of those which have been favorably reported to the House. The Stone bill in the last Congress was reported by the committee with a favorable report, but no action was ever had upon it. Now that the present officials are soon to go out it would be a good time to make the change. When the new Administration comes into power new court officials should find fixed salaries, and be relieved from the temptation that has been so potent with their predecessors.

Mr. Chairman, I have prepared a list of the deputies and of the fees which they received in each State and Territory of the Union for the last year. I will call attention to a few items taken from that statement, and will ask the privilege of printing the whole in connection with my remarks, so that members may have an opportunity to see these figures in anticipation of the report from the Attorney-General's Office. In the middle district of Alabama I find that the deputy marshal's fees last year amounted to $37,780.30.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Can the evils of which the gentleman is complaining be corrected in the present bill?

Mr. LACEY. No, sir.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Can they be corrected in any bill?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir; very easily.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Have not bills for the reform of these abuses been presented in this House for ten years past right along? What committee ought to bring in a bill to make these reforms?

Mr. LACEY. The Committee on the Judiciary. These same evils have been often hinted at before, but I find it is a very good plan for the House to talk earnestly about such things. Discussion leads to correction.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. But they have been "talked about" for ten years. Who are the committee having the bill in charge, and why do they not bring it in?

Mr. LACEY. The Committee on the Judiciary has charge of this subject.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Are they living or dead? [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I hope and have no doubt that they will be found, before the present session of Congress adjourns, a very active committee. The last Committee on the Judiciary did report a bill, but, unfortunately, it slept the sleep of death in the latter part of the session. By bringing this matter prominently before the House at an early period in the present Congress it will be all the more likely that the legislation necessary to bring a remedy will be enacted.

The Attorney-General in his report has called the attention of Congress to these abuses and has urged that they be cured by legislation. We are all substantially agreed that legislation is needed. The only question to be determined is the question of detail, and that must be worked out through the proper committee. The members of this body must take the matter into consideration and use their influence upon those having the bill in charge in order to secure an early report.

Now, in a single district of Texas—the eastern district—the fees of these deputy marshals were $67,199.46. Delaware—economical and virtuous little Delaware—spent for deputy marshals' fees last year only $20. On the other hand, in the western district of Virginia—on the other shore of the bay—the amount spent was $30,403.45. West Virginia spent $35,096.89. New Jersey spent only $1,784.91, while on the other hand, the western district of North Carolina spent $29,679.20. The eastern district of Michigan spent $4,739.76, and the western district of the same State $2,533.97, while Minnesota's deputy marshals drew $14,056.28—about double the amount expended in both districts in Michigan.

Mr. BAILEY. In justice to the marshal of the eastern district of Texas, I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that to that district is attached a large part of the Indian Territory.

Mr. LACEY. So I understand; and that fact excuses that part of Texas from some of the charges that might seem to be implied by these figures. In the northern district of Texas the expenditures amounted to $7,611.58, and in the western district, $12,700.07. The State of Vermont seems to have spent nothing in this direction, not a single dollar, while South Dakota spent $19,759.74.

Mr. STEELE. Has the gentleman any information on the subject of excessive charges for fees?

Mr. LACEY. These matters are undoubtedly honeycombed with fraud in many localities. For instance, a single man will be arrested in a certain neighborhood and brought before a commissioner; the next day the officer will go back to the same locality, arrest another man, and bring him before the commissioner; and on the third day perhaps go back and arrest a third. Then there are fee-earning adjournments after adjournments in the trial of cases before the commissioners. In fact, in some places these commissioners' courts might be called factories for the manufacture of claims for fees against the United States, and that is why we have here a deficiency appropriation in one year coming within $212,000 of the amount of the original appropriation. The original appropriation was made small so as to keep these people in check, but they know that claims against the Government are good, and they have gone on with their business in the sure expectation of being cared for in a deficiency bill.

Mr. STEELE. But the point I wished to make was this: Has the gentleman any information as to prisoners being taken, not to the nearest commissioner, but carted off five or six hundred miles to another commissioner, in order that the charges for mileage may be swelled?

Mr. LACEY. That is a universal complaint from almost every part of the country where these large charges for fees of deputy marshals and commissioners appear on the record.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman know about what percentage of prisoners arrested are discharged without trial after fees have been collected for taking them these long distances?

Mr. LACEY. There is no way of getting at the percentage without very careful investigation; but the number of such cases is very large. In addition to that, there are a very large number of men who are tried, convicted, and their sentences suspended. In other words, the dockets are merely ornamented with these cases without any punishment being finally inflicted upon defendants, the only utility of these trials being to furnish fees to the men who institute the proceedings and bring the cases before the courts.

Without detaining the committee further, I will print, in connection with my remarks, a full statement of the figures to which I have partially referred.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. SWANSON. If the gentleman from Iowa will allow me, I have the information at hand.

Mr. LACEY. I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. SWANSON. I will state to the gentleman from Indiana who makes the inquiry, that there were 25,949 cases of indictment found in the United States courts during the last year. Of these, 10,521 were nolle prosequied—discontinued, on the ground that there was no evidence to sustain them. Forty per cent of the jury charges, witness charges, and deputy marshals' charges were on suits discontinued by district attorneys as being petty, frivolous, and incapable of being sustained.

A MEMBER. That is about the amount of the deficiency asked here, is it not?

Mr. SWANSON. Just about. Last year they spent $5,300,000 for the United States courts, and this is 40 per cent of the total expenditures. This 40 per cent represents only those cases where indictments were found by juries, but does not include those cases where the grand jury refused to find the indictments or where commissioners refused to send them on to the grand jury. If you include these, over one-half the expenses of the United States courts were incurred by petty and frivolous suits which did not amount to anything and only harassed or annoyed the people. Of the $5,300,000, if we could save one-half, there would be near two and three-quarter millions of dollars each year to be saved of this expenditure. This saving to the Treasury would be largely in the shape of fees paid to these officers.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CANNON. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we may proceed with the bill. Whereabout are we now?

The CHAIRMAN. On line 12, page 13.

Mr. CANNON. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. To strike out the last word.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman succeeds in his amendment, or after he has addressed the committee, I will then ask the Clerk to proceed with the reading. I have no right or disposition to do so now. But after the gentleman concludes his remarks I will ask to proceed with the bill.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to make a few remarks at this time relating to the pending subject, and also with reference to certain suggestions which have been made concerning the duties of the Judiciary Committee.

There seems to have been considerable criticism indulged in during this debate upon the Judiciary Committee for not reporting a bill to correct the evils claimed to exist in the judicial system of the United States. On that point I desire to be heard briefly.

I for one do not believe that the officers connected with the judiciary of the United States are one-half as corrupt as has been pictured here to-day. I do not believe that the courts of the United States are "fee factories." We are all familiar with the evils that have grown out of the fee system. No one disputes the fact that evils have resulted from that system. But in the last Congress the Judiciary Committee of this House reported a bill doing away with the fee system and substituting the salary system; but we could not get a hearing before this body. In this Congress we hope to report a bill proposing to do away with the fee system, as far as possible, and substituting the salary system instead, and I trust the gentlemen holding places on the Committee on Appropriations—who are so zealous and active to-day in denouncing other committees of the House——

Mr. SAYERS. We did not denounce anybody.

Mr. RAY (continuing). And in denouncing and criticising the judiciary system of the United States will, when the bill is reported, show the same zeal and the same activity in support of that bill. I trust the bill will not be smothered, but that the Committee on Rules will give us time for its consideration and the House an opportunity to act on the subject by amending the law.

I for one believe that these evils ought to be corrected, and that they may be corrected by Congressional legislation. I believe that when that bill comes before this House the proper time to criticise the present system of fees and the present administration of the courts of this country will have come. That will be the time for gentlemen to exercise their oratory in denunciation of the officers connected with the judicial system of the United States and of the present system, out of which, as they claim, all of these evils have grown.

Until that time it will be useless to discuss the subject. It avails nothing to indulge in a general tirade against laws and the abuse of laws at a time when reform is not proposed or action in that direction is not possible. The way to be good is in conduct, not criticism; practice, not preaching alone. The Judiciary Committee, however, hail with delight these expressions of a desire to do away with a pernicious system and establish one in the conduct of which frauds, unjust arrests, and false or stuffed accounts will be without reward in the law and therefore unprofitable, and, we trust, unknown. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, in view of all that has been said, I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw the point of order he did not make, and let a vote be taken upon the amendment. It will not do any harm.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I am not so sure. I rather think that by implication it repeals a better provision.

Mr. STEELE. Well, the word "implication" is a great thing in legislation in the House, as used by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON. It is a great thing sometimes in the construction by the courts, too.

Mr. STEELE. Very well; let the evils continue.

Mr. CANNON. I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

To pay to Charles H. Evans, for services to the Ways and Means Committee in preparing estimates of revenue from proposed tariff legislation, $100.

To pay to Joel Grayson, for services in the document room from January 1 to June 30, 1896, inclusive, at $125 per month, $750.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 2, page 17, amend by inserting the following:

"To pay to the mother of Lucien Davidson, deceased, late a page in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, a sum equal to his salary as such page for six months; also, the expenses attending his last illness and funeral, not to exceed $100, and in all $460.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve the point of order until I hear what the gentleman has to say about this.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This amendment introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] refers to a boy who was a page in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms during the last two years. He was taken sick about the 10th of December with typhoid fever, and while sick and practically dying he was dropped by the Sergeant-at-Arms and another boy put in his place. He died a few days afterwards. He was the only son of a widowed mother and her entire support. He was dropped from the roll a few days before he died. He was not able to get home, and after his death his mother was unable to take his remains home, and he was buried in the Congressional Cemetery in this city. He left his mother without a dollar in the world. Perhaps no other case similar to this has ever been before the House. Others who have been dropped from the rolls have asked for compensation, but they were well and could go home. This boy was on his deathbed when dropped, and could not get away from here. His mother could not pay his funeral expenses and di not pay them. She has nothing now to live on, and has not money enough to buy a railroad ticket with which to get home. The gentleman from Texas has offered the amendment, and I hope no gentleman on the floor will oppose it.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the amount?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Only $460 all told, and I hope the gentleman who has charge of the bill, the chairman of the committee, will not make any point of order on a matter like this.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, the Sergeant-at-Arms informs me that the boy was taken sick while on duty in his office. Under the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] I am not inclined to insist upon the point of order. Of course we have to be a little particular—it stands the House in hand to be particular—not to extend the payment of compensation or funeral expenses to others than its employees. Even that class of expenditure does not dwell in the law except as it dwells in precedent, but it does obtain where an employee dies while in the service of the House. It is customary to pay his funeral expenses and a sum equal to six months' salary. Under the conditions stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], however, it is not in my heart or judgment to insist upon the point of order, and I have said what I did about it in order that it might not constitute a precedent for any other than a similar case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I thank the gentleman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend by inserting, after the amendment which has just been adopted, the words:

"To pay R. C. Peacock for services performed as a page, $20.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

To pay R. C. Peacock for services performed as a page, $20.

Mr. CANNON. I will reserve the point of order until the gentleman makes his statement.

Mr. HEPBURN. This boy was a page, and while performing the services of a page was notified that his services were no longer needed. He then discovered that his successor had been appointed some eight or ten days previously, and had taken the oath. So when he came to draw his pay he failed to receive the pay to which he was entitled for services actually rendered by the sum of $20. It is entirely equitable, just, and decent that this House should pay him.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand, he performed services for which this item is offered as an amendment, and it is the pay between the time he was discharged in fact and the time when he was notified of his discharge?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And in the meantime he performed the service.

Mr. HEPBURN. Right along.

Mr. CANNON. And the gentleman is satisfied that that is the correct statement?

Mr. HEPBURN. I am satisfied.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be concurred in and that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was asked, and that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were agreed to in gross.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed in the cases of William Taylor, administrator of Polly Blackwell, deceased, James C. Hodges, and Thomas J. West, administrator of Thomas West, deceased, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War submitting estimate of appropriation for repairs to Aqueduct Bridge, District of Columbia—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a reply to the resolution of the House asking for information as to the progress made in erecting a mint building at Philadelphia—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, requesting an appropriation for the repair of a Government wharf at Sitka, Alaska, and making certain recommendations with regard to said wharf—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a request for authority to use unexpended balance of an appropriation to reimburse R. E. Ashley for services—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1199) designating the officers before whom preliminary affidavits in entries of public lands may be executed, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 99); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. DOWNING, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2642) granting leave of absence for one year to homestead settlers upon the Yankton Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 100); which said bill, amendment, and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. McRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completon of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 101); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 325) to provide that United States railroad corporations shall, for purposes of jurisdiction, be deemed citizens of the respective States into which their line of railway may extend, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 102); which said bill, amendment, and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House No. 218, reported in lieu thereof the bill (H. R. 4554) to amend the act approved February 18, 1895, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," accompanied by a report (No. 104); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. RAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the resolution of the House, No. 84, reported in lieu thereof the resolution (No. 125) directing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire as to the rights of executive officers of the Government to refuse to indorse acts of Congress, accompanied by a report (No. 105); which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from the Committee on War Claims, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. HURLEY: The bill (H. R. 3313) for the relief of James Bigler. (Report No. 90.)

Also, the bill (H. R. 3294) for the relief of officers and crews of the U. S. gunboats Kineo and Chocura. (Report No. 91.)

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 248) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish four pieces of condemned cannon to the city of Hastings, Mich.;

A bill (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States;

A bill (H. R. 1785) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the W. H. Wallace Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eldorado, Kans., and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 2777) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic;

A bill (H. R. 4052) approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory;

A bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota;

A joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (excepting heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AFFAIRS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, calling for a statement as to the names of all streets, avenues, alleys, and reservations in the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown which are partially or wholly unpaved, and the total length thereof so unpaved; also the length thereof unsewered; also the length thereof without water mains, together with the estimated cost of fully improving the same; also an estimate of the full amount required to carry out the provisions of the act of March 2, 1893, to provide a permanent system of highways in the District of Columbia outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, the total number of feet of land in streets, avenues, and reservations required to be condemned in each subdivision or piece of land, and the value of the same; also a statement showing the amount of taxes collected in the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county, respectively, by years, from 1878 to 1894, both inclusive, and in like manner the amount expended in each of said sections by the District of Columbia for the same period; also the amount of the revenues of the District of Columbia applied by the Treasurer of the United States to liquidate any undue debt of the District of Columbia to the United States or other parties, from 1878 to 1895, and from what fund taken and to what debt applied, etc., stating that they will immediately commence the preparation of the statements called for, with the object of furnishing the information at the earliest practicable moment, but the scope of the resolution is so vast that with their present resources their response to some of the inquiries can only be made at a very remote period, and that if the information is desired for early use by the Senate an immediate appropriation approximating $20,000 will be requisite to enable the Commissioners to employ the extra force needful to obtain and compile the data with sufficient expedition; which was read.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President the resolution to which the communication is a response was introduced at the request of a large number of laboring people, I understand, taxpaying people, of the District of Columbia. It seems quite extraordinary that a mere matter of information of that kind should cost $20,000. But certain it is that whatever it may cost, before a great debt is incurred here, the people of the District should have some idea as to what will be required in the process of the work.

I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia for such action as it may see fit, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the select and common councils of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an appropriation be made for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the Delaware and Schuylkill rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HAWLEY presented resolutions adopted at the annual meeting of the National Board of Trade, favoring an appropriation for the construction of a ship canal from Lake Erie to tide water; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying that provision be made for the protection of all trains, boats, and vehicles carrying the United States mails; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the fortification of the east end of Long Island Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for a strict enforcement of the immigration laws; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PROCTOR presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Rutland, Vt., praying for the speedy recognition as belligerents of the Cuban patriots in their struggle for freedom; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of sundry citizens of California, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented the petition of James A. Edwards, of Madison County, N. C., praying that he be granted an honorable discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the enactment of legislation changing the rules of practice in Federal courts, so as to prevent action against a defendant in a civil suit unless personal service has been had; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the continuation of the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and their navigable tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations, especially with Canada, Mexico, and Central and South America; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the enactment of legislation establishing a sound and stable monetary system, and in case of failure to agree upon such a system praying for the appointment of a nonpartisan monetary commission; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the National Board of Trade, remonstrating against the Government ownership of railroads, recommending a firm and continuous supervision over their operation and management, and praying for the extension of the bonded indebtedness of the Pacific railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the passage without amendment of the so-called Patterson bill, to prevent unjust discrimination in freight rates; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the enactment of legislation to protect the interests of those whose business relations are affected by the management of subsidized railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent interested parties from being appointed receivers of bankrupt corporations engaged in interstate commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. BLANCHARD presented a petition of the general assembly of the State of Louisiana, praying that adequate appropriation be made for the improvement of the navigation of the Macon and Bœuf rivers in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LINDSAY presented a petition of sundry citizens of Calhoun, Ky., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the Equal Rights Association of Kentucky, praying for the enactment of legislation to protect women equally with black men against State denial of the right of suffrage; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. HILL presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the appointment of a permanent nonpartisan tariff commission; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the enactment of legislation establishing an American system of navigating naval reserves; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for a reduction in postal rates and the exclusion from second-class rates of such publications as are not strictly of that class; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the National Board of Trade, praying for the enactment of legislation to improve the postal laws; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BAKER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Leavenworth, Kans.; a petition of sundry citizens of Kansas City, Kans., and a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of Franklin Trussell, of St. George, Me., and 69 other citizens residing on the coast of Maine, and the petition of J. C. Gomage and 154 other citizens of Bristol, Me., praying that a life-saving station be built on Damiscove Island, Maine; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of sundry citizens of Warren, Mass., praying that the Government take such action as may be possible to relieve the sufferings of Christians in Armenia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of House bills 1227 to 1233, inclusive, proposing to amend the navigation laws; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 179, to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 180, licensing masters and chief mates of sail vessels of over 700 tons; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that an appropriation be made for the completion of the general scheme of coast defenses; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 758) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and settle the account of James M. Wilbur with the United States, and to pay said Wilbur such sum of money as he may be justly and equitably entitled to, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1048) for the relief of J. Floyd Johnston, administrator of John Floyd Johnston, deceased, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose if the Committee on Foreign Relations says that that is not a bill which it ought to take jurisdiction of and that the Committee on Claims ought to have it, it is of little use for me to object. But at the same time it is a claim which grows out of the settlement of the Geneva award, and is a claim which, it seems to me, the Foreign Relations Committee might have properly considered. I shall make no objection to the bill going to the Committee on Claims, though I did hope the Committee on Foreign Relations would act upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee considered it and concluded that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Claims, because it is a claim to be enforced in the Court of Claims, and therefore not a proper subject for the Committee on Foreign Relations. I am informed by a Senator near me that the original bill was reported from the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Foreign Relations will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 65) to authorize Lieut. Sidney S. Jordan, Fifth United States Artillery, and Capt. Edward C. Carter, assistant surgeon, United States Army, to accept medals from the British Government, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the resolution proposing to direct the Secretary of State to send to the Senate the dispatches of the consuls of the United States relating to the war now carried on in Cuba, to report it adversely.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the resolution just reported adversely may go upon the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1676) authorizing Rear-Admiral W. A. Kirkland to accept a gold box presented to him by the Emperor of Germany; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. McBRIDE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BERRY. I ask leave to file at some time hereafter a minority report on behalf of some members of the committee. The bill is not a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Lands, and the minority desire to present their views hereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Leave will be granted. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. 57) granting an increase of pension to Adelaide Morris, to report it without amendment and submit a report thereon. This bill was favorably reported yesterday, and afterwards recommitted to the committee. By mistake the report was put in print. I ask that the report which I now submit may take the same number as the report of yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 744) providing for a naval training station on the island of Yerba Buena (or Goat Island), in the harbor of San Francisco, Cal., and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. CULLOM. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report the concurrent resolutions which I send to the desk. I request that the resolutions be read at length, after which I shall ask the Senate, if agreeable and if there be no objection, to consider the resolutions at this time.

The concurrent resolutions were read, as follows:

Whereas the supplementary treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, between the Ottoman Empire and Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia contains the following provisions:

"LXI.

"The Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out without further delay the ameliorations and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds.

"It will periodically make known these steps taken to this effect to the powers, and will superintend their application.

"LXII.

"The Sublime Porte having expressed the wish to maintain the principle of religious liberty, to give it the widest scope, the contracting parties take note of this spontaneous declaration.

"In no part of the Ottoman Empire shall difference of religion be alleged against an individual as a ground for exclusion or incapacity as regards the discharge of civil and political rights, admission to the public service, functions and honors, and the exercise of the different professions and industries.

"All persons shall be admitted, without distinction of religion, to give evidence before the tribunals.

"Liberty and the outward exercise of all forms of worship are assured to all, and no hindrance shall be offered either to the hierarchial organization of the various communions or to their relations with their spiritual chiefs.

"The right of official protection by the diplomatic and consular agents of the powers in Turkey is recognized both as regards the above-mentioned persons and their religious, charitable, and other establishments in the holy places;" and

Whereas the extent and object of the above-cited provisions of said treaty are to place the Christian subjects of the Porte under the protection of the other signatories thereto, and to secure to such Christian subjects full liberty of religious worship and belief, the equal benefit of the laws, and all the privileges and immunities belonging to any subjects of the Turkish Empire; and

Whereas by said treaty the Christian powers parties thereto having established, under the consent of Turkey, their right to accomplish and secure the above-recited objects; and

Whereas the American people, in common with all Christian people everywhere, have beheld with horror the recent appalling outrages and massacres of which the Christian population of Turkey have been made the victims:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is an imperative duty, in the interest of humanity, to express the earnest hope that the European Concert brought about by the treaty referred to may speedily be given its just effect in such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them both as men and Christians and as beneficiaries of the explicit provisions of the treaty above recited.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States, the House of Representatives concurring, will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions which have been read?

Mr. COCKRELL. In what situation is the matter?

Mr. CULLOM. The resolutions are reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and with the unanimous consent of the committee, I may say.

Mr. LINDSAY. Have the resolutions been printed?

Mr. CULLOM. They have not been printed. I called the attention of the Senate to the reading of the resolutions for the purpose of securing immediate action, if the Senate saw proper to take it. I should be very glad to have the resolutions adopted now, as I think there will be no discussion upon them, because it seems to be something that this Government ought to express itself about, and that without very much delay. If there is objection, of course the resolutions will go over; but if there is no objection, I hope the Senate will vote upon them without delay.

Mr. HILL. I was out of the Chamber when the resolutions were read. I ask the Senator whether he can not state concisely just what is proposed to be done?

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Illinois allow me?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I think the resolutions are important. I have no idea in the world now of opposing the passage of some such resolutions. I had not the good fortune to be in when they were read. I do not think the delay of a day, which it will take to have the resolutions printed and laid on our desks, will interfere with the object the Senator from Illinois has in view, and therefore I ask that that be done.

Mr. CULLOM. In view of the fact that the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] has given notice of his desire to address the Senate this morning, I myself intended, if there was a disposition to discuss the resolutions now, to ask that they should go over. So the resolutions may go over until to-morrow. I give notice that I shall hope to secure their adoption at that time.

Mr. PLATT. I present, out of order, resolutions, in the nature of a petition, passed by the First Congregational Church of Meriden, in Connecticut, which is the city of my residence, with regard to the subject which has just been reported upon by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and I wish to express my feeling of satisfaction that the committee has made this report. The petition, I suppose, may lie upon the table, as the report has been made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will lie on the table, and the resolutions will go over.

Mr. CULLOM. I neglected when I was upon my feet to report back a number of resolutions in the nature of petitions which have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on the same subject. I ask that the committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1677) for the relief of James Q. Shirley and the estate of Francis De Long, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1678) granting muster and pay and allowance of captain of cavalry to Michael Sheehy from June 13, 1864, to March 25, 1866; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1684) granting a pension to Sam P. Barbee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 1685) to amend the immigration and naturalization laws; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 1686) granting a pension to Herman Neudick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1687) placing the name of John W. Brooks, of Ellsworth, Kans., on the rolls of the Army, and granting him an honorable discharge with pay and allowances; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1688) granting a pensionrto Thomas Corcoran; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1689) granting a pension to John F. Hathaway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1690) granting a pension to Richard Brookins; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1691) for the relief of E. N. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURROWS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1692) providing for the publication of District of Columbia advertising by contract; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 1693) for the rebuilding or repair of the public wharf at Sitka, Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALTHALL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1694) to increase the pension of Maj. Gen. Julius H. Stahel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1695) granting a pension to Annie Beach; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 1696) making an appropriation for the construction of an electrical cruiser and to provide electrical equipment for one or more cruisers already in service; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1697) for the relief of J. M. Foster, of Houston, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1698) for the establishment of a subport of entry and delivery at Miami, Fla.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 1699) for the relief of William Loring Spencer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH introduced a bill (S. 1700) to provide for the erection of an armor-plate factory in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. HILL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 61) authorizing and requiring the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton for the improvement of the Harlem Kills, New York City, by a canal to connect the lower Harlem River with Long Island Sound, 3,400 feet in length, 300 feet in width, and 15 feet in depth, at mean low water, or by a similar canal 18 feet in depth, at mean low water, in strict conformity with the survey and report made thereon in 1881 by Col. John Newton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. TELLER, it was Ordered, That the papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate relating to the claim of Miss Eliza A. White, in the Fiftieth Congress, be withdrawn from the files and transmitted to the Committee on Claims of the House of Representatives, there having been no adverse report thereon.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE HEARING.

Mr. CALL. I submit a resolution which I ask may be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Before the resolution is referred I wish to say that it is accompanied by a request from the president of the convention of the Woman's Suffrage Association, which will convene in Washington in the course of a few days, that a hearing shall be accorded to them. It has been accorded to them and a stenographer has been appointed to take down their statements.

The resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Woman Suffrage be authorized to employ a stenographer to report the proceedings at the hearing of the delegates of the woman's suffrage convention.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CHAPELL, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PAYMENT OF GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution relative to the payment of bonds of the United States issued under certain acts in standard silver dollars.

Mr. PUGH. I understand the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor upon the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I was going to suggest that the resolution may lead to considerable debate, and I think it should be placed upon the Calendar, where it can be brought up at any time by a vote of the Senate. Would not that course be agreeable to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; I object to its going on the Calendar. I shall insist on its immediate consideration and for a vote upon it without debate, if I can obtain it.

Mr. HILL. That is hardly possible, Mr. President, in the present status of affairs.

Mr. PUGH. Not with the exercise of freedom of speech possessed so eminently by the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I would suggest, then, as a temporary relief to the Senate and the country, that we lay the resolution aside, in order to take up the resolution upon which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] desires to speak, if that is agreeable to the Senator from Colorado. Then we can dispose of this matter afterwards.

Mr. PUGH. On what resolution does the Senator from Colorado desire to speak?

Mr. HILL. He desires to speak on some resolution pertaining to the Monroe doctrine. I suggest that that resolution be taken up now, and we can bring up this question again after the Senator from Colorado has concluded his speech.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I shall be obliged if the Senator from Alabama will let the resolution lie over temporarily. If it suits his convenience it would very much suit mine.

Mr. PUGH. I feel compelled to yield to the request of the Senator from Colorado, but I am very anxious to have action upon this resolution, and I shall press action upon it whenever it is proper to do so. I hope that the next time it is called up there will be no objection to its consideration on the ground that we are to be inflicted with the old gold-bug argument against the passage of the resolution. If we are to suffer that infliction, the earlier the better.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over for the present.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 21st instant approved and signed the act (S. 30) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a permanent system of highways in that part of the District of Columbia lying outside of cities," approved March 2, 1893.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 22d instant approved and signed the act (S. 628) to provide an American register for the steamer Miami.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate.

The resolution submitted by Mr. SEWELL on the 16th instant was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Monroe doctrine, as originally propounded, was directed to the special prevention of the threatened action of the Allied Powers in reference to the revolted colonies of Spain and the occupation, by way of colonization, of any supposed derelict territory on this hemisphere.

2. That the question of resisting any acquisition of territory by conquest was limited, as stated by Mr. Webster, to cases in which, by reason of proximity, such acquisition would be dangerous to our safety and the integrity of our institutions.

3. That the true ground upon which the Monroe announcement was based and upon which any similar position has been taken rests for its justification upon what may be our interests, and our interests only; and that neither by the Monroe doctrine nor any other official declaration have we ever come under any pledge to any power or State on this continent that binds us to act merely for their protection against invasion or encroachment by any other power.

4. That when a case arises in which a European power proposes to acquire territory by invasion or conquest, it is then for us to determine whether our safety and the integrity of our institutions demand that we shall resist such action by armed force if necessary.

5. That the Executive has pressed the Monroe doctrine beyond what was contemplated at the time of its announcement, and that the resultant sequence of the positions thus taken seems to be a committal of this Government to a protectorate over Mexico and the Central and South American States; that this would be most unwise and dangerous, and would violate the sound and well-established policy that we should avoid all entangling alliances with foreign powers, whether they be European or American.

6. That this action was premature, looking to the history of the controversy, and inopportune in view of the business and financial condition of the country.

7. That neither Congress nor the country can be, or has been, committed by the action or position of the executive department, in reference to the Venezuelan boundary controversy, as to the course to be pursued when the time shall have arrived for a final determination. It will then be our province and our duty to adopt such a line of policy and to take such action as may be then demanded by our sense of duty to the country and by a due regard for its honor and dignity, the welfare and safety of our people, and the integrity of our institutions.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, the extraordinary message of the President of the United States having reference to a dispute exclusively between Great Britain and Venezuela, both friendly powers, was practically indorsed by both Houses of Congress. The responsibilities, therefore, which his action may have entailed rest as well upon the legislative as the executive department of the Government, and are equally shared by all political parties. The recommendations of the President that a commission be appointed to inquire into the points of difference between the two Governments concerned, and to enlighten this country as to the true divisional line separating Venezuela and British Guiana, were followed by Congress, and that Commission, eminent in ability and lacking only the joint sanction of the parties in interest, which sanction alone can give it vitality or usefulness, has duly qualified.

Under the circumstances it would ordinarily seem to be the part of wisdom to refrain from further public comment on a subject of so sensitive and delicate a character until some decisive step had been taken or some obstacle had been encountered calling for legislative interference. And neither the fact that illness prevented my presence in this body when the message was laid before the Senate nor the sporadic utterances on the subject which we have recently heard here would have served to induce me to embarrass the existing situation by further discussion.

The resolutions, however, which the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported to this body, the effect of which may be, in my opinion, most far-reaching, as affecting our policy and relations toward other and friendly Governments, require some discussion and careful investigation before we commit ourselves to their declarations, and lead me to participate in this debate.

The few remarks I shall make will be chiefly to the effect that the so-called Monroe doctrine has been misapplied in the pending controversy; that so much of President Monroe's message as referred to the colonization of portions of America by European powers could have no applicability to any boundary dispute now existing in South America; that the hostility to the extension by European powers of their systems to any portion of this hemisphere, as expressed in that message, had especial reference to the systems of government which were based on the divine right of kings, and which were directed to the overthrow of all republics, wherever existing; that the Monroe doctrine was in no wise intended as insisting upon republican forms of government in this hemisphere, or as committing this Government to maintain the doctrine outside its own borders or except as its own integrity might be affected; that this country is embarking upon a new and different policy from the one laid down by our fathers, and that from 1823 until now Congress has uniformly declined to define the so-called Monroe doctrine or to adopt it as a rule of action.

The existing condition of affairs makes the calm discussion of the principles of the Monroe doctrine most difficult at this time. It is not an easy or a gracious task to take, in this high forum, a position which apparently involves in the slightest degree the abandonment of that patriotic fervor which animates the breast of every citizen where our national pride or our country's honor is in question. There has been much tension for the past few weeks. The letter of the Secretary of State to Mr. Bayard was, from a diplomatic point of view, almost incendiary. The President's message glowed with the possibilities of war. Members of both Houses of Congress, not to be outdone, followed the President's suggestion as to the appointment of a commission with feverish haste. Just what the commission is to do, or how it is to do it, nobody knows, but we have created it, and it stands, as yet, more a menace than a guaranty of peace.

The efforts of the Government to fire the national heart have not been unavailing nor was the work difficult. We have had but two wars, except our own civil conflict and a war of conquest with the weak Government of Mexico. Both of them were with Great Britain; and while the past eighty years have seen an entire readjustment of all our relations with the mother country, a readjustment which ought to make future war with her out of the question, there are still lurking some traces of the traditional resentment. There is discontent, too, with existing conditions in many sections of the country, and men feel that any change, even war with a foreign country, could not make matters worse, and might bring improvement. There are all over the West and South men who work on their farms and find the grain they raise little more valuable for food than as fuel, who know that the railroads which charge them for the transportation of their produce are largely owned in Great Britain, and are either prosperous or, if insolvent, are fostered and protected and managed by Federal courts. They also view with distrust the close financial relations existing between the bankers of the East and those of London, and they would welcome any event, even war, that would result, as they believe a war would result, in destroying those relations and lead us to rely upon our own resources alone, and to embrace economic policies which would not be dependent on those of foreign countries. Thoughtless and weak and ignorant these views may be, Mr. President, but the person who denies their existence is not familiar with conditions or opinions in many States of the Union.

Add to all this the fact that hostility toward Great Britain is fostered by some political leaders who believe that jingo demonstrations may distract attention from domestic discontent and that this hostility is intensified by the bitterness cherished toward that Government by thousands of her former subjects, now citizens of this Republic, and it is not surprising that there exists in the breasts of many of our people an antagonism to Great Britain so rampant and so fierce that judgment is unheeded and passion and prejudice hold full sway.

It is easier to drift with such a condition than to antagonize it, but with the convictions on this subject which I hold, Mr. President, that sense of duty which accompanies us in public station as in private life prohibits a silence which would be cowardly, and impels me to the presentation of the right as light is given me to see it.

There has never been a doctrine more misunderstood or misapplied than the so-called Monroe doctrine. It is, and has ever been, without recognition by other countries, and has always been refused the approval of Congress.

The whole question first arose as follows—and in the presentation of this immediate branch of the subject I shall more than once quote from an able article in the North American Review for April, 1856, written while the whole subject was familiar to men who had been in public life when the Monroe doctrine was promulgated:

There was an unsettled controversy between Russia and the United States pending in 1823 respecting their possessions in Northwestern America, Russia claiming title along the Pacific as far south as latitude 51°. Great Britain also laid claim to much of the same territory and to a point even farther south. We insisted on our title to Oregon, not only through our treaty with Spain in 1819, which gave us all her rights north of the forty-second parallel of latitude, but also based our claim upon prior discovery and exploration of what was known as Oregon Territory.

There had been but little actual development over vast areas of the Northwest, and there was danger that some foreign powers might still claim portions of our dominion as unsettled country and open to exploration and occupation. Spain and Great Britain had entered into certain agreements prior to our treaty with Spain in 1819, and it was important to us that any rights asserted on behalf of or through Spain should be extinguished. This Government, therefore, was quick to declare that Spanish rights in this whole hemisphere had lapsed because of the revolution in South America, although the contest was not ended for twenty years longer. The use of the word "colonization" had reference, therefore, not to acquisition of territory by conquest, or treaty, or purchase, but solely to the establishment of colonies founded on priority of discovery and occupation; and so explained, the phrase, "The American Continents are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power," becomes clear enough, and its attempted application to existing disputes in South America is absurd, and this was Mr. Clay's understanding of the expression, and so explained by him in his dispatch when Secretary of State, in 1825, to our minister to Mexico.

This disposes of so much of the Monroe doctrine as applies to colonization by foreign powers. Then follows the other declaration in the message, so often quoted and misquoted and tortured in meaning:

> In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparation for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere we are of necessity more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the Allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure, and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere, but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. In the war between those new governments and Spain we declared our neutrality at the time of their recognition, and to this we have adhered and shall continue to adhere, provided no change shall occur which, in the judgment of the competent authorities of this Government, shall make a corresponding change on the part of the United States indispensable to their security.
> The late events in Spain and Portugal show that Europe is still unsettled. Of this important fact no stronger proof can be adduced than that the Allied Powers should have thought it proper, on a principle satisfactory to themselves, to have interposed by force in the internal concerns of Spain. To what extent such interposition may be carried, on the same principle, is a question in which all independent powers whose governments differ from theirs are interested, even those most remote; and surely none more so than the United States. Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same; which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy; meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the Allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethern, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference. If we look to the comparative strength and resources of Spain and those new governments, and their distance from each other, it must be obvious that she can never subdue them. It is still the true policy of the United States to leave the parties to themselves, in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course.

And the message of December, 1824, was still more emphatic:

> Separated as we are from Europe by the great Atlantic Ocean, we can have no concern in the wars of the European Governments nor in the causes which produce them. The balance of power between them, into whichever scale it may turn in its various vibrations, can not affect us. It is the interest of the United States to preserve the most friendly relations with every power, and on conditions fair, equal, and applicable to all. But in regard to our neighbors our situation is different. It is impossible for the European governments to interfere in their concerns, especially in those alluded to, which are vital, without affecting us. Indeed, the motive which might induce such interference in the present state of the war between the parties, if a war it may be called, would appear to be equally applicable to us. It is gratifying to know that some of the powers with whom we enjoy a very friendly intercourse, and to whom these views have been communicated, have appeared to acquiesce in them.

The circumstances attending these utterances are well known. After the Napoleonic wars, and in the reactionary period which followed the French Revolution, the sovereigns of Russia, Austria, and Prussia met personally and formed an offensive and defensive alliance intended to assert the divine right of kings and to put down with fire and sword any revolt against the doctrines of what was termed "legitimacy" and to interfere wherever, in either world, it could aid in smothering and destroying all aspirations for freedom.

It called itself the Holy Alliance, and interfered in Spain where a constitutional Cortes had superseded King Ferdinand, and it threatened to subjugate the Spanish-American provinces which had thrown off the Spanish yoke.

The English people had already secured the great bulk of the commerce with these countries, and viewed with disfavor any interference with them by European Governments, and the announcement I have quoted from President Monroe's message was largely the suggestion of Mr. Canning, then the English secretary of state for foreign affairs, and met the cordial support of the English Government. Not only was the Monroe doctrine the direct outcome of English suggestion, but in all the wars for independence fought in the swamps and jungles and in the fever-infested districts of these tropical provinces of South America, and in the long struggles for liberty which drenched the Spanish colonies in America with the blood of patriots, British volunteers fought ever in the front of battle. Veterans of Waterloo, many of them, they sought only an opportunity to fight the Spaniard, the oppressor of the New World. Their valor at the battle of the Bridge of Boyacá carried the day and set New Granada free. At the great and decisive battle of Carabobo in 1821, on Venezuelan soil, after the Venezuelan troops had been again and again repulsed and were in full retreat, the British legion, with reckless and heroic bravery and against overwhelming odds, carried the Pass of Carabobo in a bayonet charge and with it carried the fortunes of the day and of the war. At the close of the battle, of the 900 English troops, 600 lay dead or wounded on the field, their colors seven times changed hands and were dyed with the blood of the dauntless heroes who carried them, and as the few survivors, with trailing arms, filed past Bolivar when the day was won, he saluted them as the saviors of his country. Such was the example which Great Britain set and the encouragement she afforded during the long struggle for freedom in South America. Without her aid Venezuela might not to-day be free, and those who now denounce her as if she were the oppressor of Venezuelan liberties may, with profit, study the history of those early and bloody times.

The concern of President Monroe was not lest monarchies should be established in this hemisphere. He expressly recognized existing Governments, and had welcomed the Empire of Dom Pedro in Brazil and Iturbide in Mexico as freely as the Governments of Bolivar; he protested not against despotic Governments, but against their forcible extension by the dreaded Holy Alliance in this Western world, of which he stood in well-grounded fear.

In this connection I quote from the summary in the North American Review, to which I have referred:

> We have now arrived at the point in our historical review from which we can clearly perceive at what this declaration of Mr. Monroe was aimed. It was intended as a caveat to the designs of the allies, and as an earnest protest against the extension to this continent of the "political system" on which they were based. What were those designs and what was this political system which endangered the peace and safety of the United States? The history of the Holy Alliance furnishes a sufficient answer to both of these questions. The designs of the European monarchs against the independence of the Spanish American States, prosecuted as they would be in accordance with a political system which recognized only the doctrine of legitimacy and the divine right of kings, would necessarily menace the very existence of our own institutions, since these had been founded in a most contumacious disregard of the principles deemed most "holy" by an alliance which arrogated to itself the "undoubted right to take a hostile attitude in regard to those States in which the overthrow of the government may operate as an example." In what country did the overthrow of legitimacy then exert so potent an influence as in the United States? And if the Spanish American republics were now to be assailed for their imitation of our "example," could we hope, as the federal representatives of the free principles most obnoxious to the Holy Alliance, that we should escape their flaming zeal in the cause of "order and legitimacy," after they had finished with the South American republics?

A blow aimed at them because they were republics was a blow equally aimed at the independence of our own country; and hence it was that Mr. Monroe declared that any such armed intervention by the Allied Powers of Europe could not be regarded as "in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States"—a declaration characterized no less by the calmness of its delivery than by the patriotic foresight in which it was devised. Originated for the purpose of meeting a particular conjuncture of events, it finds in them alone its real purport and its justification. Wise, and seasonable with reference to the circumstances of the time at which it was promulgated, it ceased to be of any force, even as a Presidential recommendation, so soon as the crisis which called it forth had passed.

It was the Holy Alliance he dreaded; the Holy Alliance which, as Mr. Brougham said in 1823 in the House of Commons, was—not against freedom on the Ebro, or freedom on the Mincio, but against freedom; against freedom wherever it is found, freedom by whomsoever enjoyed, freedom by whatever means achieved, by whatever institutions secured.

These patriotic utterances of President Monroe, approved by the great Jefferson, found ready indorsement in this country and in England. We were, however, perhaps more conservative then; possibly there were enough other issues upon which votes could be solicited, and Congress, when called upon in 1824, by Henry Clay, then Speaker, to indorse the substance of the message, declined to adopt it and make it a rule of legislative action.

I read from the account of the debate:

On the 20th of January, 1824, Mr. Clay, who was Speaker of the House of Representatives, moved the following resolution in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of these States would not see, without serious inquietude, any forcible interposition by the Allied Powers of Europe, in behalf of Spain, to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States."

We need not state what was the fate of this resolution, as well as of a similar one offered by Mr. Poinsett of South Carolina. Its object, as appears from the face of it, was to give a legislative sanction to the principles enunciated in the President's message; but, whether from prudent caution or timid counsels (as to which we venture to express no opinion), it was never adopted by the House of Representatives.

And from that day to this Congress has failed to give the doctrine official sanction.

I quote from 1 Wharton:

It is seen also by the debates on the Panama mission and the Yucatan intervention that Congress has never been willing to commit the nation to any compact or pledge on this subject, or to any specific declaration of purpose or methods beyond the general language of the message.

In the debates on the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in 1855-6, above referred to, all the speakers seemed to agree to this position of the subject. Mr. Clayton said: "In reference to this particular territory I would not hesitate at all, as one Senator, to assert the Monroe doctrine and maintain it by my vote; but I do not expect to be sustained in such a vote by both branches of Congress. Whenever the attempt has been made to assert the Monroe doctrine in either branch of Congress, it has failed. The present Democratic party came into power, after the debate on the Panama mission, on the utter abnegation of the whole doctrine, and stood upon Washington's doctrine of nonintervention. You can not prevail on a majority, and I will venture to say that you can not prevail on one-third, of either House of Congress to sustain it."

Mr. Cass said: "Whenever the Monroe doctrine has been urged, either one or the other House of Congress, or both Houses, did not stand up to it." Mr. Seward said: "It is true that each House of Congress has declined to assert it; but the honorable Senators must do each House the justice to acknowledge that the reason why they did decline to assert the doctrine was that it was proposed, as many members thought, as an abstraction, unnecessary, not called for at the time." Mr. Mason spoke of it as having "never been sanctioned or recognized by any constitutional authority."

And when a resolution respecting the Panama congress was under discussion, Congress expressly refused to commit itself to the Monroe doctrine in any form (Review, page 506):

When the resolution "to appropriate the funds necessary to enable the President of the United States to send ministers to the congress of Panama" was under discussion in the House of Representatives, it was expressly voted that such ministers should in no way make any compact or engagement with the Spanish American States in regard either to any threatened intervention or any future colonization by the European powers on the American continents. Resolutions to this effect were introduced by Mr. McLane of Delaware and Mr. Rives of Virginia, who afterwards, however, agreed to accept a "modification" presented by Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania, embodying the substance of both their resolutions. This modification, after reciting and approving the neutral policy of the United States, declares:

It is therefore the opinion of this House that the Government of the United States ought not to be represented at the congress of Panama except in a diplomatic character, nor ought they to form any alliance, offensive or defensive, or negotiate respecting such an alliance with all or any of the South American republics; nor ought they to become parties with them, or either of them, to any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing the interference of any of the European powers with their independence or form of government, or to any compact for the purpose of preventing colonization upon the continents of America; but that the people of the United States should be left free to act, in any crisis, in such a manner as their feelings of friendship toward these republics and as their own honor and policy may at the time dictate.

This resolution was passed in the House by a vote of 99 yeas to 95 nays; and thus was the declaration with respect to colonization left in abeyance, or rather expressly repudiated by this branch of Congress with reference to the Spanish American States.

Nor was it considered even by the generation of statesmen who controlled the destinies of our country at the time the message was transmitted that the declarations of the President involved us in the slightest responsibility to protect the countries of South America against foreign invasion.

Mr. Webster, in a speech on the Panama mission, in 1826, spoke as follows:

"It is doubtless true, as I took occasion to observe the other day, that this declaration must be considered as founded on our rights, and to spring mainly from a regard to their preservation. It did not commit us, at all events, to take up arms on any indication of hostile feeling by the powers of Europe toward South America. If, for example, all the States of Europe had refused to trade with South America until her States should return to their former allegiance, that would have furnished no cause of interference to us. Or if an armament had been furnished by the allies to act against provinces the most remote from us, as Chile or Buenos Ayres, the distance of the scene of action diminishing our apprehension of danger, and diminishing also our means of effectual interposition, might still have left us to content ourselves with remonstrance.

"But a very different case would have arisen if an army, equipped and maintained by these powers, had been landed on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico and commenced the war in our immediate neighborhood. Such an event might justly be regarded as dangerous to ourselves, and on that ground call for decided and immediate interference by us. The sentiments and the policy announced by the declaration, thus understood, were therefore in strict conformity to our duties and our interest."

And Mr. Adams, who had originated the doctrine, declared its limitations in his message of December 26, 1825.

Accordingly, in his special message to the Senate, under date of December 26, 1825, advising the appointment "of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to the assembly of American nations at Panama," Mr. Adams took occasion to explain the principle enunciated by the late President, in the following explicit and unmistakable terms. We quote from the message:

"An agreement between all the parties represented at the meeting, that each will guard, by its own means, against the establishment of any future European colony within its borders, may be found advisable. This was, more than two years since, announced by my predecessor to the world as a principle resulting from the emancipation of both the American continents. It may be so developed to the new Southern nations that they will all feel it as an essential appendage to their independence.

And in terms still more definite in his message to the House on March 26, 1826:

Should it be deemed advisable to contract any conventional engagement on this topic, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact, each to maintain the principle in application to its own territory, and to permit no colonial lodgment or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil.

Not only, Mr. President, was the Monroe doctrine intended simply as a declaration of limited scope and purpose, as I think I have shown, but the circumstances under which it was given to the world were far different from those which now exist; and under present conditions its assertion and maintenance to the extent claimed by the present Executive have ceased to be of paramount importance.

It was essentially a doctrine of self-defense, promulgated for our own preservation and for no other purpose. Our country, in 1823, was sparsely settled, and its boundaries but vaguely defined. Nearly half of our present area, excluding Alaska, was owned by Mexico. Russia claimed certain rights in the Northwest, and the tremendous and sinister power of Spain had not been finally shaken off by the countries to the south of us. England was our ally, our friend, although our own boundary claims with her were unsettled, fearing, as we feared, the possible encroachments of Russia and the certainty of war with Spain if she should recover her footing in South America. Any successful step in her behalf to the south of us meant the restoration of the whole continent to that cruel and reactionary people whose brutality has darkened the pages of history for four hundrtd years. The fear was then real and the danger threatening. To-day how different the picture! We have helped ourselves to what land we needed; our own borders are defined, our Government eternally planted on the solid rock; our people intelligent and lovers of liberty and devoted to free institutions. No danger threatens us from without. We are menaced by no foreign foe.

Our boundaries, as I have said, are rounded, completed, and defined. They are not assailed either on the north or on the south. We are in no danger of losing any portion of our territory, nor do we desire at this time to acquire on either side an additional acre, and vast as are our resources, intelligent as are our people, we possess an element of strength even greater than these advantages afford us; and that is that nobody wants us. We are not desirable subjects for other countries. There is not a nation in the whole world that would take one of our sovereign States as a gift, with its people. Alsace and Lorraine may be transferred from one race and one nation to another, and a generation may bring acquiescence in the change; but no country has an army large enough to hold a foot of American soil where our flag has once floated, and "Time's iron feet" can make no impress upon our love and our equal devotion to every section of our country.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WOLCOTT. If it is important, but if not I had rather go on.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think it is important, and that it will not disturb the Senator. In the event that England tomorrow should negotiate with the Nicaraguan Government for the purchase of all the Nicaraguan soil, I should like to know whether the Senator would say that the Government of the United States ought to protest; and if it did protest, whether it should protest in the name of the Monroe doctrine or in the name of what should it protest?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not care to be dragged into a further discussion in answer to the interruption of the Senator from Oregon, and after that I trust I may be permitted to proceed with my speech. I shall cover the very ground to which the Senator refers later, as he would have found if he had possessed his soul in patience.

Of course, if Great Britain were foolish enough to take such action, we should interfere, and should interfere to any extent; and we should interfere not in the slightest degree because of the Monroe doctrine, but because of the undoubted and inalienable right we have to protect our interests wherever anything is asserted to the contrary in any portion of the earth. [Applause in the galleries, which was suppressed by the Vice-President.]

Mr. President, it is idle to talk seriously of our integrity or perpetuity being threatened by an adjustment of boundary between Great Britain and Venezuela. That which once seemed a danger and evoked the utterance of the Monroe doctrine has passed forever away, and has left nothing to vex us but the pride of expression to which we still cling.

In the early years of the century, Mr. President, men's hearts were all aglow, the whole world over, with hopes of liberty. There was no section of the earth where there was despotism that there were not brave spirits struggling for freedom, and young republics held out the hand of friendship to each other and all men were brothers. Bolivar and other gallant leaders were battling nobly in the south, and there seemed to be promise of the same growth in civilization in South as in North America. That hope was long since dispelled. Instead of developing into self-respecting republics based upon law, advancing in morals and civilization, the peoples of South America have shown themselves so far, almost without exception, utterly unfitted for self-government. Their so-called republics are largely and usually military despotisms based on force and relying on bloodshedding and assassination for their establishment and for their brief continuance; extending only until the ruler shall have amassed from the oppression of the people a fortune sufficient to enable him to live in luxury in Europe, when he escapes or abdicates, or until some other revolutionist shall be able by violence to seize the reins of government. The rulers are despots and suffrage a farce. Not only was this the condition of affairs fifty years ago; it is equally true to-day.

Mexico, almost alone, under the able and wise rule of Diaz has enjoyed exceptional and long-continued immunity from revolution, and the Mexican Republic seems firmly established; but its early history is like that of the other Central and South American countries. From the date of the independence of Mexico in 1821 down to 1860—a period of thirty-nine years—it had thirty-six different forms of government and seventy-two individuals figured as its chief executives. They were regents, presidents, president substitutes, emperors, commanders-in-chief, generals, and dictators, but the people had no more voice in the government than they have in Russia to-day.

There is occasionally a country which, for the moment, seems to have aspirations toward good government, and for a brief period some ruler will appear to realize that a republic means something else than a bloody and oppressive despotism; but such a country and such a ruler are the exception and not the rule. The people are ignorant and submissive; the rulers are arbitrary and cruel. Let me read what the latest intelligent American traveler has to say of them. I quote from the book of Mr. Theodore Child, who saw with friendly and uncritical eyes, and sought to find only that which was attractive or gave promise for the future:

> The Argentine Republic has had an experience of sixty years of politico-electoral warfare. Party politics and personal ambition of a political nature have caused more bloodshed than the conquest of liberty itself, and yet the political education of the nation does not seem to make any progress nor the patriotism of individuals to acquire any rational development. The prosperity of the Argentine Republic has been impeded in the past by the passions, the political ambitions, and the want of morality of its criollo sons.

He again says:

> In the political struggles there are rarely questions of principles, but always questions of persons. President succeeds president, but the aim of all is equally selfish, and even if the opposition were transformed into the government the whole result would be that one set of parasites would take the place of another. In Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Chile, and Peru the political conditions are more or less the same; they are ruled by presidents who are as absolute autocrats as the Czar of Russia, and even more so, because they are safe from the intrusion or influence of European criticism. The President of Argentina or the President of Chile is master of the whole administrative organization of the country so completely that no legal and constitutional means can be brought to bear efficaciously against his personal will or caprice. He not only disposes of the armed force of the country, but the entire administrative personnel is his creature and at his devotion. Thus the manipulation of the whole electoral machinery is under his control, and the citizens enjoy in consequence a right of voting that is purely platonic. They may vote, it is true, in many cases, as much as they please, but no account is taken of their suffrages. The whole apparatus of republicanism in these countries is a farce, and in spite of the sonorous speeches of after-dinner orators they have not yet begun to enjoy even the most elementary political liberty.

From the general discussion in the press of the country one would at first blush be inclined to believe that the United States had strong natural affiliations with these Central and South American Governments, and were tied to them in bonds of ancient affection as well as fraternal love. In all this demonstration, therefore, with which we are indulging ourselves, it may be well to remember that after the announcement of the Monroe doctrine we went to war with one of these Governments and took from it a country which doubled the size of our own territory, and that it is only five years or so ago that we were about to blow Chile off the land and out of the water because her people were too frank in the expression of their hostility to us.

Mr. HOAR. And murdered a few sailors.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes, and murdered a few sailors as an evidence of friendship.

Mr. HOAR. As a very frank expression of what they feel.

Mr. WOLCOTT. As a frank expression of their friendship for us. The fact is, we have absolutely nothing in common with these countries; that with few exceptions they dislike us and are jealous of our prosperity, and only call upon us to aid them when their commercial dishonor has led them to repudiate their debts and deprive them of European friendship; or when, as in the present case, they can successfully appeal to our love of fair play, our sympathy for the weak when threatened by the strong, and especially to our instinctive devotion to everything which is labeled "American."

These people, Mr. President, though alien in race, language, and religion, are entitled to our friendly and affectionate regard; as citizens of a sister Republic in name we may even owe them protection whenever the interests of free government or the cause of civilization is attacked by assaults upon their autonomy. Beyond that point our obligation ceases. The description which I have given of the South American States generally applies with added force to Venezuela. Ever since her contest with Spain she has had revolutions at average intervals of eighteen months. Her population consists of upward of 2,000,000 people, and of these, until the recent influx to the gold fields, less than 1 per cent were whites, the remainder of the inhabitants being negroes, Indians, and the mixed races, composed of mulattoes and zambos. Much of the present friction between Great Britain and Venezuela arises because of the recent development of gold fields in southern Venezuela. These fields are already attracting the attention of our miners from the Western States; many of our people are already there and more will follow. Where the vexed boundary line will finally be located we can not tell, but I am frank to say that I sincerely hope it will rightfully be found to place these rich mines where the English-speaking people, who must develop them, will not be subject to the cupidity of the half-breeds of Venezuela, and where the English common law and the certainty of its enforcement will furnish them shelter and protection.

The phraseology of the resolutions reported by the committee, Mr. President, is as unobjectionable as any language could be which endeavored to assert in binding and final terms a policy to which this Government desired to commit itself in dealing with the relations of foreign countries to this hemisphere. It is moderate, it is clear, and it is comprehensive. The objection to it, in my opinion, is that Congress is not called upon to give its sanction to any policy to be pursued toward the Governments to the south of us; and that at this particular juncture any legislation is unwise and can only accentuate existing difficulties.

Conditions change from year to year. The policies of to-day become inapplicable to-morrow. For the last seventy years Congress has wisely refrained from placing the seal of its sanction upon the Monroe doctrine. These resolutions can not help us to a solution of existing difficulties, and at this moment of excitement and of passion we are not in the best condition to frame a policy which shall guide our country for all future time.

Our right and our duty to interfere in every South American and Central American question that in any wise affects our interests are undoubted; but that right and duty do not rest on the message of President Monroe, nor are they strengthened by legislative announcement.

The passage of the resolutions at this time can do no good and perhaps little harm, but their introduction only adds another fagot to a fire which ought not to be permitted to longer burn. From the point of view which I am presenting the diplomatic correspondence was, on our side, unnecessarily irritating, the message of the President ill advised, and the creation of a commission with no facilities for investigation not shared by us all, and without invitation by the parties in interest, was hasty and premature. Believe me, Mr. President, I do not presume to criticise our past action or to arrogate to myself superior wisdom. Under similar surroundings and with the same environment I should very possibly have joined in the unanimous action of the Senate if I had been permitted to be present in this body; but at this time it does nevertheless seem as if the further agitation of this question should cease until the resources of diplomacy are finally exhausted. Probably every American believes that Great Britain should have agreed to arbitrate the line ab initio and without reservation, but she did not so agree. Whereupon we have made it infinitely more difficult for her to accept arbitration by our demonstrative diplomacy and volunteer commission; and we are drifting into a position where Great Britain's refusal to arbitrate, and she may lawfully refuse, will be considered not as demanding from us only a dignified and earnest protest, which is as far as most thoughtful Americans believe it fitting that we should go, but may be deemed by a numerous and influential body of our people to be a justification for the severance of relations between the two countries, and perhaps for war.

We are told that we should not consider the possibilities of war; but we must look to the rational result of our interference along present lines. In my opinion, Mr. President, there will be no war. It will be avoided, not because our position toward Great Britain in her dispute with Venezuela is tenable, for I think I have shown its unsoundness, and it has been rejected by the press and public opinion of every first-class power in the world; not because by our moderation and wisdom we avert the possibilities of war, but because Great Britain will yield the whole controversy rather than face the horrors of such a war over such a question, a war out of which no victor could emerge whatever the result; a war which would put back civilization and progress for a century, and which could only mean disaster to the human race. If such a contest shall be thus avoided, as I pray it may, it will bring to us no added honor and to Great Britain no disgrace; nor will the cause of liberty in South America be furthered or our own foundations be laid the stronger.

If the Senate, Mr. President, was not responsible for the original differences which have arisen between Great Britain and this country relative to the Venezuelan boundary, it must be admitted that we have done much toward keeping the question active and the differences acute. For instance, the other day, after all the Venezuelan dispatches had been published to the world, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] saw fit to introduce a resolution having reference to the abortive revolution in the Transvaal. In what I have to say I make not the slightest reflection on the Senator from Alabama. I know his personal courtesy and his high sense of official duty, and I question neither, but I do protest that the introduction at this time of such a resolution was at least unfortunate and that its motive might be easily misunderstood. It is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the people of the United States of America, through their representatives in Congress assembled, convey to the President and people of the Republic of Transvaal their earnest congratulations upon their success in establishing free representative government, republican in form, and in their opposition to any foreign power that denies to them the full enjoyment of these rightful liberties.

The people of America having realized, through the favor of the God of Nations, the blessings of government based upon the consent of the governed, entertain with confidence the pleasing hope and belief that the principles of self-government will be securely established through the influence of the Republic of France, in her colonies, and of the Republics of Liberia and the Transvaal, founded by the people in Africa; and that those Republics will foster and give firm support to the peaceful progress of Christian civilization in the new and vast field now being opened to the commerce and institutions of all the nations of the earth throughout that great continent.

Resolved, That the President of the United States is requested to communicate this action of Congress to the President of the Republic of Transvaal.

I know but little of the Transvaal Republic, but I am advised that a large percentage of its white citizens are English-speaking people, and are denied representation, while paying their full quota of taxation; and that situation is one which ordinarily demands and receives American sympathy for people so deprived of what we cherish as an unalienable right. But whatever the cause of the uprising, or the merits of the dispute, Mr. President, my attention at that crisis was diverted to another channel. France is a sister Republic, and although most of her colonies, commended in the resolution of the Senator from Alabama, have fewer rights than Cuba, she is yet entitled to our consideration and sympathy because of her form of government. Germany has furnished us hundreds of thousands of worthy citizens, who are a credit to the Republic. Russia was our friendly ally in the late war. And yet, Mr. President, when I read that all these powerful Governments—France, Germany, and Russia—had allied themselves together against Great Britain, and that the people of those little islands, "compassed by the inviolate sea," in defense of what they deemed their rights, were marshaling their armies and assembling their navies, ready, undaunted, to face a world in arms, unyielding and unafraid, I thanked God I was of the race! There is no drop of blood in me, Mr. President, that is not of English origin, and I have no ancestor on either side since 1650 who was not born on the soil of New England; but my heart beats faster when I recall the glorious deeds of Clive, and Lawrence, and Napier, and Wellington—

> England's greatest son;
> He that gain'd a hundred fights,
> And never lost an English gun.

of Drake and Hawkins, who fought the Spaniard and swept the Spanish Main, and of the incomparable Nelson; and my pulse quickens when I realize that the splendor of their achievements is part of our glorious heritage, and that the language of Burke and of Chatham is our mother tongue!

Mr. President, we will protect our country and our country's interests with our lives, but we wage no wars of conquest or of hate. This Republic stands facing the dawn, secure in its liberties, conscious of its high destiny. Wherever in all the world the hand of the oppressed or the downtrodden is reached out to us, we meet it in friendly clasp. In the Old World, where unspeakable crimes even now darken the skies; in the Orient, where old dynasties have been crumbling for a thousand years and still hang together strong in the accumulation of infamies; in South America, where as yet the forms of free institutions hold only the spirit of cruelty and oppression; everywhere upon the earth it is our mission to ameliorate, to civilize, to Christianize, to loosen the bonds of captivity, and to point the souls of men to nobler heights.

Whatever of advancement and of progress the centuries shall bring us must largely come through the spread of the religion of Christ and the dominance of the English-speaking peoples; and wherever you find both you find communities where freedom exists and law is obeyed. Blood is thicker than water, and until some just quarrel divides us, which Heaven forbid, may these two great nations of the same speech and lineage and traditions stand as brothers, shoulder to shoulder, in the interest of humanity, by their union compelling peace and awaiting the coming of the day when "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more." [Applause in the galleries.]

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 248) empowering and directing the Secretary of the Navy to furnish four pieces of condemned cannon to the city of Hastings, Mich.;

A bill (H. R. 1785) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon and four pyramids of condemned cannon balls to the W. H. Wallace Post, No. 66, Grand Army of the Republic, of Eldorado, Kans., and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 2777) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate condemned cannon and condemned cannon balls to certain posts of the Grand Army of the Republic.

The bill (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. 4052) approving certain acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, authorizing the issue of certain bonds of said Territory, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. 4254) granting to the Duluth and North Dakota Railroad Company right of way through certain Indian reservations in the State of Minnesota was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (excepting heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill., was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the joint resolution be now considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas a clause in the sundry civil appropriation act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat., 395), relating to public buildings, provides: "No change in said plan involving an increase of expense exceeding 10 per cent of the amount to which said building was limited shall be allowed or paid by any officer of the Government without the special authority of Congress;" and

Whereas during the last recess of Congress the contract for the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill., was let for an amount less than the estimated cost, and it became advisable for the Secretary of the Treasury to so modify the drawings and specifications for said building as to provide fireproof construction and improved design: Now, therefore

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to construct and complete the above-named building as may be shown and called for by modified drawings and specifications: Provided, That the present appropriation for said building and its site shall not be exceeded.

Mr. COCKRELL. The joint resolution has not been referred to a committee?

Mr. CULLOM. It has just come from the other House.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are we to act upon all House bills without any reference to a committee here in the Senate? Is that to be the rule?

Mr. CULLOM. As the joint resolution does not make any appropriation whatever, but modifies the appropriation heretofore made so as really to cheapen the cost of the building below what it was before, I simply ask that it may be put on its passage, that the work may go on upon the changed plans in that respect.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Illinois please explain what the measure is?

Mr. CULLOM. The joint resolution explains itself better than I can explain it. Did not the Senator hear it read?

Mr. HILL. I think the Senator can explain it more concisely, and I shall be obliged to him if he will do so.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not think I can do so without having the measure before me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the bill ought to be referred. We can not legislate in the confusion in the Chamber.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall make no objection. I ask that it be referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. To the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CULLOM. To the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The joint resolution ought to go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, not to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to a reference to that committee. All that I ask is that it be acted upon as quickly as possible.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PAYMENT OF SUGAR BOUNTY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on December 16, 1895, respecting what action had been taken in regard to the payment of the appropriation for the bounty on sugar contained in the sundry civil bill approved March 2, 1895, I herewith transmit a communication received from the Secretary of the Treasury, which contains all the information I have upon the subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 22, 1896.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire, with the consent of the Senate, to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins. I ask that it be read. I see that the clerks have made a mistake in making up the joint resolution for printing. I have marked it as it should be read. The part printed in italics shall come at the end of the part printed in roman characters. Let it be read in that way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The SECRETARY. The joint resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896 for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins; and as the public exigency requires that the valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, to be purchased under the authority of the said act and by the said appropriation, may be ready for distribution at the earliest possible date, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to procure them by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold.

The amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is to add to the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them: And provided further, That he shall not be required to expend all the appropriation available for said purchase, but only so much thereof as, considering the time when distribution can be made, may profitably be expended to promote the objects named in said act.

Mr. PUGH. I understand the Senator from North Dakota calls up the joint resolution for the purpose of addressing the Senate, but not for the purpose of securing action upon it to-day.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. What is the measure the Senator from Alabama desires to call up?

Mr. PUGH. I desire to call up the resolution that was laid aside informally to enable the Senator from Colorado to deliver the eloquent speech to which we have all just listened. If the Senator from North Dakota simply desires to address the Senate in accordance with the notice he gave yesterday, I certainly shall not interfere.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not believe that the consideration of the joint resolution will occupy much time this morning. If the Senator has a measure in charge, I will state that I do not desire to displace anything by the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator claims that his joint resolution is to be considered for final action, I must insist on calling up the resolution which was temporarily laid aside; but I do not wish to interfere with his right to address the Senate. However, if he intends to insist upon final action, I am satisfied that the joint resolution will give rise to a great deal of debate and consume a great deal more time than I am willing now to yield to him.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have conferred with Senators upon the other side on this question, and I doubt if there will be much controversy over the joint resolution. I think that we shall be able to reach a conclusion in the course of an hour.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from North Dakota that he will not have an hour for its consideration. It is now a quarter to 2 o'clock, and the unfinished business comes up at 2 o'clock. I suppose there will be no difficulty on that score between the two Senators, because his remarks will occupy over fifteen minutes, and then the unfinished business, of course, will take its place.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to say to the Senator from Alabama that my object in calling up the joint resolution is that I may have an opportunity to offer some remarks upon it this morning.

Mr. PUGH. For that purpose I have no objection, but I shall call up the resolution I have in charge at the close of the Senator's remarks, to which he will not object, I understand.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that the Senator will have the right of way after I get through.

Mr. HILL. I suggest, with entire respect to the two distinguished Senators, that they do not compose the whole Senate. I have great respect for the rules and I shall insist upon their enforcement. I have not the slightest objection to the Senator from North Dakota proceeding if he desires, subject to all the rules of the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. Of course it is the custom of the Senate to yield to the request of a Senator who desires to call up any matter for the purpose of submitting remarks. That is the purpose for which the Senator from North Dakota now asks that his joint resolution be called up, and for that purpose and for that alone I yield my right to call up my resolution, giving notice that after he concludes the resolution I have in charge will come up. I understand that to be in accordance with my right, and I am on the floor for the purpose of making that disposition of the resolution. I desire to call it up for consideration at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Do I understand that the Senator from Alabama proposes to call up his resolution and agree that it shall be laid aside temporarily?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir. If it interferes with the unfinished business, of course I will have to consent to lay it aside, but I shall ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution which has just been laid aside temporarily.

Mr. PLATT. I have just come into the Chamber. Do I understand the Senator from Alabama to claim that his resolution is the unfinished business of the Senate? I supposed there was no unfinished business in the morning hour.

Mr. PUGH. It has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. This morning?

Mr. PUGH. This morning; as morning business. It came up in its regular order, and was laid before the Senate as a matter entitled to be considered.

Mr. PLATT. And it was laid aside for the purpose of enabling the Senator from Colorado to make his remarks?

Mr. PUGH. Yes; I gave way to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. PLATT. In that case of course it is before the Senate.

Mr. PUGH. I now exercise the right, as I yielded at that time, and have a right to insist upon it until 2 o'clock; and when 2 o'clock arrives, if I can not get the consent of the Senate to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily, of course I shall have to yield to the unfinished business.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota has been recognized.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from North Dakota allow me?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. The joint resolution which the Senator from North Dakota desires to have considered is one upon which the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry differ. The Senator from North Dakota desired to press the consideration of the joint resolution yesterday, and probably on the day before. At my request, and to accommodate me, he consented to postpone any action looking to taking up the measure until this morning, and I consented that when that was done I would make no opposition to taking it up.

Of course, if the Senator from North Dakota simply desires to address the Senate upon it, while the Senator from Alabama grants him that privilege, I would suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he try to get unanimous consent, without displacing any pending business, to take up the joint resolution at some particular hour and proceed with it to its final determination. It is not the character of a bill upon which a Senator would care to make his remarks and just put them in the RECORD as a mere matter of debate. There will be debate on both sides. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota, inasmuch as no consent has been given to him to do more than to address the Senate upon the joint resolution, that he ask unanimous consent to have it considered at some hour which suits him; I will agree to it. And then let us take up the joint resolution and proceed with it to its final passage or its final defeat.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Mississippi what hour would be convenient to him?

Mr. GEORGE. Any hour will suit me, because you have been very liberal to me. And now the Senator may exercise his discretion.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Any hour to-day, do I understand?

Mr. GEORGE. So far as I am concerned, any hour that suits you will suit me.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well; I ask unanimous consent that 3 o'clock to-day be fixed.

Mr. BATE. I think, to subserve the interests of all parties, the Senator from North Dakota had better go on and make the speech he desires, and let the joint resolution go over until to-morrow. There is no immediate necessity for pressing it to-day that I know of. It can be disposed of in the morning. There is no regular speech set after the morning business to-morrow, I understand, and the Senator from North Dakota can have the full time.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that notice has been given of two speeches for to-morrow.

Mr. BATE. But that is after 2 o'clock, not in the morning, I understand, and the Senator will have full swing in the morning. I think we had better pursue that course rather than a broken dose to-day.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Then, may I reach an arrangement with the Senator from Alabama that to-morrow morning, after the morning business, we shall proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state that two notices have been given for speeches to-morrow morning directly after the morning business, and I would not feel justified to agree to unanimous consent where Senators had given notice some days previous to the agreement now asked.

Mr. BATE. I was not aware of the notice as to speeches to-morrow in the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). The matter before the Senate, the Chair understands, is the resolution of the Senator from Alabama, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] asks unanimous consent that he be permitted to address the Senate at this time.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I have asked for unanimous consent that 3 o'clock to-day be fixed as the hour when we shall consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLEN. I desire the attention of the Senator from North Dakota. Why not ask to have the joint resolution taken up, say, day after to-morrow, by unanimous consent, at the conclusion of the morning business and debate it until it is voted upon and finally defeated or passed?

Mr. PLATT. I am not willing at this time to give any consent which would interfere with the unfinished business. I think that bill ought to be proceeded with, as I have suggested heretofore, and I am not willing to give any consent which will interfere with the unfinished business, either for to-day at 3 o'clock or any time to-morrow after 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection having been made, the question before the Senate is the resolution of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I rose simply to make a similar statement to that which has just been made by the Senator from Connecticut. I can not consent that the regular order shall be displaced by unanimous consent at this time.

PAYMENT OF GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand that at last the resolution of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] is properly before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HILL. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the resolution, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, however, If, for any reason, at any time our silver coins shall not be at a parity with gold coin according to their coinage ratio, then the bonds of the United States now or hereafter issued, which by their terms are payable in coin, shall be paid in standard gold coin whenever demanded.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am inclined to regret that the distinguished Senator from Alabama sees fit to press the consideration of this resolution to-day. After we have listened to the very able and eloquent remarks of the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] upon a patriotic question it is quite difficult for us immediately to take up a dry financial subject. The resolution can not be disposed of before the expiration of the morning hour. It is a resolution which in 1878 led to a very elaborate debate, occupying many days, and it must lead to considerable debate at this time; and if action is insisted upon now, it must, of course, displace the regular unfinished business, which is the bond or free-coinage bill.

In the first place, Mr. President, permit me to suggest that I can see no good to result from this discussion at this time. I know of no good reason why the resolution should be pressed at this particular monetary crisis. The principal part of the resolution consists in whereases. It consists of recitals from history. It refers in considerable detail to certain measures passed many years ago. The first measure to which it refers is the act passed in 1869, known as "An act to strengthen the public credit."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 2904, on which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] is entitled to the floor.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I suppose, however we may differ as to the remedy, there will be very little dispute as to the condition of the country. I do not suppose there is any member of this body who is satisfied with the present financial condition in the United States. I should doubt very much whether there is any intelligent man in the United States who would say he is entirely satisfied with present conditions.

We find ourselves now in a very extraordinary state so far as our finances are concerned. If we may believe the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, the finances are in a very deplorable and a very threatening condition. We know ourselves, beyond all question, that the business interests of the country are in a deplorable condition. We know they have been so for some years. We may not agree as to the cause. Some of us will attribute it to one thing and some to another, but the general condition of this country with reference to its industrial affairs I think no one will deny. I do not suppose in our history there has ever been a time when there were so many men out of employment as to-day, except it might have been for a few months during the panic of 1893.

I do not suppose there has ever been a time in our history when the productive enterprises of the country were less remunerative than at this hour. But this has been our condition now for a number of years. It is morally certain that something is wrong; it is morally certain that we can not continue in this condition much longer.

The President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury tell us that the entire difficulty arises from a lack of confidence in the money of the country. If that be true, then it behooves us to address ourselves without delay to changing this condition and to securing a proper financial system. I do not myself agree that the trouble which has arisen in this country has grown out of the distrust of the currency. I deny that there is anything which indicates that the people of the United States distrust the money in circulation; and the statement so made is opposed to the entire history of money.

In 1893, when this Administration came into power, we were told early, as we had been told in a former Administration presided over by the present Executive, that our financial affairs were about to bring us to distress, and a kind of panic spread through the country, not with reference to the currency, but with reference to some threatened, undefined danger which nobody seemed to understand. On our side of the Chamber the Republicans attributed it largely to the tariff question, and said it was because the Administration which had come into power was about to change the McKinley law.

Mr. President, the Administration came into power with nearly 400,000 more votes than the supporters of the McKinley law had been able to rally at the polls. Then there were a million and a quarter more votes, more than a million of which were in pronounced hostility to the McKinley law. So there was a vote of the people of the United States of almost a million and a half which was not in accordance with the sentiment of our party as we had crystallized it in the legislation called the McKinley law. The disturbance and the distress and the doubt were not in reference to the McKinley law and not from a distrust of our money; that is to say, nobody doubted but that the greenback and the Treasury note and the national-bank bill would continue to perform money functions in the same way that they had been performing them for years.

For fear I may be misunderstood I want to go back a moment. When I say there were nearly a million and a half votes that appeared to be in antagonism to the McKinley law, I do not mean to say that that was an expression of hostility to that law. I believe, and I will say it now so that I shall not be misunderstood, that the American people were dissatisfied with the condition of affairs existing, and did not stop to consider what the effect of their votes would be upon the McKinley law or upon the protective system. They simply said, "A condition exists in this country which is not satisfactory; we do not like it; we do not like the party which is in power; they have not granted the relief we think they ought, and we will change."

I think that can be demonstrated by the fact that at the next election after the Democratic Administration came into power there was an equal dissatisfaction expressed at the polls, which resulted in a great Republican victory. I do not any more consider that vote an approval of the Republican doctrine than I consider the other vote a condemnation of it. The people of the United States have reached a point where they care little for party, and where they care little for the general policy for which the two political parties have been contending, for they have been and are in distress. The oldest man in this country has never seen anything like it. There have been through all our history troubles of this kind, brief in duration; there have been various occasions when labor would vainly seek employment, and when the productive energies of the country felt the paralyzing influence of improper legislation, but in a history of more than a hundred years of our governmental existence under the Constitution there has never been a time when this paralysis, when this depression, when such a dissatisfied condition as this has so long existed. The people, anxious for relief, turn first from one party to another. To me that is the most unsatisfactory symptom of the situation. I should have been better pleased to have seen the people of this country staying by the Democratic party. I do not like to see a change of many hundred thousand votes from one election to another, only two years apart.

What condition are we in now? We have been told that we must maintain the public credit, that we must keep gold in circulation and maintain the country upon a gold standard. Mr. President, in every city in the United States to-day gold is at a premium. It is a commodity; it is now bought and sold like wheat and corn. There is not a bank in the city of New York or in the country outside, unless it be in the extreme West, which, if I am rightly advised, has not practically suspended gold payments. It is true that the premium is not large; it was last week, I think, as the New York papers stated, 1 per cent, but it is too large, if the New York statements are to be credited, as the Sun's correspondent of day before yesterday stated, to allow any man to take a greenback and get gold out of any bank in New York. He can go to the Treasury and get it; but the greenback, which represents the currency of the country for many years, has now practically disappeared from circulation. It can only be obtained, as I understand, in any suitable quantities, just as gold can be, by being bought.

Mr. PLATT. Is there not a premium on greenbacks the same as on gold?

Mr. TELLER. If there is a premium upon gold it follows, of course, the one being exchangeable for the other, that there must be equally a premium on the greenback. A premium on one kind of money may or may not be a depreciation of the other. In this case it does not mean a depreciation of the other. I state this as an inflexible rule of the philosophy of money, which no man has ever seen contradicted in practical experience, that whenever money depreciates prices rise. I challenge any man, it matters not who he may be, to cite a single instance in the history of the world where the depreciation of money was not followed by a rise of prices. The way to determine, and the only way to determine, the depreciation of money is by the rise of prices.

Mr. GRAY. One is the correlative of the other.

Mr. TELLER. One is the correlative of the other, as the Senator from Delaware says.

There is, then, no depreciation of the silver certificate; there is no depreciation of the silver dollar; there is no depreciation of the bank note. There is an appreciation of gold. That appreciation, which has existed heretofore with reference to commodities, now reaches the point where it is with reference to the remainder of the money of the country. That has been the great bugbear which has been held up before the American people for the maintenance of the gold standard with all that it costs. You have reached it in spite of the gold-standard people; you have reached it without the aid of silver legislation; you have reached it because it was as inevitable as the night to follow the day.

Mr. President, that is our condition. I do not believe in depreciated money. I believe in a stable money, and I believe that money is the best which maintains a uniform rate of prices. But if I am to take the two, I shall be in accord with the best minds of the people when I say that a depreciating standard is infinitely better for us than an appreciating one. An appreciating standard means a paralysis of business, the cessation of enterprise, the destruction of the energies of the country. The other means a stimulus. So of the two it is much better that there should be a depreciation than an appreciation.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if he has no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHITE in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TELLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the Senator from Colorado does not entertain the opinion entertained by the majority of his party, that the present industrial and financial condition has been produced by a change of tariff.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no, Mr. President, I do not.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator's position be true, and I fully concur with him, can the Senator point out any difference between the financial policy of the majority of the Republican party and the controlling element of the Democratic party?

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will wait until I get a little further along, perhaps he will find out my views on that subject. I am painfully aware that the distinction between the Senators who are in favor of the gold standard on the other side of the Chamber and those in favor of that standard on this side is absolutely so slight that I am not able to observe it.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, if the Senator will permit me one moment more, if he desires to bring about a change in our financial policy, does he expect to accomplish that result in his own party or in the Democratic party?

Mr. TELLER. I shall not now enter upon that phase of the subject, because I may touch on that before I get through. I am opposed to the gold standard, as everybody knows. I do not believe that it is possible to maintain the gold standard in this country. I do not believe it is possible for any debtor nation to maintain the gold standard. It is only the rich and creditor nations which can maintain a gold standard at this time, unless the output of gold shall be greatly increased even beyond the present prospects.

Mr. President, I do not intend to go into a general discussion this afternoon of the silver question. I propose to discuss the conditions here and now with reference to the financial affairs of the United States, and see what the remedy is, if remedy there be.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator says he does not believe the country can maintain the gold standard. Does he want to abandon the redemption of greenbacks with gold now?

Mr. TELLER. I shall get to that after a while. You have still, I suppose, the redemption of greenbacks in gold, but you have got nothing else. If there is any particular advantage to the country in maintaining the greenback redemption in gold, and having all the rest of your paper discredited by not being redeemed in gold, I fail to see it.

Mr. PLATT. The reason I asked the question was because I think the real question which is now before the Senate is that the House sends a bill here which will, in its opinion, facilitate the issuing of gold to redeem greenbacks, and the Senate proposes to change that into an unlimited silver-coinage measure. I think the real question before the Senate now is whether we shall defeat the bill sent us by the House and adopt a measure for free coinage.

Mr. TELLER. That is what I intend to direct my remarks to to-day. I said I did not now intend to make what is called a general silver speech. I am going to make a money speech, if I know how. I am going to deal with the currency question of this country, and I am going to try to show, which I think I shall be able to do without any difficulty whatever, that the gold people of this country have absolutely no idea how they are going to maintain it, except by the continual sale of bonds. The silver people have fixed ideas upon this subject. We have been presenting those ideas for many years to the Senate, and we have been told again and again that it was heresy from a proper financial standpoint. For fifteen years we have been laboring to secure what we believe to be a proper financial system, and during that time there never has been offered to us by those who contend for a gold standard a system which they themselves dared to indorse; and I will venture to say now right here that the four members of the Finance Committee of this Senate who represent the gold sentiment of the Senate, if they could have the assurance of every silver man in the Senate that whatever they brought out, if it had the semblance of decent legislation, should be supported, could not bring forward under existing conditions a system that they dare to support themselves.

Mr. PLATT. There are five gold Republicans.

Mr. TELLER. There are not five gold Republicans on the Finance Committee. I believe my colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT], who is a member of the committee, is not one of them.

Mr. PLATT. There are five without him.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; that is correct. What I mean to say is—I do not mean to say it offensively—that we have no financial system from the members of the Finance Committee who stand for the single gold standard which is worthy of being presented to the Senate, and they never have presented one, and I doubt whether they ever do. It is not enough to say that you are going to maintain gold payments. How are you going to do it? There is nobody here who dares to stand before the American people and say he means to indefinitely continue the sale of bonds to buy gold.

Mr. PLATT. I will tell the Senator how I would do it if he will assure me that his silver monometallist friends will allow me to do it. I would enact a law that our customs should be paid in gold. Then we should not have to borrow.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, Mr. President, that is palpable evidence to my mind, not wanting to be offensive, that some members of the committee have not considered this financial question as they ought to have done. Do you suppose that you can maintain in this country the parity, which you say is essential, between the different kinds of money if you give to one money functions that you deny to another? That would be a violation of the fundamental principles of the philosophy of money. It was that weakness and vice which Thad. Stevens said would cost us a thousand million dollars with the greenbacks, and it cost more than that, infinitely more. All kinds of money must be equivalent in their functions as money, and any system which maintains one class of money which performs functions that another does not is condemned at once by intelligent political economists. There never has been in the history of the world a success of that kind, never.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I may interrupt my colleague, I understand the Senator from Connecticut desires to destroy all other kinds of money except gold.

Mr. TELLER. Very well. If that is the Senator's idea——

Mr. PLATT. No, Mr. President; and it would take a very vivid imagination to draw any such conclusion from anything I have said; but I know the Senator from Colorado has a very vivid imagination.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I assume that when Senators in this body talk about desiring to maintain the parity of the different forms of money they are in earnest; and yet the proposition comes here at once from a member of the Finance Committee that he would destroy that parity by law. I do not wonder that the country is in distress financially. If such views come from the Finance Committee, what will you expect of those who do not have the benefit of the wisdom which always comes to a man when he gets on a committee that is compelled to deal with some particular subject? We are, of course, not expected to be so well informed. But we all realize the fact that when a man gets on the Finance Committee the very fact that he is on that committee gives him superior knowledge over the rest of the body. If that be so, what will you think of those of us who do not believe that the way to maintain the parity is by law to destroy it? The President of the United States has a theory. It is not a good one, in my judgment, but it is a better one than is proposed by this bill. The President says:

> We will destroy the paper money that the United States has got; we will retire and redeem either with gold or with bonds the $500,000,000 of circulation.

Why does he propose that? Because, he says, it is difficult to maintain the gold standard with that paper in circulation. He might have said, and truthfully said, that it is impossible to maintain the gold standard with $500,000,000 Government paper and the national-bank notes in circulation, and we have reached a point in our history when we might as well recognize that fact; and when we do recognize it we will address ourselves to some legislation that will relieve the country, and we shall not do so until then.

The President says—I am speaking now of his system, and I will touch on the other side later—that he does not know, or he is not certain, whether the banks of the United States will come to our relief or not. He does not know what will take the place of the $500,000,000 when it is retired, but he thinks if the banks do not come and furnish the money that gold will probably flow in and take its place, and we shall have no contraction; and he goes into an argument to show that the banks will take this circulation. I want to deal with that for a few moments.

Suppose, now, we concede that the President is right, and we take the $500,000,000—it does not amount to quite that sum, but I speak of it in round numbers—and we issue bonds for it; then the banks have the privilege of taking this $500,000,000 bonds and making them the basis of a bank issue. Will they do it? Is there any reason to suppose, considering the condition of the banks in this country, that they will do it? With all the advantages that they have had, we have only about $200,000,000 of bank paper in circulation, and they have attempted to retire $23,000,000 of that amount. On the 28th of September last they only had $181,000,000 in circulation for which they were responsible. Of course they had deposited the balance of two hundred and odd millions of dollars with the Treasury to redeem their notes as they come in and are redeemed, but the banks themselves had reduced their circulation in September to $181,000,000. Now, what inducement are you offering the banks so that they will give to us the $500,000,000 of currency that we destroy, and which will continue to give to us the necessary currency which the business of this country, its progress, and its growth demand?

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] who sits near me says, "In what will they redeem?" That is what I am coming to. In what will they redeem when they are on the gold basis? In gold, and gold alone. If they do not redeem in gold, if they fail to redeem in gold, I suppose from what I have heard on this floor from the advocates of the gold standard the national honor will be destroyed and we shall be disgraced.

Mr. President, there is no reason on the face of the earth to suppose that you can replace $500,000,000 of these greenbacks with paper redeemable in gold. If you give to each bank in this country the right to issue a sufficient quantity of paper so as to make up this supply, we must have seven or eight hundred million dollars of bank paper. Are the bankers in this country so stupid and so ill acquainted with the need of affairs that they, with the limited supply of gold in this country, are going to take upon themselves the burden which the Government lays down with the declaration that it can no longer maintain it? Where will that fall? Not upon the 8,000 banks which then may be in existence, but it will fall upon the associated banks of the great city of New York, and practically upon them alone. The great banks of New York City have for years declined to take out any more circulation than the law required them to have. It is the country banks which swell the nearly $200,000,000 of bank paper that is afloat. The associated banks of New York would no more assume the burden of maintaining the gold standard than they would go into liquidation, and they would go into liquidation whenever they undertook to do that. Could they do it if they tried? We need not hesitate to say, and it will not hurt our credit to say, that the gold in this country will continue going to Europe. It has been and is going there in quantities sufficiently large to disturb the business of this country, and sufficiently large to frighten the executive department of the Government and to compel the admission on their part that we have now practically reached the point where the Government can no longer maintain the gold standard and the gold redemption of its greenbacks. You have a proposition here from the Senator from Ohio that as these greenbacks come into the Treasury you shall keep them there. What is that but an admission that you can not maintain the redemption?

Mr. President, you have before you on this view what I think is a serious contraction of the circulation of this country, not less than $500,000,000. But suppose the banks say, "We will take upon ourselves this burden; we will issue an additional $500,000,000 of paper money." I do not desire to say anything that is offensive to the people who engage in banking. I recognize it as a legitimate method of doing business, and among my acquaintances are some of the very best men in the world who are engaged in it; but I could not look with complacency, nor do I believe the American people can, upon any system that puts into the hands of the 4,000 now practically, or a little under that, or the 8,000 that may take their places if we double and treble this issue, the entire financial affairs of this country.

Mr. President, the history of banking in this country and the history of banking in Europe ought to make any lover of his country stand aghast at that suggestion. For myself, I will accept the contraction of $500,000,000 of money before I will put into the hands of the banks the prerogative that I believe belongs to the Government, the issuing of the money of the country. The American people are not going to surrender that prerogative to the banks. If they did, the banks could not maintain $700,000,000 of paper money redeemable in gold. Where will the banks redeem the bills? Take the banks in Colorado, where will they redeem their bills? If they redeem their bills at the bank, which they would be able to do, what is the value of that bill? Then you make a distinction between the bills that circulate in the West and the bills that circulate in the East. You do just what was done before the war, when Pennsylvania money coming into the State of New York was at a discount of 2 or 3 per cent; when Illinois money, perfectly good under the law and a system that was absolutely perfect, reached across the Alleghanies it was at a discount in every commercial community, and when the paper of the Southern banks (and some of the Southern banks were as solvent and safe as any Northern banks) reached the great West and the North it was at a discount without reference to its solvability. Why? It was too far away from the place of redemption.

Mr. President, any banking system that is satisfactory to the American people and maintains a uniform value throughout the country must have a central point of redemption. That must be either here, as it now is, or in the great cities of the East. If that is to be the case, then the banks of New York must take upon themselves almost the entire burden.

A few weeks ago $7,000,000 were called out of the Treasury in a week. We had in two months demands upon the Treasury for $77,000,000 of gold; $77,000,000 of Treasury notes and greenbacks came into the Treasury, principally the subtreasury in the city of New York, and called for a like amount of gold. That is more than the associated banks of New York have. That is more than they expect to have or would have. When the banks are placed face to face with this responsibility they are going to decline to take out their circulation.

Then you come down to a great contraction unless the aspiration and the hopes of the President may be realized, that gold may come from somewhere to us. Mr. President, the gold will not come to us, because the balance of trade is against us and is likely to be against us and because we owe a great debt to Europe that we are in honor bound to pay and must pay. The American people must get rid of all this fuss that comes from the Treasury Department and the Executive about the export of gold and realize that the export of gold from this country to Europe is a legitimate export, called out by the fact that we owe money and not because the people of this country or Europe are afraid of our solvency or distrust our money.

Mr. President, the national banks will not take this responsibility. If the national banks will not, the State banks will not. It is not possible, in my judgment, if it were attempted, that they could do it. The first thing you would know if those banks attempted to do it would be a run upon some bank that would call upon the other banks to assist, and in the end the gold would go out of the banks and the country would be not upon a gold basis, nor upon a silver basis, but upon an inconvertible bank-note basis; we would be upon a paper basis. Now, that is the President's proposition. I will speak a little later of the vice of this proposition in this, that it requires a great amount of indebtedness to be saddled upon the country.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator leaves the point of the capacity of the State banks to maintain a redeemable paper currency, I should like to ask him whether it is not a fact that prior to the war there were systems of State banks in many States in which the redeemability of all their paper was maintained in metallic money?

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; that is true.

Mr. GRAY. And practically in gold from 1853 to 1861?

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. GRAY. Well, after we got rid of foreign silver?

Mr. TELLER. After we got rid of foreign silver, then, of course, it was practically in gold.

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. There were a few banks that maintained themselves that way, but the great mass of State banks did not, as the Senator knows.

Mr. President, I assume that if the great banks in the large cities are afraid to take upon themselves this responsibility, as they certainly are, for they have shown no inclination to do it, the State banks can hardly undertake it, or if they undertake it they will meet the same fate that I have prophesied for the other banks.

But, Mr. President, there is another objection to this besides the danger of contraction. In time of peace you add to the burdens of the people an indebtedness of $500,000,000 for what? For the purpose of exchanging a currency that has done money duty in this country for many years to the satisfaction of the people, whether it was redeemable in gold or whether it was not, for another paper issued not by the Government, but dependent entirely upon bank conditions for its solvency and its redemption.

Mr. President, the history of banking in this country is not such as to make one want to pin his faith on bank support. The banks in this country have not increased their capital in the last few years. There is a good deal less capital now in the banks than there was four years ago. I do not recall the amount exactly, but it is $30,000,000 or more, if I am not mistaken, less now than there was two years ago. The banks have not shown a disposition to enlarge their capital or to enlarge their issues.

That is one side of the case; that is the Administration side. Now, what is the other? The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] was anxious to know whether I thought the Republican party, as a party, had any better methods of solving this public question than the Democrats had.

Mr. President, I do not know what the policy of the Republican party is now. I do not know what it is to be. Conditions have changed. Conditions are likely to continue in the direction that they are now for an indefinite period. I can learn from no source that the Republicans have any other system than I find from this bill. I assume now that the bill that came from a Republican House represents Republican ideas upon this financial question. If it does, it shows that this great party of ours is as incapable of managing the financial affairs of the country as our opponents have shown themselves in the last three years to be.

What is the policy of the Republican House? What is the policy of the party, then, to which I belong, as foreshadowed by the legislation proposed here? It is not proper for me to comment upon the conduct of the other House. I only comment upon the bill as it represents, I think, Republican sentiment and Republican purpose and Republican policies when the Republicans shall have both branches of Congress and the Executive. It is an indefinite policy of running in debt without any possible hope of coming to an end until you have exhausted the available money of this country that is willing to go into national bonds.

This bill proposes that the President of the United States, in addition to the power that he has now, shall have the power to sell bonds. It is an unlimited and unrestricted authority to sell bonds, to sell them for the purpose of maintaining a gold reserve, to sell them for the purpose of maintaining the gold standard, which ought by this time to be apparent to everybody can not be maintained without a sacrifice that the American people ought not to be asked to submit to, and which, in my judgment, they will not submit to. They will make themselves heard when the time comes, as they have in the past, by turning out the party that comes into power and attempts to do such a thing, as they turned out the Democratic party by voting them out.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. In considering the Republican policy as developed by the action of the other House, is it not fair that the Senator should take into consideration a revenue bill which accompanied the bond bill for the purpose of providing a revenue of at least $40,000,000 a year?

Mr. TELLER. I am coming to that point. There may be some connection between the two measures, but they were separate in their character, and they both, I suppose, have the entire support of the Republicans of the other House. No; the bond bill did not, but the revenue bill did.

Mr. President, we have issued within the last two years, and in less than two years, $162,000,000 of bonds. Before two years from the first issue expire we shall have issued two hundred and sixty-two million three hundred and some odd thousand dollars of bonds, and that, too, in time of peace.

It is said on our side of the Chamber that we would not be required to issue these bonds if we had enough revenue. The Senator from Ohio made an extensive speech, in very much of which I was in perfect accord, to show that if you had the revenue you would not be required to sell bonds to get gold. I do not agree with that, and I do not believe that can be maintained. I think the President and Secretary of the Treasury are nearer right when they say that no amount of revenue would save us from the disagreeable alternative of selling bonds unless we have a gold income, which the Senator from Connecticut proposes to have by the way of exacting gold payment for import duties. No matter what the President may say, I have the proof here to show that more than $100,000,000 has gone to pay current expenses. It was better that it went to pay current expenses than that it should be tied up in the Treasury.

Now, let me submit a proposition to my Republican associates who believe this system could go on. No matter how much revenue you get, you still have got to get gold to meet the demand that you say our honor and our credit require you to meet in the redemption of Treasury notes and greenbacks. In addition, then, to the increased revenues that you put into the Treasury and take out of circulation, you put into the Treasury the accumulation of the sales of the bonds, and to that extent you contract the currency.

Does anybody believe that it is a good time to contract the currency now? You have contracted the currency $119,000,000 in the last two years, as shown by official reports. Do you not believe—I do, at least—that a part of the paralysis of business, the disinclination of people to go into enterprises, arises from that very fact of contraction? Do you want to continue it? You will take $100,000,000 of money into the Treasury by the 5th day of February for the new bonds, and a little more, probably. What are you going to do with it? Are you going to lock it up? Are you going to keep it there out of circulation? When the demands of commerce and trade for gold shall have called for that $100,000,000 from the Treasury, in exchange for greenbacks, as it surely will, you will sell another $100,000,000 and put that in the Treasury, to lie there as idle and dead money. It is withdrawal from circulation that depreciates the price of the products of the country just to the extent of the proportion the withdrawal bears to the whole money in circulation.

Mr. President, you have got two propositions. One of them is the Republican and the other is the President's. If anybody can see any advantage in one over the other, it seems to me that the President's suggestion is the better of the two.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. Then was not our first mistake the repeal of what is known as the Sherman Act? If that had been in existence would it not have supplied currency so that it would have kept pari passu with the requirements of business and population?

Mr. TELLER. Our first mistake was in 1873, when we deprived ourselves of one-half the money metal of the world. I do not care to go into that, but I want to say here that I have never wasted any time over the question as to how it was done. I never regarded that question as a matter of very much consequence. I knew the American people did not ask it. Whether it was done in fraud of their rights or whether it was not, I have never concerned myself about, and never discussed that question. But the question is, What has been its influence upon this country?

Mr. President, there is where the great mistake occurred. The great mistake was when the Bland bill came into the Senate from the House of Representatives as a free-coinage measure, with then a divergency of only 8 per cent between silver and gold in the markets of the world, that the Senate did not accept the House bill and give to the world the benefit of free coinage in the United States. If you had done that there would have been no silver question here to trouble you. There would have been no silver question to trouble the world. The United States would have taken care of the surplus of silver until the silver of the world, temporarily depressed by the action of Germany, had reached its proper and original mint value.

It seems to me that we have reached a point where something must be done. It seems to me that we have reached what may be said to be the parting of the ways.

I am not insisting now in this speech that there is no other remedy except free coinage, although I do not believe there is; but I am begging my associates in the Senate, who do not believe in free coinage, whether they be on this side or the other, to present to the American people in this hour of their distress some common-sense system that the honest people of the country will believe is right, some system that shall prevent this Government from running in debt.

Mr. President, when a nation runs in debt in time of peace it either argues that it has entered upon a decay, that it is deteriorating, or it argues that the administration of public affairs is in the hands of incompetent men. I do not know that anybody will pretend that the American people are not as strong to-day as they ever were in all that makes a nation rich and great. We have had no misfortune; we have had nothing that ought to make the people of the United States poor. We have had nothing to bring distress to the people of the United States, save and except a wicked financial policy, which it appears is to be adhered to to the extent of running this country in debt indefinitely.

Mr. President, upon the question of public indebtedness I have very pronounced views. Two hundred years ago or thereabouts the system of national indebtedness practically began in the world. Before that the debts of the world were so small as to be inconsiderable, and in their influence upon affairs of states merely nothing. They are so to-day in the uncivilized regions of the world. China, with its 400,000,000 people, owes less to-day than the amount in which we have run in debt in two years. Japan, with its forty-odd million people, owes less money now after its war with China than the amount in which we have already run in debt or are to run in debt by this new bond issue.

Mr. President, there can be no excuse for it. There is absolutely no defense that can be made in a court of morals for a nation that runs in debt in time of peace. Every patriotic impulse, every interest in our country and our race, demands that we should pay as we go. I know you can not do that in time of war. The old policy was to do so even then, but the modern is that you will not, and I do not suppose that we ever shall, but it is for us now, for the first time in our history, to sit quietly by and see the Government going in debt at the rate of $260,000,000 a year in time of peace.

Mr. President, our revenues are not sufficient, but we are not running in debt at that rate because of a paucity of revenue. I suppose this year it is safe to say that the deficiency will not exceed thirty or forty million dollars. I believe a distinguished member of the other House put it at twenty or thirty million dollars. That is nothing; I would not complain of that. We could stand that, and we would so reform our system of getting revenue that we could return to proper conditions. But that does not relieve us. The President of the United States has said, ex industria, and the Secretary of the Treasury has reiterated it, that no amount of revenue relieves this situation; that nothing will relieve it but the sale of bonds, the increasing of the public debt. One proposition is to increase it by $500,000,000, and when that is done the silver money of the country will offer another opportunity to increase the public debt to $400,000,000 more.

In my judgment there is a determined effort being made in this country to create a great national debt, and in that it has got the assistance of the public authorities. It is as determined as it was that the Sherman law should be repealed. They intend to create a great debt of a thousand, fifteen hundred, or two thousand million dollars if they can.

We hear it said by those who do not appreciate what American attachment to the country is that it will bind the people to the country to have and own some of the Government indebtedness. Great heavens, Mr. President! if we have reached a point in our history when our patriotism is determined upon the dollars that we may own of the Government's debt, and our interest is only to maintain its supremacy because we have a financial interest in it, it is time, Mr. President, that the country went to the dogs, as it would when that had come. There is nothing in that. There are a few men who have the money and are controlling the politics of this country and the politics of the world. A distinguished Englishman said he could name forty men in the city of London and in Paris and in Berlin who absolutely control the destinies of the world by means of their wealth.

Mr. President, why do those people want to engage in buying bonds? Why do they want to put their money into Government funds? He who puts his money into a manufacturing enterprise, in an industrial pursuit, takes the chances of loss. The man who puts his money into Government funds takes no chances whatever. He pays no taxes. He bears no part of the burden of either the State, city, or nation. He is independent. He demands protection, but he gives nothing in return. Under existing law, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, it is practically impossible to compel a holder of our funds to contribute a dollar to the support of the National Government or State governments.

Mr. President, these bondholders take no risks. When everything else is doubtful, when prices are falling, when stagnation strikes the country and paralysis of trade reaches every department of labor and business, the bondholder is secure. What cares he so long as he knows that he has got the nation back of him?

Mr. President, a national debt is a national curse, and if made in time of peace it is a national disgrace—one that ought to make every American blush. A national debt is inevitable if you are to maintain the gold standard. I do not care if you pass this revenue bill, which you know you will not. I do not care if you pass other revenue bills. You may take $100,000,000 in the Treasury every year over and above the demands of the Government, and yet if you sell bonds to accumulate gold the selling of bonds will not cease until every available dollar that can be induced to be put into bonds is put in—dollars that are taken from what ought to be the circulation of the country and what ought to be invested in the active business of the country.

Mr. President, every public debt is a mortgage upon all the industries of the country. It is more than that; it is a mortgage upon every man living within the country which incurs the debt. We might submit to great mortgages in time of war, in time of distress, that would come from attacks upon our honor, but in time of peace to maintain a system that I believe the best sentiment of the world will agree with me can not be maintained in Christendom, I say is a crying shame. No man on my side of the Chamber and no man on the other side of the Chamber who believes in the gold standard has opened his mouth against a system that has surely enslaved the labor and the industries and the enterprise and the progress of this country as the black slavery enslaved the black man of the South. We alone who have a scheme that we believe is safe are the men who protest against it. We do not believe in this infernal gold scheme, and we do not believe that prosperity can come from it. We know it has not. We know that there never has been such trouble in financial affairs as exists to-day, notwithstanding the promises that you have made to us year after year that if we would adhere to this gold standard prosperity would ultimately come. I am one of those who would strain every nerve and would incur any amount of debt that was necessary to maintain the credit and honor of the people of the United States, but I am not one of those who, to maintain a gold standard that in my judgment is cursing the country, would run in debt.

Mr. President, when are we going to stop? Where are we going to quit? How are we going to pay the debt? We will increase the revenue, I trust, although I have no idea that that will be done now, nor do I believe there is any immediate haste to do it. I believe if we are to continue to sell the bonds it is absolutely criminal for us to add another dollar to the import duties now existing in this country. You have no right to take more money out of the people's pockets and put it into the Treasury to be there locked up if you are still to sell bonds to maintain the gold standard. That is the money that you ought to use, because there will be less suffering and less distress if you put it in circulation, although in the end it may be very sad for us.

The President of the United States has asserted that no more revenue is needed, and if we should vote here that more was needed it would probably be the first time in the history of our country when we had forced upon the Administration more money than it demandcd and put burdens upon the people which the authorities charged with the administration of the financial affairs declare is not necessary. I do not say but that the revenue bill may pass the Senate; but whatever it may do, Mr. President, it is to afford us no relief. If it should be signed by the President it affords no relief; the sale of bonds still continues, because it is the policy of the men who have got the money in this country to compel the sale of bonds. The President of the United States said a year ago, and so did his Secretary of the Treasury, that in December $32,000,000 of gold went out of the Treasury, and that $45,000,000 more went out the next month, and but a small portion of it, comparatively, went abroad. And then they argue from that that it is distrust of the currency that took the gold out.

Mr. President, the gold was taken out for the purpose of compelling, what it subsequently did compel, an issue of $62,000,000 of bonds. I am not speaking of the character of that issue except to say that the $62,000,000 of bonds bear to the holders 3¾ per cent. There is no other business in this country to be compared with the purchase of bonds unless it is the mining of gold. You have reached a point when it is not profitable to invest money in commercial enterprises, in industrial pursuits. There is no money for that, but there is abundance of money to buy bonds. We see a great banker in a neighboring city go to work and in a few days accumulate $200,000,000 of gold. Why? To buy securities, the very best securities in the world, at prices lower than the securities of the Australian colonies are selling in the city of London. Australian bonds are selling at from 5 to 10 per cent above the sale made in 1895 to the syndicate in New York of the bonds of the greatest nation in the world. I do not wonder that they want to accumulate their gold to buy these $200,000,000 of bonds. If that $200,000,000 could be put into industrial pursuits and give labor an opportunity it would be infinitely better, to say nothing of the wickedness of putting our funds in bonds and putting a debt upon the unborn as well as those now living. We ought to pursue a policy which would bring into active life and use the money of the country, and not allow it to be used simply for the purpose of purchasing Government bonds and holding them free from all the obligations which ought to rest upon the holder of money and wealth in every community in the world.

Mr. President, there are not more than two ways in which we can stop gold going abroad. One is, we might pay our debts, if we were able. If we could pay our debts, gold would not go. Possibly we might do it in another way, by making the prices of articles we use in this country so low that no European country would sell us anything. If we could put the price of all imports so low that European manufacturers would find no profit in sending articles here and we could keep on exporting our products, we might ultimately, probably, pay our debts, but when you put the prices of foreign goods low you put your own prices low, and you bring your own people down to a condition that is not remunerative and supporting.

I am one of those who believe that you can not maintain in this country freedom, and independence, and republicanism unless you do it by giving to the laboring people of the country remunerative wages. A great writer on political economy said, "Comfort is essential to morality in any community." If you make your people uncomfortable you make them vicious. Gaunt poverty and dire distress are not the incentives to patriotism.

Our interests are not with the men who own the money, not with the men who own the bank capital, not with the men who have $600,000,000 of money in bank stock. The product of the farmers of this country, who produce chickens and turkeys and geese and eggs, is every year equal to the entire bank capital. What is the bank capital of this country worth? If it should be sunk to-morrow we should be better off. I do not mean to say that we should be better off in sinking it; I mean that we should be better off than to follow the present system to its logical results. I do not want to make any objection to banks. I have no objection to banks of deposit and discount, but I am opposed to banks of issue.

I called attention a few moments ago to prices. The Secretary of the Treasury in his last report talks about the beneficent results of the last bond issue. Having spoken of bonds, he says:

> The beneficial effects of this transaction were felt immediately, not only in this country, but in every other having commercial or financial relations with our people. Confidence in our securities as safe and profitable investments was at once restored to such an extent that they ceased to be returned to our market for sale, and a very considerable demand for them was created abroad—

That seems to be now the idea, that it means prosperity; that whenever you can borrow money, whenever you can sell your securities in Europe, not national, but industrial securities, then you are getting rich—> but the most gratifying evidences of improvement in our condition were afforded by the prompt revival of business among our own people, the increased activity and extension of our domestic, industrial, and commercial operations, the rise in the prices of our principal agricultural products, and the general feeling of relief and security which became apparent in every part of the country. These encouraging indications of increasing prosperity still continue—> and it is reasonably certain that if our progress is not checked by a repetition of large demands upon our resources, or by a failure to meet the just expectations of the people in respect to the reformation of our fiscal system, we are entering upon an era of material growth and development not surpassed in our history.

That was the 19th of December—

Mr. President, I wish that were true. I would rather see prosperity than adversity. With all due deference to the Secretary of the Treasury, that is a misstatement of facts. Throughout the world prices have steadily fallen this year, and prices are lower to-day than they were a year ago in every market of the earth. The English statistical papers show that. There was a little rise last summer for two or three months, but that rise has been lost in the last two months, and I have before me the financial statement from the English Economist that we have not only lost that rise, but gone several points below.

Mr. President, we owe a great debt abroad. I do not know how much. Nobody else does. I know we are not sending gold to Europe for the pleasure of sending it; I know that if it goes there is goes there to pay a debt of some kind. So do you; so does everybody else. I know that the exports from this country have been very large. I know that the exports have increased. Of course they fell off after the panic of last year about $75,000,000; but I am speaking now of a long line going back twenty years. There has been a gradual increase from 1873 up to the present time of American products. An English financial paper, the Statist, in an article last summer, discussing the question whether England had been benefited or injured by the fall in the gold price of silver, made this statement, which I submit to the exporting people of the United States, the men who produce and who sell, that if European prices had been maintained at the high price rate of 1873 and the bulk of American products had not been increased, there would not have been a dollar of indebtedness from this country to Europe. A system which has compelled us to send increasing products every year to Europe, and that, too, at prices which have prevented us from materially reducing our debt to Europe, is a system which ought to be resisted, and it will be resisted by every patriotic man.

I have before me the last copy of the Statist, in which I find a statement something in the line of the other, to show the great advantage England has gained. The writer shows the fall of prices within the last year and figures out from that that Great Britain has made large sums and has purchased at a price very much below what she paid last year. Then he says if prices had been the same last year we should have had to pay so much more. I want to read a little of that. I now read from the Statist of January 11, 1896, the last number which came to me. I have taken these financial papers, the Statist and the London Economist and French Economist, for the purpose of keeping in touch with what is going on in those countries as well as our own. The article I shall read is headed "Our foreign trade; the effect of low prices." I shall not read it all, but I shall add the whole of it to my remarks as an appendix; I wish now to call attention to some of the statements in the article:

> Our foreign trade in 1895 has been the most profitable in the history of the country, and very much more profitable than it was in 1890, when superficially it appeared to be extremely prosperous. Reckoned by its cash value, our foreign trade has been slightly better in 1895 than in 1894, and much worse than in 1890. In 1890 our imports amounted to £420,692,000, in 1894 they were £408,345,000, and in 1895 they have been £416,618,000. That is to say, our imports have been £8,342,000 greater in 1895 than in 1894, and £4,000,000 smaller than in 1890. As regards the cash value of our exports, an increase of £10,000,000 has occurred in 1895 compared with 1894, and a decline of as much as £37,400,000 compared with 1890, exports in 1890 having been valued at £263,530,000, in 1894 at £216,194,000, and in 1895 at £226,169,000.

I omit some of the article, and come to what the editor is trying to show:

> The cash value of our foreign trade is, however, no guide to its real value or its profitableness. The United Kingdom is a consuming country, and it imports the greater portion of its food supplies, as well as nearly the whole of its raw materials for textile manufactures. These food stuffs and raw materials are sent here in payment for purchases of British manufactured goods, for interest and profits upon capital due to Great Britain from producing nations, and for transport and other services rendered. Consequently, the lower the prices for food stuffs and raw materials the greater will be the quantity required to be sent to this country to meet interest and other obligations and to pay for other services rendered. Further, should prices of British manufactured goods not fall to an extent corresponding to the fall in prices of foreign and colonial produce, the profit on the sale of British goods to foreign countries and our colonies would be enhanced.

The conditions of 1895 compared with both 1894 and 1890 have been that prices of foreign and colonial produce have been extremely low, and that consequently a great deal more produce has had to be sent to this country in order to meet interest and other obligations. Further prices of British manufactures exported have not fallen to an extent corresponding to the decline in prices of foreign and colonial produce imported, and consequently the cash proceeds of our exports have purchased a relatively larger quantity of British and foreign produce.

A year ago we drew attention to the effect on our trade of the enormous fall in prices, and showed that whereas in 1894 our imports were valued at £408,500,000, we had for this sum been able to purchase foreign and colonial produce which, had we had to pay the prices of 1890, would have cost us £477,500,000. On the other hand, we showed that in 1894 our exports were valued at £216,194,000, whereas at the prices current in 1890 they would have fetched £246,000,000. On balance, therefore, there was a greater profit upon our foreign trade in 1894 than in 1890 of about £39,000,000.

In 1895 this country has been able to purchase foreign and colonial produce even more cheaply than in 1894.

That is in answer to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury as to a rise in prices.

We have calculated what all the chief articles would have cost had we had to pay and had received similar prices in 1895 to those current in 1894. It is impossible to estimate the prices of a great many articles in either year, but, having analyzed the prices of commodities comprising 60 per cent of our total imports and exports, we have estimated the movement of prices of the remaining 40 per cent on the same basis.

It seems the writer has made a careful calculation, and I should say it was on a safe basis.

In 1894 the cash value of our imports was £408,345,000, and in 1895, £416,687,000. Had we paid the same prices in 1895 as in 1894, our imports in 1895 would have cost us about £433,800,000. Hence we have benefited from a further fall in prices of foreign produce to the extent of about £17,000,000. On the other hand, the cash value of our exports in 1894 was £215,824,000, and in 1895 it amounted to £226,169,000. Had we been able to obtain the same price in 1895 as in 1894 the cash value would have been £234,800,000. The fall in prices of our manufactures exported in 1895 compared with 1894 thus entailed a loss of £8,600,000, as against the profit of £17,000,000 from the fall in prices of commodities imported.

I want to call attention to a further statement here.

The benefit to this country, therefore, from the fall in prices of foreign and colonial produce in 1895 compared with 1890 thus amounted to the enormous sum of £90,400,000.

Mr. President, does anybody wonder why Great Britain insists that we shall maintain the gold standard, with these necessary low prices? Low prices are absolutely the logical result of the gold standard.

We have had some talk recently about war with Great Britain. Great Britain will not go to war with us. We are her greatest trading nation. These statistical papers are full of statements made every month that the improvement in British trade is caused by the increased exports which they have been sending to the United States, and because of the low price of the products they buy in such immense quantities from us.

Mr. BACON. What date is that?

Mr. TELLER. The 11th day of January, the last paper which has come to me.

Then the article proceeds to show that notwithstanding manufacturing prices have fallen and they have had to sell their goods all over the world at a less price, yet the net profit to them is £49,000,000—$250,000,000 net on the articles mentioned here.

Then the editor goes on to show what is gained by the low price of cotton. I will quote a portion of that; I do not care to read it all.

In 1895 we purchased 15,688,000 hundredweight of raw cotton, against 16,013,000 hundredweight in 1890, a diminution of 345,000 hundredweight, or 2 per cent, but we paid for our raw cotton supplies £12,327,000 less in 1895 than in 1890. Had we purchased the same quantity in both years the benefit to this country from the fall in price of cotton would have been £11,500,000.

Fifty-six million dollars they made upon the difference between the price of cotton in 1890 and 1895.

Then the writer goes on to show how much the English people have made on the fall in wool, the fall in sugar, and these other articles. I ask leave to append the whole of that article to my remarks. I have read enough to show what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Leave will be granted, in the absence of objection.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not intend to go into the subject of prices to any considerable extent, and I am going to stop. I do not care to-day to take up and discuss in the formal way, which sometimes we have done here, the question of what would be the result of the passage of the amendment which the Committee on Finance have advised in place of the bond bill. I wanted to present to the Senate what it seemed to me from any standpoint we have got to meet. It is most deplorable to go on in the way we are going. Our gold is being exported to Europe, and will continue to be so exported. It will go in spite of us, and every day we seem to be putting ourselves in a worse position than heretofore. If we attempt to maintain the gold standard we must maintain it with the knowledge of what it is going to cost. I want the American people to know what it is going to cost, and if the American people, when they know what it is going to cost, shall be in favor of its maintenance, I as one who recognizes the right of majority rule in this country, shall have to submit; but I do not believe that the American people understand what it costs to maintain the gold standard. I do not believe the American people understand the danger which threatens not only their industrial pursuits, but threatens the very existence of this nation as a free people by the gold standard.

Mr. President, the enslavement of the world in the future will not be by armies and by force, but it will be through the agency of money. It is the most potent and the easiest instrumentality to use. You will have no war unless the great capitalists of the world will consent. The other day, when there was a little flurry here, when the American Senate felt like asserting that under certain circumstances it would vindicate the honor of the nation—I do not care whether there was any occasion for it or not—there was one sentiment from the great financial center of this country, and that was, we can not afford to go to war. Mr. President, we can; but we do not intend to. We wish, however, to be in a position where we can go to war if our honor requires it. We want this country put upon a financial basis which will enable us to cease running in debt in time of peace. We want this country put upon a financial basis that will give to the flagging and languishing industries of the country renewed life. I do not believe you can do it with a revenue bill. I yield to no man in devotion to the doctrine that the Government of the United States is bound, so far as it can, to assist in maintaining the wages of American labor. I would have a tariff duty, if I had my way, just high enough to give to the American manufacturer the markets of his own country, just high enough that if he attempted to impose upon the consumer the profits would be such that the importer could compete with him. That is my doctrine. I know that you can not maintain the price of American labor in this country on that principle now. I know that American labor is threatened with Asiatic prices. I do not care to go into that now. It has been touched upon by several Senators at this session. Have the Senators who insist upon maintaining the gold standard calculated what it is to cost? Have they considered it with reference to what the influence must be upon the industries of this country, not this year, and perhaps not within ten years, but at some time? He who does not look beyond the present hour with reference to these influences is unworthy of a place in the American Senate.

Mr. President, what is going to be the influence not to-day, not to-morrow, but five, ten, twenty years from now? It is my solemn conviction, and I stated it seriously ten years ago, that that would be the result. We are building up in Asiatic countries a competition which can not be met by the American people. You can not put the American citizen upon a plane to compete with the Japanese, the Chinese, or the Indian, and it is inevitable as that the day shall follow the night that this is to come. Ten years ago in the Senate I said that the philosophy of it was that we should build up Asiatic manufactures. It took nearly ten years before that prophecy began to be realized. To-day the manufacturers of Christendom are being threatened by the manufacturers of heathendom; to-day the manufacturers of the United States are in jeopardy and in peril by the manufactures growing up with Asiatic capital in Asiatic countries, where the people can live on a few cents a day, where few of the obligations that are put upon us are put upon them, where the citizenship of those countries carries with it no burden such as citizenship carries with us, and where they can live, as they have been living for thousands of years, in what they call comfort and happiness, in a manner that would send our people to the grave or to revolution.

Mr. President, this is not a fanciful sketch; this is not a theory, nor the statement of an enthusiast. It can be demonstrated beyond question, though I shall not undertake it now, that there is great danger that the manufactures of Europe and the manufactures of the United States will be transplanted to Asiatic lands; and when once transported, nothing can take them away. Those people are cunning and skillful, and patient and enduring, and unaccustomed to the civilization that we rejoice in; they will continue to become competitors to a degree which will absolutely destroy American and European laborers. Yet the men who profess here the greatest interest in our industries, the men who profess the greatest interest in labor, are absolutely silent when this great question confronts the American people, and not one of them has ever been heard any more than they have been heard in defense of this bill. Up to this hour nobody has been heard in defense of the pending bill or in defense of the system which I have been condemning at this session, and I predict that nobody will.

At some other stage I shall take up this question with reference to its influence upon American and European industries, but it should not be necessary for me to do so. The literature of the country is full of it, the English and other European consuls in other countries have given the facts that ought to be convincing to you, that if the gold standard is desirable, it is not sufficiently desirable to have it maintained at the great cost at which it is being maintained.

APPENDIX.

OUR FOREIGN TRADE—THE EFFECT OF LOW PRICES.

Our foreign trade in 1895 has been the most profitable in the history of the country, and very much more profitable than it was in 1890, when superficially it appeared to be extremely prosperous. Reckoned by its cash value, our foreign trade has been slightly better in 1895 than in 1894, and much worse than in 1890. In 1890 our imports amounted to £420,692,000. In 1894 they were £408,345,000, and in 1895 they have been £416,618,000. That is to say, our imports have been £8,342,000 greater in 1895 than in 1894, and £4,000,000 smaller than in 1890. As regards the cash value of our exports, an increase of £10,000,000 has occurred in 1895 compared with 1894, and a decline of as much as £37,400,000 compared with 1890, exports in 1890 having been valued at £263,530,000, in 1894 at £216,194,000, and in 1895 at £226,169,000.

The course of our foreign trade as reflected in the cash value of our imports and exports will be seen from the following contrast of our imports, exports, reexports, and total foreign trade in 1895 with those of the ten previous years:

Total trade of Great Britain, 1885 to 1895.

Year.	Imports.	Exports.	Reexports.	Total.
1895	£416,688,000	£226,169,000	£59,971,000	£702,828,000
1894	408,344,000	215,824,000	57,961,000	682,129,000
1893	405,068,000	218,496,000	58,935,000	682,499,000
1892	423,793,000	227,077,000	64,563,000	715,433,000
1891	435,441,000	247,235,000	61,878,000	744,555,000
1890	420,692,000	263,530,000	64,721,000	748,944,000
1889	427,637,000	248,935,000	66,658,000	743,230,000
1888	387,636,000	234,535,000	64,042,000	686,213,000
1887	362,227,000	221,914,000	59,349,000	643,490,000
1886	349,863,000	212,725,000	56,234,000	618,823,000

The cash value of our foreign trade is, however, no guide to its real value or its profitableness. The United Kingdom is a consuming country, and it imports the greater portion of its food supplies, as well as nearly the whole of its raw materials for textile manufactures. These food stuffs and raw materials are sent here in payment for purchases of British manufactured goods, for interest and profits upon capital due to Great Britain from producing nations, and for transport and other services rendered. Consequently, the lower the prices for food stuffs and raw materials the greater will be the quantity required to be sent to this country to meet interest and other obligations and to pay for other services rendered. Further, should prices of British manufactured goods not fall to an extent corresponding to the fall in prices of foreign and colonial produce, the profit on the sale of British goods to foreign countries and our colonies would be enhanced.

The conditions of 1895, compared with both 1894 and 1890, have been that prices of foreign and colonial produce have been extremely low, and that, consequently, a great deal more produce has had to be sent to this country in order to meet interest and other obligations. Further, prices of British manufactures exported have not fallen to an extent corresponding to the decline in prices of foreign and colonial produce imported, and consequently the cash proceeds of our exports have purchased a relatively larger quantity of British and foreign produce.

A year ago we drew attention to the effect on our trade of the enormous fall in prices, and showed that whereas in 1894 our imports were valued at £408,500,000, we had for this sum been able to purchase foreign and colonial produce which, had we had to pay the prices of 1890, would have cost us £477,500,000. On the other hand, we showed that in 1894 our exports were valued at £216,194,000, whereas at the prices current in 1890 they would have fetched £246,000,000. On balance, therefore, there was a greater profit upon our foreign trade in 1894 than in 1890 of about £39,000,000.

In 1895 this country has been able to purchase foreign and colonial produce even more cheaply than in 1894.

We have calculated what all the chief articles would have cost had we had to pay and had received similar prices in 1895 to those current in 1894. It is impossible to estimate the prices of a great many articles in either year, but, having analyzed the prices of commodities comprising 60 per cent of our total imports and exports, we have estimated the movement of prices of the remaining 40 per cent on the same basis.

In 1894 the cash value of our imports was £408,345,000, and in 1895 £416,687,000. Had we paid the same prices in 1895 as in 1894, our imports in 1895 would have cost us about £433,800,000. Hence we have benefited from a further fall in prices of foreign produce to the extent of about £17,000,000. On the other hand, the cash value of our exports in 1894 was £215,824,000, and in 1895 it amounted to £226,169,000. Had we been able to obtain the same price in 1895 as in 1894, the cash value would have been £234,800,000. The fall in prices of our manufactures exported in 1895 compared with 1894 thus entailed a loss of $8,600,000, as against the profit of £17,000,000 from the fall in prices of commodities imported. There has thus been a further profit in 1895 compared with 1894 of some £8,500,000.

The cash value of our imports in 1895 was £416,687,000, but at the 1890 level of prices the value would have been no less than £507,100,000. The benefit to this country, therefore, from the fall in prices of foreign and colonial produce in 1895 compared with 1890, thus amounted to the enormous sum of £90,400,000. On the other hand, our exports in 1895 were of the cash value of only £226,169,000, whereas at the prices of 1890 the value would have been £267,600,000, thus entailing a loss of £41,500,000, due to the fall in prices. On balance, therefore, the fall in prices in 1895 compared with 1890 gave a profit to this country amounting to about £49,000,000.

We compare below the actual cash value of our imports in 1895 wth what the value would have been at the prices current in 1894 and 1890:

Value of imports, 1895.

At prices of 1895	£416,687,000
At prices of 1894	433,851,000
At prices of 1890	507,096,000

Below we give the value of our exports in 1895 compared with what the value would have been at prices current in 1894 and 1890:

Value of exports, 1895.

At prices of 1895	£226,169,000
At prices of 1894	234,802,000
At prices of 1890	267,638,000

In 1895 we purchased 15,688,000 hundredweight of raw cotton, against 16,013,000 hundredweight in 1890, a diminution of 345,000 hundredweight or 2 per cent; but we paid for our raw cotton supplies £12,327,000 less in 1895 than in 1890. Had we purchased the same quantity in both years the benefit to this country from the fall in price of cotton would have been £11,500,000. In 1895 we purchased 100,118,000 hundredweight of wheat and flour, as against 76,247,000 hundredweight in 1890, an increase of 23,871,000, or 31 per cent, while we have actually paid about £2,451,000 less in 1895 than in 1890, the value of our wheat and flour imports in 1895 having been £30,207,000, against £32,651,000 in 1890. In other words, at the 1890 level of prices we should have paid £42,880,000 for our wheat and flour supplies in 1895, whereas we have actually paid only £30,207,000, a benefit from the lower price of no less than £12,600,000. Our imports of wool for 1895 exceeded those of 1890 by 142,000,000 pounds, or 22 per cent; but in 1895 we actually paid £830,000 less than we did in 1890—that is to say, we have paid £26,321,000 for wool in 1895 which at the 1890 level of prices would have cost us £33,100,000, a benefit of about £6,800,000. In 1895 we imported 31,157,000 hundredweight of sugar, as against 25,693,000 hundredweight in 1890, an increase of 5,464,000, or 21 per cent, and with this enormous increase in quantity we have actually paid £390,000 less in cash, the cash value of our sugar imports in 1895 having been £17,685,000, as against £18,075,000 in 1890. At the 1890 level of prices we should have paid for sugar imported in 1895, £21,870,000, as against the actual cost of £17,685,000, a benefit from the fall in price of over £4,000,000.

Below we contrast the values of our principal imports in 1895 with those of 1894, and with their estimated value in 1895, had prices maintained the level of the average in 1894:

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into the debate upon this question, because it seems to me, and I believe it seems to the great body of Senators on this side of the Chamber, that we are now discussing a moot question, which ought not to have been thrust into the consideration of the measure that we are really acting upon. I have no doubt that there is a majority of the Senate in favor of the free coinage of silver. They no doubt represent the opinions of their constituents, and they honestly support that view. The country has, however, for the last four or five years been gradually settling down to the opinion that the free coinage of silver would bring us to the single silver standard, which would separate us from all the great Christian and civilized nations of the world.

This question has been talked of very much among the people, and latterly, especially, the people of State after State have settled down into the conviction that we ought to maintain the present bimetallic system of money—that is, to maintain the standard of gold and to maintain silver in circulation in the largest quantity possible for use by the people. It so happens that under the present system we use more silver, either in the form of circulating silver money or in the form of silver certificates representing silver actually in the Treasury, than has ever been heretofore used in the United States, and we on this side of the Chamber believe that that is the better plan, at least for the present, and that until the market value of silver shall approach its coinage value that is the true policy to be adopted. Therefore I do not think there is any disposition on this side of the Chamber to discuss that question, which has been discussed often and well.

What we do complain of, and what we think is not exactly right in the Senate of the United States, is that this proposition, which everybody knows can not pass this Congress, is thrust in the way of measures which the executive department says are absolutely necessary to carry on the Government. We say, therefore, that the thrusting of this proposition into this debate for the relief of the Treasury is not a wise measure of legislation. It is perfectly well known to every Senator here that if the amendment for the free coinage of silver should be adopted it would have to be sent to the House of Representatives, and it is absolutely certain that that House would reject it, and thus the measures of relief which have been recommended by the President of the United States and by the executive authorities will fail, unless those who favor the amendment should finally, after this long debate, recede from their views and allow the measures to which I have referred to pass.

What are those measures? They are not such as I would advocate. I would not propose such measures if the conditions were not precisely as they are; but we became convinced that under the present revenue law there was a deficiency in the revenue. One of two things must inevitably occur, we must either supply more revenue or we must cut off great branches of public expenditure which Congress has determined are necessary and proper, and for which Congress has made appropriations.

The House of Representatives, composed of more than three-fourths of members of the Republican party, opposed to this Administration, yet, desiring to do what was best for the country at large, said: "We will at once give immediate relief to the executive authorities; we will provide means and measures by which they can raise money to meet current expenses while passing along, and, besides that, create additional revenue by a simple law"—not such a law as I would frame or desire to have passed, but a law that would in the shortest time produce forty or fifty million dollars additional revenue without increasing the public debt. We all feel the real difficulty, the danger that threatens our financial operations, is the want of revenue. We are substantially in the same condition as a private citizen who expends more than he earns. As a matter of course, he will meet difficulties and probably become bankrupt. The United States is not a bankrupt, and can not be. We have ample sources of revenue. Why, therefore, should we not confine ourselves to those two measures—not framed by Republicans according to Republican ideas and policy, but framed to meet the exigency caused by the condition of affairs by, as I think, faulty Democratic legislation?

It seems to me that this debate ought not to be prolonged so as to interfere with all the great business of this country. There are many important measures on the Calendar, far more important than this, because they are measures that will be adopted, and they are measures necessary to carry on the Government, and consequently they will be acted upon by both Houses in a friendly way, while this is a mere moot debate, a debate upon an old subject which has been thrashed out over and over again—a debate upon a subject upon which every Senator has absolutely made up his mind. Why, then, continue this debate? If Senators desire to make speeches, I shall be very glad to hear them; and at any time, even if other measures are pending, according to the courtesy of the Senate, an opportunity will be afforded them.

But what we object to is that this measure, which every Senator here knows can not become the law of the land, stands in the way of measures which are deemed by the Administration to be absolutely necessary to carry on the Government, which we say is not only faulty legislation, but is obstructing legislation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Executive Administration wants to have passed the revenue bill which is now pending in the Finance Committee?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it is not for the President of the United States to say what revenue shall be furnished for the support of this Government. It has been the established policy of the Government from the days of Washington to this time that revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives, which directly represents the people. The members of that body come from every district in the country, and their opinion as to what taxes should be levied upon the people is practically that which should govern.

In England the House of Commons would not allow the House of Lords to cross a "t" or dot an "i" on a revenue measure, on the ground that the House of Commons must legislate to impose the necessary taxation to meet the obligations of the Government. We have a broader power, and to my knowledge we have grossly abused that power on several different occasions. We have on some occasions trenched upon the power of the House of Representatives. We, of course, under the Constitution of the United States, have the power to amend revenue bills, but the House of Lords has not that power. We have it, and generally exercise it to an undue extent.

But now, when a measure comes to us, authorizing the Government to borrow money directly from the people by the issuance of small bonds, it is arrested by this process, which everybody knows can not become effective in the shape of law; and when the other measure comes to us, adding to the customs duty and producing some $40,000,000 of revenue, it is not for the President to say whether it is the best form of taxation. It is the best form as the House of Representatives thinks; it is the best form as the Senate thinks; and therefore that bill was reported, I think, almost on the unanimous vote of the Committee on Finance as a measure not of wisdom, not such a one as we of the Republican party would pass if we were framing a bill for increased revenue, not such a one as we would otherwise favor, but such a one as would quickly, certainly, and surely furnish the revenue necessary for the support of the Government.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator has alluded to the fact, as he states it, that this bill is occupying the time of the Senate unduly and to the detriment of other measures, especially a revenue measure to supply the deficient revenues of the Government. I ask him where that revenue measure is? Is it before the Senate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer the Senator from Delaware to the Senator from Arkansas on his right.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That measure is in the hands of the Republican Finance Committee, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. I beg pardon. The Committee on Finance is now practically a Democratic committee, and Democratic Senators know it. They can at any moment, or any member on the other side of the Chamber belonging to the Committee on Finance, by his assent, can secure at once a report on that bill. We can not cheat each other.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. We are very glad to find that some Republican member of the Finance Committee has come to our side, but I am not advised as yet as to who he is. The Republicans organized the committee only a short time ago, and we have always understood that they had a majority.

Mr. SHERMAN. In that you are very much mistaken. Let us not misunderstand each other. Any one of the six Democratic members of that committee may authorize a report of the tariff bill at any moment, and could have done so at any time within the last two weeks. It is true that one of the members of the committee who classes himself as belonging to the——

Mr. PLATT. The Populists.

Mr. SHERMAN. He would hardly call himself a Populist; but, at any rate, has separated himself for the time being from the Republican party. He chooses not to allow that bill to be reported unless some additional provisions shall be added to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I think I ought to say that the Senator referred to was not present at the meeting of the committee when the bill was before the committee and has not been since.

Mr. SHERMAN. He was not present. But any member of the committee on the other side of the Chamber—and I emphasize that statement—can by a single "yes" within five minutes get that bill reported to the Senate, and then we shall have a measure before us for the relief of this Administration.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator complains that this bill is being delayed. Does the Senator regard this bill as a system of relief of the present condition of the country?

Mr. SHERMAN. Which bill?

Mr. TELLER. The bond bill. Suppose we do not put a free-coinage amendment on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the Senator frankly. I think that bill is a great measure of relief, and for this reason: Under the present law, or under the practice which has sprung up under the law, we have issued 4 per cent bonds and sold them, I think, on terms that were very harsh to the Government. I think we ought to have sold those bonds at a much higher rate. Therefore, in order to avoid the loss of selling 4 per cent bonds at 105 or 106, or whatever it may be, we should provide for a 3 per cent bond, which I know would be cheerfully and rapidly taken by the people of the United States, and give all the relief that is necessary to meet current deficiencies—for that is what the bonds are intended for—and it could be passed at once.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator tell us how long we are to continue to sell bonds to maintain the gold reserve?

Mr. SHERMAN. We will sell enough to cover actual deficiencies as they occur, actual deficiencies made by this Administration, and then provide additional revenue for the future; but I suppose the $40,000,000 additional revenue provided by the tariff bill, as it is called, will be sufficient; if not, we can increase it. If it is thought that that will not raise a sufficient amount of revenue, any Senator, when the bill is pending, may propose to put on additional duties. In the meantime the Republican party here stands ready to do its duty to maintain the credit of the Government of the United States and to pay off past deficiencies instead of running in debt.

My friend from Colorado was speaking a while ago about the increase of the public debt. Why did he not say frankly that that increase was because of the deficient revenue?

Mr. TELLER. I do not think so.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the cause?

Mr. TELLER. You have not had $262,000,000 deficiency yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. One hundred and sixty-two million dollars, I think.

Mr. TELLER. You have $262,000,000 practically out; that is, you will have it out on the 5th of February.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the cause of that deficiency? Whence comes it?

Mr. TELLER. I have not been talking about the deficiency. You are not selling bonds to meet deficiencies. The deficiency exists. You are selling bonds to accumulate gold, and you can not sell them for anything else under the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there was no deficiency there would be no demand for gold. For fourteen years that $100,000,000 of gold stood there in the Treasury, a standard of credit, and no one approached it or diminished it. But the moment the deficiencies occur, then they say they sell the bonds to keep the gold reserve good; but it is to meet deficiencies, because to meet the deficiencies they take the gold.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him if in his opinion there is any authority under the law to sell bonds for any purpose except to get gold to redeem greenbacks?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Then, in your opinion, the law is deliberately violated in each sale of these bonds, as you say they have been sold for the purpose of raising money to defray expenses?

Mr. SHERMAN. That has already been explained over and over again.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I simply wanted to have the Senator make the statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. That money in the Treasury is superadded to the money put there for the redemption of United States notes. There was no segregation of these two sums; they were put in a mass, and the present Administration, since it came into being, has taken the money pledged to redeem United States notes, and has thus created a fright about gold, and the withdrawal of gold, and the shipment of gold abroad. Not only that, but the banks of the United States—and I say it is to their discredit—have withdrawn for United States notes about $50,000,000, which is now held as a part of their reserve.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Did the deficiency in the Treasury have anything to do with that?

Mr. SHERMAN. The deficiency in the Treasury was primarily, because it created this fear. It was the Government that first drained this fund for the maintenance of specie payments. Each bank, governed by its own interest, naturally saw that if the Government was using this fund very soon there would be no funds to be paid, and therefore the banks withdrew gold and put it in their reserve, which was required to be kept up in lawful money. It should be in United States notes. Always before the present Administration the banks kept up their reserve in United States notes and Treasury notes, but when they saw the Government taking this fund reserved for another purpose, because it had not been segregated in the general fund in the Treasury, they, as a matter of course, became alarmed, they became surprised, and they drew gold also.

As I have expressed before (and I did not intend to say so much as I have said), in my opinion all that is necessary is to pass these two bills. Therefore I wish it distinctly understood, so far as my voice can carry what I utter at this moment, that the whole trouble and fear in the Senate of the United States grows out of the desire of debating an old, worn issue, the free coinage of silver, instead of applying the remedy which the President asks for, which a Republican House has cheerfully granted, and which we on this side of the Chamber are ready at any moment to pass.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I did not expect when I was on the floor to have my statement that the Republican members of this body who believe in the gold standard have no other scheme but to sell bonds indefinitely verified quite so soon as I have. I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that that is all we need now to clear the atmosphere.

Mr. SHERMAN. To meet the deficiency. I do not propose to continue that. I have no doubt when the Republican Administration comes into power my friend and I will join together in providing for all the money necessary.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator, I think, is somewhat mistaken in his suggestion that the President has asked for anything of this character, to begin with. The President of the United States has asked for a gold bond, and he has asked for the gold bond not because he did not have the power to issue bonds, but because he does not have the power to issue gold bonds. He has the power under the act of 1875, he says, and the Senator agrees with him, to issue any amount of bonds that may be necessary to maintain the gold reserve, and as fast as the Treasury is emptied by the demand on the Treasury of the exporters of gold, it is to be filled up. I stated to-day that there was no end to that which anybody could see, and it seemed to me that our side of the House who believe in gold had neither the wit nor the wisdom to propose, or else they were afraid, or something else—at least they did not propose any system except to continue to sell bonds ad infinitum.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Colorado is clearly mistaken, because I do say that the bond bill was simply to provide for past deficiencies—to meet and square the accounts up to the time when the new bill, the tariff bill, can furnish revenue to support the Government, and that measure is to be carried on for only two years, when we hope a different state of things will occur.

Mr. TELLER. Say for three years at least the Government has had no gold in its collection. I think about three years ago the gold payments fell off. Since that time we have had silver certificates and Treasury notes mainly, with now and then a sprinkling of greenbacks. How is the Government to get the gold that the Senator says is essential to maintain its reserve if it does not sell bonds, or unless it makes its collections in gold? Can the Senator tell us how? Does he expect the Government to go into the market with greenbacks and buy gold as a commodity?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already said in the remarks I made a few days ago that the very moment it is sure to the business men of this country that the gold will not be depleted and exhausted and thus leave our paper money unprotected from redemption, the moment that the conditions cease to exist, the demand for gold will cease to exist.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator understand that the failure to pay gold by way of duties on imports arises from any lack of revenue; or what is the cause?

Mr. SHERMAN. No. For fourteen years the customs duties were paid by United States notes entirely, and yet the gold was carried to the Treasury and exchanged for United States notes. The gold constantly increased year by year, for the reason that everyone who desired to use money preferred the notes to the gold, and therefore the gold was carried to the Treasury and the notes were in circulation.

Mr. TELLER. Just as long as the balance of trade was in our favor to the extent that we would cover what we had naturally to send abroad the gold would remain in this country. The moment that the balance of trade is against us we must pay it in gold. In the latter part of the season of 1890 the gold which had been coming into the Treasury for duties on imports at the rate of about 90 per cent by the way of gold certificates began to fall off, and the Treasury notes and greenbacks and other paper of that character began to take its place. So, by the following January, when there was no deficiency whatever and very few at least supposed that there would be a deficiency, gold payments had practically ceased at the collection office.

Something else, Mr. President, intervened. It was not a failure of revenue. I do not know whether it was a surplus of paper money, as some people contend, or what it was, but it is certain that before there was any lack of revenue the Government was out of gold. The Government has been out of gold on several occasions. I remember that in July, 1885, the bankers in New York met and held a conference and signed a paper and sent it to the Treasury Department, in which they said it was apparent to them that we would in a very short time be unable to make gold payments. We had an abundance of revenue then. Thereupon they loaned to the Government of the United States a certain amount of gold. We all recollect that occurrence. We have been threatened with this before.

The lack of gold in the Treasury is not, in my judgment, the result of a lack of revenue. It is because there is an increased demand in Europe for the gold to pay our debts. That may be owing to two or three causes. One is, granting now that this is the scheme of the Administration, that it is distrust. That may be the cause. It may be that the distrust has occasioned the sending here of our securities and selling them. It does not make any difference what the revenue is, if that distrust exists our securities will come here. It does not make any difference what the revenues are, if the balance of trade is against us we have got to send the gold abroad.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me a question?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume the Senator is as well aware as I am that prior to the 4th of March, 1893, the incoming of the present Administration into power, at no time was the uncovered gold in the Treasury less than $100,000,000.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; I am quite well aware of that fact.

Mr. ALDRICH. There were fluctuations up and down, it is true, but the uncovered gold never fell below $100,000,000, and the gold actually in the Treasury was always greatly in excess of that sum.

Mr. TELLER. That is a fact which everybody understands. We did not break into the reserve of $100,000,000 until after the present Administration came into power. To be fair, I am bound to say that I have not the slightest doubt but that we should have broken into it if Mr. Harrison had been reelected. It was not the Democratic party that came into power that made it, it was the condition of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was Democratic law.

Mr. TELLER. It was not a Democratic law. There was not any law and had not been any law. That was long after, and it may have accelerated the thing and helped it; I have no doubt it did. But certain people were alarmed, and yet when I realize that the Democratic candidate had nearly 400,000 more votes than our candidate had, I can not see why the American people should be disturbed at what they themselves had done. The Republicans might have been somewhat disturbed. But the gold began to run down, and the demand for it in Europe was increased. As our exports fell off the demand for gold to take their place increased, and that is what is the trouble now, and it will continue for all time until we pay our debts. We might just as well make up our minds that we have got to furnish the gold, and in my judgment the Treasury Department can not maintain that reserve by the sale of bonds, unless they continue to sell year after year just as they are selling now.

If the Senator will get up here and say that in his judgment the maintenance of the gold standard and the maintenance of $100,000,000 in the reserve is compensation for what we suffer in the issuing of from two to three hundred million dollars a year of bonds, that will be all right; we shall know where to meet it. What I complain of is that on this side of the Chamber the majority of the Republicans are absolutely without a policy. You have not got any, you have not dared to have any, and you will not have one now. You dare not redeem the greenbacks. That you know would afford you relief. You dare not go before the public in 1896 with your candidate on that kind of a platform. You know where you would land. You would be landed where the Democrats were landed at the last election and where they expect to be landed now if we do not make some such blunder as that. You are afraid to do that. A majority of the gold men in this Chamber believe it ought to be done. You are in sympathy with the President, in my judgment, on that point, and if you are going to maintain the gold standard, I repeat what I said before, that is the logical and the only way out of it, unless you are willing to increase the public debt just as long as men will buy bonds at 3 per cent or 5 per cent or any other rate per cent.

I do not care, as I said, to debate the silver question. I know this bill is not going to become a law. I do not know it any more certainly than you know that your revenue bill is not going to become a law. If we all vote for that bill, and two or three Populists vote for it, and it passes the Senate, you know it is not to become a law. It was not introduced for the purpose of becoming a law. If it had been supposed it would become a law, it would have been a different bill from what it is. It was brought in for the purpose of making political capital and keeping the question before the public. I do not say that I shall not vote for it. I am a protectionist, and I believe we need more protection and more revenue, but I do not mean that the Senator shall get up here and lecture me because I am talking about a bill which he says we can not pass with this measure on it. He knows that the other bill will not pass, and he ought to know that this bond bill, sheared of the free-coinage provision, will not pass this body.

Mr. PLATT. Let us try it.

Mr. TELLER. We will try it when the time comes, but as this is a little play of politics, we will play it on our side, too, just as well. We will take occasion to see what your policy is. We will take occasion now to see when the Republican party comes into power what it is going to do. So far we who believe that something ought to be done to bring this country out of its condition have got no encouragement whatever except that you are to continue to sell bonds indefinitely until you have piled up a great debt against the people of the United States. You know and I know that just as long as those men in New York can buy these bonds at the prices at which they bought the last issue they can not put their money in anything that is equal to it. You know that is what we are going to do, to keep on selling bonds. That may be a Republican doctrine, but I do not believe it. Whenever the Republican party shall become the party of increasing our indebtedness in time of peace, the people will withdraw from it that confidence which they have shown in it in years past.

I do not care what the name may be or what it may have done, the people of the United States are now demanding of us some action that will relieve the country, not a temporary thing, not the issuing of bonds to-day and more to-morrow, and then wonder what we are going to do at the end, but they ask for some system. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury have offered us one. We reject it. Now, then, ought we not to offer something? We offer free coinage. You offer nothing.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I think that this discussion lacks just one additional item to complete it for the day. In January, 1893, as I remember, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] proposed an amendment to an appropriation bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, I think, some $50,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds in order to avoid what, in the Senator's judgment, was a possible danger to the reserve fund. I should like to inquire of the Senator now whether his proposition to amend in the manner I have designated was because there was a deficiency in the revenue?

Mr. SHERMAN. There had been no deficiency in the revenue up to that time; but I believe the amount of the surplus the year before was only about $9,000,000. The present Secretary of the Treasury was then a member of the Senate, and on the question of giving the incoming Administration an opportunity to meet any possible deficiency that might arise such a proposition was introduced and passed this body nem. con. without objection. It was sent to the House of Representatives and there disagreed to, and in conference it was dropped out. The Secretary had probably consulted his then superiors, and it was dropped out.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether that statement is entirely complete? Was there not an existing law, the statute of 1875, the resumption act, which had been referred to in the statute of 1890, which gave the power already to issue 4 per cent bonds? Was the statute proposed in 1893 anything more than an authority to use a power already existing on terms much more favorable to the Government?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, the proposition submitted by me, agreed to, I believe, in the Committee on Finance unanimously, and which passed the Senate, I think, without objection, simply added to the bonds that were authorized to be sold under the resumption act, the 4, 4½, and 5 per cent bonds, a bond bearing 3 per cent interest, so that the Government might avail itself of the very lowest and best terms possible in borrowing money in case the necessity should arise.

Mr. GRAY. That was, then, practically the measure which has come here from the other House.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was practically that measure.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the statement just made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, I think, is very inaccurate. I think the Senator will remember that this matter was discussed in this body a year and a half ago when we were considering the revenue measure, and we produced here the statement made by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, before a committee of the House of Representatives, in which he admitted that the revenue under the McKinley Act, up to and prior to the election of President Cleveland in 1892, was deficient, and suggested that $50,000,000 additional revenue should be provided to meet the deficiencies in the Treasury, not for the purpose of maintaining the reserve.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no recollection that Secretary Foster asked for the sale of bonds. I am quite sure he did not. I think I would have known if he had. Besides, there was no deficiency. The official records show that there was no deficiency until July 1, 1893, which was some four or five months after the incoming of the present Administration. I think that any recommendations which were made then were made in view of possible future contingencies.

Mr. GORMAN. No; it was a condition that confronted the Secretary of the Treasury at the time. We talked the matter over here frankly, because there was no secret about it. The Secretary of the Treasury had issued an order preparing the bonds that were authorized by the act of 1875 to the extent of $50,000,000, and that order has been produced, and is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GORMAN. It is printed in the RECORD. I can not for the moment lay my hand on it. The Presidential election occurred. The Republican party were to be put out of power on the 4th of March, and understanding perfectly well their responsibility to the country, knowing that this financial panic was impending, like patriotic men they sought us on this side of the Chamber to state frankly the condition. Mr. Foster sought me, as I have before stated to the Senate, telling the condition of the Treasury, that he was short of revenue, and that some remedy must be provided. The result of that conference was the proposition introduced by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who is always ready to come to the relief of the Treasury when it is in distress, and we sought to have $100,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds authorized, placing a provision for that purpose upon the appropriation bill.

Afterwards the Committee on Finance reported in favor of the issue of $50,000,000 of 3 per cent bonds, and the condition that the proceeds of those bonds should be used for no other purpose except to maintain the gold reserve was insisted upon and incorporated in that amendment, and in that form it passed the Senate. That, of course, defeated the main object in view that had been suggested by the Republican Secretary, and it was rejected in another place, not here. In the meantime Secretary Foster went before a committee of the other House. In his statement, which was read in the Senate, he frankly said that $50,000,000 more of revenue was needed. I do not happen to lay my hand on the statement, although I thought I had it here, but I will produce it. The Secretary stated to the committee that he wanted, say, $50,000,000 more of revenue to pay the current expenses of the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no use to dispute about facts which are certified to us. It is certain that until after the 1st of July, 1893, which was four or five months after the present Administration came into power, the revenues were sufficient to meet the expenditures, and there was still $2,000,000 of surplus that year.

As to precisely when the revenues fell off, my own opinion has always been that the change of Administration, which had been determined early in November before Mr. Cleveland came into office, necessarily had a disturbing effect upon the business of the country. A sudden change of Administration always does, more or less, but the deficiency did not occur until July 2, 1893. I have no statement here to show it, but it is a matter of public notoriety that there was $2,000,000 of surplus on the 1st of July for that year.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, nominally there was a surplus of $2,000,000 that year, but the fact remains (and the Senator, when his attention is called to it, will admit it) that the only way possible by which $2,000,000 of surplus appeared was that the Treasury had instituted a system of accounts which enabled them to use the fund for the redemption of national-bank notes, which ought to have been a charge against the Treasury. It was a mere system of bookkeeping. Secretary Foster, within six months after the operation of the McKinley Act, was compelled to treat the Treasury, as the Senator from Ohio a few days ago suggested that the present Secretary ought to treat it, by the heroic measure of suppressing appropriations made by Congress. The Senator knows that the appropriations for the fiscal years of 1891, 1892, and 1893, three years of President Harrison's Administration, exceeded by $362,926,881.35, including the sinking fund, the total receipts of the Government under the McKinley law:

The revenues from all sources for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1891, 1892, 1893 were...	$1,133,368,860.33
And the appropriations made by Congress during the same years were	1,496,295,741.68
Excess of appropriations over revenues..	362,926,881.35

In addition to that, Secretary Foster was compelled to resort to the method suggested by the Senator from Ohio, by suspending the payments directed to be made by Congress for various public works, and it is only by that system that you maintained the balance at all. The present Secretary has followed that policy. At the end of the fiscal year there was $116,000,000 that had been appropriated and not paid, and that is exclusive of the sinking fund. Add that sum and then one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty million dollars. The fact is that there has not been revenue enough from the day of the passage of the McKinley law until now to meet the wants of the Government and keep up the sinking fund, and there is no system of bookkeeping that will wipe that out. I admit there is not revenue enough now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator if he does not think that the Secretary of the Treasury is justified in neglecting to use money appropriated which is merely permissory? Did he not do right? The present Secretary and Secretary Foster and every Secretary that held office since the time of Alexander Hamilton have done precisely that thing. Wherever appropriations are made of mandatory character to carry out existing law the Secretary must meet those contingencies; he must provide for the law so as to prevent the Government from violating its promise; but from the beginning of the Government every Secretary of the Treasury has exercised the right to decline to use money appropriated by Congress when in his judgment it ought not to have been used.

Mr. GORMAN. I think that it is a very bad policy. When Congress makes an appropriation for any purpose we should provide the money by taxation, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the executive officers ought to carry out the will of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. The will of Congress is expressed——

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator will permit me to finish the sentence, when the condition arises, as it did arise after the passage of the McKinley law, when there was not enough revenue in the Treasury to meet the appropriations made by Congress, when there has not been at any time since, the Secretary of the Treasury was bound to suspend and not spend more money than he received, providing it could be suspended without interfering with the honorable obligations of the Government. Secretary Foster had an unexpended balance of appropriations on July 1, 1891, exclusive of sinking fund, of $112,043,711.64. But when Mr. Carlisle came in as Secretary of the Treasury with a depleted Treasury and this depression became more acute and the revenues were falling off, he suspended not only $116,000,000 in the last year, but he did more than that, he used the greenbacks and Treasury notes that he had redeemed, and paid out $132,000,000 on them for what? He paid it out for pensions and for expenditures of the Government that could not be suspended.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question before he sits down?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator expresses his disapprobation of the refusal of the Secretary of the Treasury to expend money appropriated by Congress. What does he make of the usual phraseology in an appropriation bill, to wit, that the payment shall be made out of money in the Treasury, and that it shall be out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated? I had always conceived that that phrase was inserted for the express purpose of withholding the authority from any head of Department, from the President, or anybody else, to spend money when the ways and means were not provided as well when the appropriation was made.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, all the Secretaries from 1879 have pursued the same policy that the present Secretary has pursued. There is no difference whatever. It has been done from the day that the Senator from Ohio was Secretary of the Treasury. Secretary Carlisle states the case properly when he places the responsibility for the use of the greenbacks when redeemed back to the decision of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. I believe that they have all followed it since. The law was construed and the precedent set by the distinguished Senator from Ohio. Here is what he said, as quoted in Secretary Carlisle's last report, admitting, as a matter of course, that the system ought to be corrected:

> A note redeemed with coin is in the Treasury and subject to the same law as if received for taxes, or as a bank note redeemed by the corporation issuing it. The authority to reissue it does not depend upon the mode in which it is returned to the Treasury.

He then, of course, was discussing the question whether the notes which might be redeemed after the 1st of January, 1879, under the resumption act would be lawfully reissued. He held that they could, and insisted that the question should be settled by a distinct provision of the law. Secretary Carlisle proceeds:

> The result was that Congress passed the act of May 31, 1878, making it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the notes. Since the passage of that act the right and duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the old legal-tender notes, no matter how received into the Treasury, provided they belong to the United States, has never been questioned in any quarter, and, as to the Treasury notes issued under the silver-purchasing act, they must be reissued when redeemed in gold, or, if canceled, standard silver dollars must be issued in their place.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish my friend from Maryland to understand that a Democratic House at that time did take my advice and carry it out very fairly and fully. It did provide for the reissue of United States notes, because when notes were presented for redemption there was a faint doubt about it. There were a few people in the United States, especially those who were opposed to the greenback circulation, who insisted that having been once redeemed they could not be reissued. I remember distinctly writing to the House, then very strongly Democratic, and stating the point that had been raised, and the House at once acted and the law was passed at my request; and that has been the law ever since.

Mr. GORMAN. So there can be no complaint of the present Secretary of the Treasury, because he simply followed the precedent of his predecessors and carried out the provisions of the law. That it has become necessary to use any part of that fund for the purpose of paying the current expenses of the Government is to be regretted. That the responsibility for it can be placed upon the Democratic party, as the Senator from Ohio has sought to do, I deny. The facts will not warrant the statement of the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Congress that passed that law was Democratic in both Houses.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, Mr. President; and it was passed upon the advice of the then Secretary of the Treasury, who is now the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose Congress alone had the power to pass the law. I certainly did not have it.

Mr. GORMAN. So it had the power; but the act was approved by a Republican President and in an Administration of which the honorable Senator from Ohio was known to be the power behind the throne. So the law stands. It is not of our making. It is an unfortunate condition for the country that we have reached, and this attempt to place the responsibility alone upon the Democratic party is not worthy the great reputation of the Senator from Ohio. It has come upon us from causes beyond the control of the Democratic party. I would not charge it upon the Republican party that you deliberately passed the McKinley Act to create a deficiency in the Treasury. You did not anticipate it. No Senator on the other side who had charge of that bill would have been guilty of such an act. But the fact is that your bill did not produce revenue enough. The fact is that Secretary Foster was compelled to say before closing his administration of the Department, in answer to a question of Mr. TURNER of Georgia:

> I think an annual increase of $50,000,000 would make the Treasury easy, and if I were going to manage it I would want to have it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator ought to read, in justice to Mr. Foster, the remaining portion of that interview, in which he says this money was required, not for the ordinary expenses of the Government, but to maintain the gold reserve, which was then being depleted somewhat.

Mr. GORMAN. Ah! The Senator now thinks it was the gold reserve that was depleted. I thought the Senator from Ohio and his Republican confreres charged the depletion of the gold reserve to the Democratic Administration?

Mr. ALDRICH. It was the shadow of the Democratic Administration which was then upon the country, the election having taken place in November and this statement having been made in the middle of February, after the election was held. It became known to the country that a Democratic Administration was to take possession of the Government, and the gold reserve immediately began to decline.

Mr. GORMAN. Ah! Mr. President, the Senator's memory is again at fault.

Mr. ALDRICH. But it never fell below $100,000,000 within the time——

Mr. GORMAN. No; but his partisanship is so strong that he can not remember the facts. There was not a Democratic Administration in 1891, and no Republican would admit that it was possible to elect a Democratic President in 1891.

Mr. ALDRICH. But Mr. Foster——

Mr. GORMAN. You were then in the height of your power, and you had every branch of the Government of the United States under your control.

Mr. ALDRICH. But the sentence which the Senator has read from the interview with the Secretary of the Treasury was uttered in February, 1893, and not in 1891.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, Mr. President; that is true, but the Secretary of the Treasury, before the Presidential election in 1892, had prepared his bonds to issue, knowing the condition of the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator can not certainly be willing to make any such statement.

Mr. GORMAN. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not before the Presidential election.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; before the Presidential election, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is absolutely mistaken. The preparation of bonds was made after the election. The Secretary's letter, which has been published in recent debates in another place, shows that the bonds were prepared not only after the election, but after a bill had passed the Senate of the United States, at the suggestion of the incoming Administration, to allow a different issue of bonds. After that was done, in February, I think, 1893——

Mr. SHERMAN. In February, 1893.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the Secretary of the Treasury ordered the preparation of bonds. There was no thought of issuing any bonds before that time.

Mr. GORMAN. I read his statement in February, 1893.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. And prior to that the Secretary had prepared to meet the emergency in which he found the Treasury. But let that go. I will furnish the date of the order of the Secretary of the Treasury to his Printing Bureau to prepare the bonds.

Mr. ALDRICH. That was in February, 1893.

Mr. GORMAN. Very good; suppose it was. Let us see who is responsible for this. There was no threatened Democratic legislation or Democratic President in 1891. The revenue laws passed by the Fifty-first Congress were your acts.

What affected the gold reserve? It began to diminish as soon as the Sherman law went into active operation. You had plenty of gold up to that time. Nobody will hold us responsible for that act. Every Democrat in this Chamber voted against it. The law was yours, and yours alone. Up to that time you had received in gold, or gold certificates, which are the same as gold, an average of 84 per cent of all customs duties, and that kept up your gold reserve. As soon as you passed the McKinley law and put the Sherman law into full operation, the receipts of gold from customs ceased, and the duties were paid almost exclusively in silver notes, in Sherman notes, and Treasury notes, so there was a constant stream of gold going out of the Treasury and none coming in. That was before the Presidential election, before we had an opportunity to frame legislation affecting the Treasury Department.

It is true that when we came into power we inherited all these bills which had been produced by bad legislation, by a tariff law which did not furnish revenue enough to pay the expenses of the Government, and by the operation of a law which excluded gold from going into the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator has the figures before him, will he not be kind enough to state to the Senate what amount of gold was in the Treasury in 1891? It is not what was paid in, but what amount of gold was in the Treasury which we are discussing.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes, they managed to keep in $100,000,000 of gold, and a little more, but I say there stands the fact that the operation of your laws had produced this result so far as legislation had produced it.

I admit frankly, sir, that there were causes outside of the legislation of the Republican party, as there are causes outside of the legislation which has been enacted or threatened to be enacted since we have been in power. They are beyond the confines of this country. The general upheaval, the fall in prices, the depression of business, the anxiety and fear of business men as to legislation made them solicitous as to the future. There has been another class which appeared during this time of distress and panic—the money lenders, who desire to take advantage of the distress of the Government, as they take advantage of the distress of individuals, and they unquestionably, in my judgment, have formed combinations which make it easy to take gold from the Treasury and get bonds issued for it.

Since you have only had a reserve of $100,000,000 behind the greenbacks, $346,000,000 in amount, and then added $150,000,000 of Sherman or Treasury notes, you have made the pile top-heavy, and there is but one thing for us to do, to increase the base, which is gold, or else to issue bonds, and take those notes out of circulation, putting something in their place which will not enable the money lenders to come back to the Treasury to demand gold for them. This difficulty can not be met by a discussion of whose fault it is, and I should not indulge in it but for the repetition of the statement of the distinguished Senator from Ohio, who seemed so anxious to throw the entire responsibility upon the Democratic party. Mr. President, party responsibility is nothing; it is the condition we must consider. It must be met, Mr. President, in an entirely different spirit. The condition exists; it confronts us; we all admit that something ought to be done. What the remedy shall be I believe is yet to be formulated, as I do not think any of the pending propositions can be enacted into laws.

That we want more revenue I frankly admit. The last revenue law which was passed, if it had been sustained in all its parts, would have produced revenue enough to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government. The Senator from Ohio says that it was a measure which would never have produced sufficient revenue as it passed. The Democratic party is responsible for the measure as it became a law. We in this body, it is true, added $75,000,000 per annum to the bill as it came here from the House of Representatives. As the Senate always does, we perfected the measure. With ordinary conditions of trade and commerce, if the provisions for the tax on incomes had remained, the law would have produced a surplus revenue; it would have, even in these times of depression, as the Senate passed it, produced enough revenue to pay the current expenses of the Government. Unexpectedly, however, to everybody, there was the decision described by the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] a few days since, which I shall not comment upon, as he has expressed my views so perfectly. I voted for that provision only because I believed the emergency existed for it, not because I believed in its policy; but I did believe in its constitutionality.

Mr. President, we ought from this hour forward not to arraign the two parties for this condition. In a certain sense we may both have responsibilities about it. I do trust, however, that we may consider the question with a view of relieving the condition of the country.

For one I should never agree to vote for any measure which I should regard as repudiating in the slightest degree the highest obligation of the Government. If we have contracted, as the executive branch of the Government has uniformly decided, and as Congress has never negatived, that we are to pay all these outstanding obligations in gold, I would so pay them, no matter how much it might cost the people of the country.

But when you come to the other question, which has been presented so ably by the distinguished Senator who has reported the amendment to this bill, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], we might as well admit here frankly, and the country must know it, that as earnest and honest men as there are in the Union differ as to what is to be done hereafter.

It is a question which can not be decided by the divisions on this aisle. No majority of the Senate can be had upon either side. You can not and I can not frown down the sentiments and the convictions of such men as my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who sits in front of me. We can not ignore the weight of the arguments which they make. We can not, if we would, ignore their power in the Senate and ride roughshod over their sentiments and their convictions. It is too serious a matter for the people of the country that we should bandy words here and taunt each other with failure to legislate fairly in the past. This matter must be settled, preserving the honor of the people of this country so that not the slightest taint shall ever attach to us because of the want of faith in carrying out and paying every obligation of the Government which has been incurred in the past. But we ought to discuss it and meet it, as we have to meet it, and adjust it as all great questions have been met in the past, by fair consideration and fair concession, so that by our united action we may give the people of this country opportunity to go on with their affairs and to build up enterprises and make thrift and prosperity again the order of the day.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, when I came into the Chamber I heard the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] making a statement which seemed to me so extraordinary that I should be very glad to ask his attention to it for the purpose of seeing whether I understood him aright. I understood the Senator to say that when the present Democratic Administration came into power it found $350,000,000 of suspended appropriations which there was no money to pay. Did the Senator make that statement?

Mr. GORMAN. I said—and I will give the Senator the figures for it—that Congress had appropriated three hundred and fifty-odd million dollars more than the revenues of the Government.

Mr. ALDRICH. Including, the Senator said, the sinking fund?

Mr. GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Including the sinking fund. How much for that and how much for other appropriations?

Mr. GORMAN. I can give the Senator the figures in a moment.

Mr. ALDRICH. If there was a deficiency of $350,000,000, during the three years which have elapsed there must certainly have been $200,000,000 more and $115,000,000 additional. The present deficiency, therefore, must be six hundred or seven hundred million dollars, based upon the same method of calculation, I should think.

Mr. GORMAN. I have the figures here, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. ALDRICH. I shall be very glad to have them.

Mr. GORMAN. For 1891, 1892, 1893, and 1894, taking all those years together, the appropriations were in excess of the revenues $296,868,547.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am talking about the condition which existed at the close of the last Republican Administration, and I desire to ask the Senator, if he makes such a statement in detail, what that deficiency consists of? If there was $350,000,000 of appropriations which there was no money to pay, I should be glad to know what amount of that was for the sinking fund. That is one question. If it was appropriations, that is another question. We have not paid any money on account of the sinking fund for many years. I presume there is not a Senator within my hearing who believes we ought to have gone on paying into the sinking fund at the time the Senator suggests, or that we are now under any obligation to buy bonds for the sinking fund. The statement is certainly very disingenuous if a large portion of that amount is made up of appropriations for the sinking fund, as I presume it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to extend this debate, but in justice to one of my constituents, the Hon. Charles Foster, I feel bound, after what has been read as coming from him, to read what he said recently in a public speech:

It is charged by resolves of Democratic conventions, by Democratic orators of high as well as low standing, and by the Democratic press, that the Harrison Administration left the Treasury in a bankrupt condition: that the late Secretary of the Treasury was in such an embarrassed condition financially as to induce him to ask Congress for $50,000,000 of additional revenues, and that he had ordered plates prepared for the issue of bonds, which were afterwards used by Secretary Carlisle, and that bonds would have been sold but for the intervention of the President: that the panic of 1893, with all of its distressing effects, was due to Republican legislation: that the panic would have come even if Harrison had been reelected, and that the present improved condition of the business of the country is due to the late legislation of Congress.

FALSITY OF THEM.

The absolute untruthfulness of each and every one of these allegations is easily established. The fact is, that in each and every year of the Harrison Administration the revenues exceeded the expenditures, as shown by statements now published by Secretary Carlisle.

WHAT THE HARRISON ADMINISTRATION DID.

Besides paying all the expenses of the Government, including enormous payment for pensions, payments much larger than have been paid before or will be paid hereafter, aggregating an excess of approximately $100,000,000 more than was paid by the first Cleveland or will be paid by his second Administration, it paid also all the extraordinary expenses for rivers and harbors and new Navy and the other expenses of the "billion-dollar Congress," and in addition paid, including premiums, about $200,000,000 of the public debt. On the 4th of March, 1893, we turned over to the new Administration nearly $125,000,000 in cash, more than $100,000,000 of which was gold.

Notwithstanding that Carlisle's statement shows the facts just stated, true to their habits and instincts which have abided with them in the past, and will no doubt continue in the future, they make these false allegations in the face of their refutation over the signature of their own Secretary.

THE TWO FALSEHOODS MOST PLEASING TO DEMOCRATS.

The two falsehoods that the Democratic leaders persistently publish, and in which they would take fiendish delight if true, are that American genius is incapable of producing tin plate, and the Treasury under Harrison was bankrupt.

ORDERING PLATES FOR BONDS.

Now, as to the charge that the Secretary was so straitened for cash that he ordered plates for bonds to be prepared, I believed at that time that the gold reserve of one hundred millions should be maintained, and I would have sold bonds to replenish it had this reserve fallen below the $100,000,000 limit.

I believe now that much of the trouble that came to the Treasury could have been avoided if Secretary Carlisle had promptly announced that he would maintain his gold reserve at all hazards. I feared such a contingency might occur in my time. To fortify myself and be ready for such an emergency I conferred with capitalists and found I could sell bonds for gold on a basis of 3 per cent interest. The only bonds available were those authorized by the resumption act of 1875, none bearing interest at a less rate than 4 per cent. The plates for these bonds had been prepared while Mr. Sherman was Secretary, and quite a supply were already printed and ready for final execution. Mr. Carlisle, I suppose, used this class for delivery to the purchasers of bonds sold by him. About the 20th of March, 1893—

That, I think, should have been February instead of March, though I am not sure but that it was during the called session—

the Senate, with the approval of Mr. Carlisle, who was then known to be the incoming Secretary, passed an amendment to an appropriation bill authorizing the issue of a 3 per cent bond by a practically unanimous vote. I had no doubt then that the House would concur, and that a 3 per cent short-term bond would be authorized. The emergency was such that I thought it prudent to direct the preparation of plates for these anticipated new 3 per cent bonds, which were, in all respects, a better bond than those authorized for the use of myself or my successor, at the earliest date possible.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Maryland, in the latter part of his argument, made the statement that in 1891 the gold in the Treasury was reduced.

Mr. GORMAN. No; I said that in 1891 the receipts of gold from customs began to be reduced.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator intend to show that the amount of gold held by the Government was reduced?

Mr. GORMAN. No; it was not reduced until some time afterwards, but the moment that the supply was cut off, as a matter of course, whenever a demand occurred for gold, as it did afterwards occur, the gold reserve was encroached upon. That was all there was of it.

Mr. ALDRICH. The figures, perhaps, may refresh the Senator's memory. In July, 1891, as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the amount of gold in the Treasury was $239,263,689.

Mr. GRAY. What is the date of that?

Mr. ALDRICH. July 1, 1891. That was some time after the passage of the McKinley law—about nine months after. On the 1st of July, 1892, the amount of gold in the Treasury was $255,706,611, or an increase of $16,000,000 in the amount of gold in the Treasury between the 1st of July, 1891, and the 1st of July, 1892, the McKinley law being in force all the time, and this latter period bringing it within four months of the election of 1892, when the Democratic party was placed in power.

The next year the amount of gold in the Treasury—July, 1893—Mr. Cleveland then being President, was reduced to $189,162,000, and in 1894 to $131,000,000. So the gold coin and bullion held in the Treasury kept increasing from 1891 up to 1892, practically to the election of 1892.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator if he will give us the amount of gold certificates. It is important to know how much there was of free gold.

Mr. ALDRICH. There were no gold certificates outstanding. Of course there was a certain amount of gold certificates in the Treasury.

Mr. TELLER. They count as money.

Mr. ALDRICH. They count as money. The gold certificates outstanding were $130,000,000 in 1891 and $120,000,000 in 1892.

Mr. GRAY. That has to be subtracted from the Senator's statement as to the gold reserve?

Mr. ALDRICH. Of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gold certificates are the same as gold.

Mr. GRAY. Not when they are outstanding, as I understand.

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly. They are to be deducted from the gold and bullion in the Treasury.

Mr. GRAY. Exactly.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I was undertaking to show was that the gold in the Treasury had actually increased during the period in which the Senator from Maryland said we were not receiving any gold at the custom-houses, showing very plainly to my mind that it made no difference as to the condition of the Treasury whether the customs were paid in gold certificates or in gold.

Mr. GORMAN. Now I ask the Senator to look at his table. He will find that the net gold in the Treasury in 1891, for the month of January, was $149,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not talking about January.

Mr. GORMAN. If he will follow that table down he will find the gold ran down gradually to $141,000,000, then to $132,000,000, with scarcely an increase except in December, 1891, when there was $120,000,000. Then, during the remainder of the time, it ran down until it got to $61,000,000 without any increase, showing that from the day the revenues were not paid in gold, gold decreased in the Treasury as a matter of course, running through the latter part of Harrison's Administration and during this Administration, until it has culminated in the great withdrawals which have occurred.

Mr. ALDRICH. The figures the Senator has and the figures which I have read are at the end of the financial year. They are found on page 27 of the Statistical Abstract and, I presume, are correct.

Mr. GORMAN. I have read from the last Treasury report, pages 46 and 47, in which the Secretary gives the total amount of gold in the Treasury, the certificates in use, and then the net amount of gold in the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. What was the amount in July, 1892?

Mr. GORMAN. In July, 1892, it was $110,000,000.

Mr. ALDRICH. Ten million dollars in excess.

Mr. GORMAN. Before the Sherman law went into effect the average was $168,000,000. As soon as that law went into operation nobody paid any gold for customs, and the amount of gold ran down to almost nothing. Not a single dollar of gold or of gold certificates was paid in, and the drain on the Treasury began, and it has been going on from that day to this.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think the enactment of that law was the cause of the reduction of the gold reserve?

Mr. GORMAN. I will say that the effect of it was that the Treasury had not any use for gold when the point was reached——

Mr. ALDRICH. What happened when the Sherman law was repealed? Did the gold increase in the Treasury?

Mr. GORMAN. As a matter of course, not.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ALDRICH. For a question.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask if the Senator from Rhode Island desires the Senate to understand that there was not a diminishing gold reserve all the while during 1891 and 1892?

Mr. ALDRICH. What I meant to say was that there was no substantial diminution in the amount of the gold reserve in the Treasury at any time prior to the incoming of the present Administration.

Mr. LINDSAY. Then the Senator differs very widely from the last Republican Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject. With his permission, I will read from the report of the Secretary of December, 1892, only one month after the election. I read from page 13. The Secretary says:

> One of the embarrassments to the Treasury, in the opinion of the Secretary, is the inability, with the limited amount of cash on hand above the one-hundred-million reserve, to keep up a sufficient gold supply. When the demand comes for the exportation of gold the Treasury is called upon to furnish it. If this demand should prove to be as large the coming year as it has been—

> for the past two years—

That is, since the passage of the McKinley law and the Sherman Act—

> gold in the Treasury would be diminished to or below the reserve line.

Then he does not rest upon the idea at all that the balance of trade was against us. After reciting the fact that Congress had enacted this law because the $100,000,000 was originally a sufficient reserve, he then says:

> But, if $100,000,000 in gold was a suitable or necessary reserve in 1882 and in 1885, it would seem clear that a greater reserve is necessary now. It should be remembered that since 1882 we have added to our silver circulation the sum of $259,016,182 in standard silver dollars coined under the old silver act of 1878. These dollars are nearly all outstanding, and largely represented by silver certificates. We have also increased the legal-tender paper circulation by issuing about $120,000,000 of the Treasury notes authorized by the act of July 14, 1890, and to this we are adding about four millions each month in payment of silver bullion purchased.

Then he says:

> In view, therefore, of these increased and increasing liabilities, the reserve in the Treasury for the redemption of the Government obligations should, in my opinion, be increased to the extent of at least 20 per cent of the amount of Treasury notes issued and to be issued under the act of July 14, 1890.

There is not one word about the balance of trade being against us, but it is put wholly upon the idea that we are increasing the amount of outstanding obligations payable on demand in gold under and in virtue of the Sherman purchasing act of July, 1890.

Mr. ALDRICH. The extract which the Senator from Kentucky has read shows, of course, that the late Secretary of the Treasury was desirous of increasing the gold reserve on account, as he himself states, of the increased amount of currency which was outstanding and redeemable in gold.

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. He also shows another thing: That, in his opinion, the cash balance in the Treasury at that time was not sufficient to enable him to hold what he believed to be a sufficient gold reserve. That condition grew out of two or three different circumstances, if the Senator will excuse me, and I think it is very easily explained, and anyone who was familiar with the matter at the time will recall it upon the mere statement of the fact.

The act of 1890 was passed to do two things, so far as the effect upon the revenue was concerned. It was passed at the request and solicitation of the President of the United States, to reduce the surplus and to reduce surplus revenue——

Mr. PLATT. We cut off $65,000,000 on sugar.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Connecticut very well suggests, we cut off $65,000,000 on sugar. We reduced the revenue purposely by the act of 1890 in order to reduce the surplus which Mr. Cleveland said in several messages to Congress was a very undesirable thing to have. He said we were taking money from the people and locking it up in the Treasury, thus bringing about a contraction of the currency and hard times. In order to relieve that condition of affairs, the act of 1890 was passed for the express purpose of reducing the revenue, and when it reduced the revenue, of course it reduced the amount available for the gold reserve in excess of the $100,000,000.

Another thing was done by the Republican Administration. It used the money in the Treasury, the surplus revenue, for the redemption of the debt of the United States, and, according to the opinion of Mr. Foster at the time of which he is now speaking, they reduced that cash balance by the purchase of bonds to so low a state that it was impossible for him to hold the gold reserve which he thought was necessary for an effective redemption of the Treasury notes in addition to the United States notes then outstanding.

This accounts for the diminishing balance of gold in the Treasury in 1892, or whatever the date was. It was on account of a constantly decreasing cash balance growing out of two causes; one the reduction of revenue by the act of 1890, and the other the purchase of the debt by a Republican Administration.

The Senator from Kentucky stopped reading at an unfortunate point——

Mr. LINDSAY. I did not intend to stop, if the floor had not been taken away from me by the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood I retained the floor and yielded to the Senator from Kentucky for a question. I did not understand that I was interrupting him.

The very next sentence in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to that read by the Senator from Kentucky lets in a flood of light upon this whole question as to the views of the Secretary of the Treasury at that time and as to what the effect of the act of 1890 has been. He says:

As will be seen by the estimates submitted, the receipts of the current and the next fiscal year are not likely, if present conditions continue, to fall below expenditures.

That statement was absolutely accurate.

Mr. GORMAN. What date was that?

Mr. ALDRICH. In December, 1892; the last report of the then Secretary of the Treasury.

His predictions were absolutely verified, because, as shown by the report of Secretary Carlisle for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, which was the next report made, the excess of revenue, as stated by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day, was more than $2,000,000. So there was not an hour or a day or a month from the time the act of 1890 was passed until the close of the first fiscal year during the present Administration when the McKinley law did not produce a surplus revenue instead of a deficiency.

It is idle for Senators to spend the amount of time they do trying to prove that Mr. Foster or anybody else said there was then a deficiency after the statement read by the Senator from Ohio to-day, which shows plainly what Mr. Foster's idea was at that time; but whatever his opinion may have been, the fact confronts us that the act of 1890 did produce a sufficient amount of revenue up to the time of the incoming of this Administration, and while the law was administered by Republicans, to carry on the Government and to produce a surplus.

Now, the Senator from Maryland says that the act of 1890 was deficient for revenue-producing purposes. If that were true, why did he and his party pass a law which they knew would make that deficiency even greater, and why does he—differing, perhaps, from his associates—say now that we need more revenue, and still, with his party associates, refuse to vote for the only possible measure which can produce more revenue?

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator from Rhode Island shifted the point that I was attempting to make. I was not reading from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of 1892 to show that the act of 1890 would not yield revenue enough, but to rebut the theory of the other side that it was the incoming of the Democratic Administration which produced the raids upon the Treasury. This report shows that, owing to two Republican acts, raids had been going on two years before the Democratic President had been elected. I will again call the attention of the Senator to what Mr. Foster said:

One of the embarrassments to the Treasury, in the opinion of the Secretary, is the inability, with the limited amount of cash on hand——

Now, the election of Mr. Cleveland had nothing to do with that condition—above the one-hundred-million reserve, to keep up a sufficient gold supply When the demand comes for the exportation of gold the Treasury is called upon to furnish it.

That is, the Treasury before the election of Mr. Cleveland. It was called upon to furnish this gold for exportation.

Mr. ALDRICH. But, if the Senator will allow me a moment, the table submitted by the Senator from Ohio shows that up to a time six months subsequent to that period the whole amount of gold taken from the Treasury to redeem United States notes had been only $38,000,000.

Mr. LINDSAY. Let me show you what the Secretary says about that:

If this demand—

This was about thirty days after the election—

If this demand should prove to be as large the coming year—

That is, the first year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration—as it has been for the past two years—

Under Mr. Harrison's Administration—

gold in the Treasury would be diminished to or below the reserve line.

Mr. ALDRICH. But at the time the Secretary wrote that report the reserve was $110,000,000, and in order to reduce it to the amount of the reserve it would have been necessary to reduce the amount only $10,000,000.

Mr. LINDSAY. The question is not what the reserve then was, but whether the gold in the Treasury was being reduced by the enforced redemption of greenbacks, for purposes of exportation or for any other purpose.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me just there?

Mr. LINDSAY. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I have before me the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Foster, made in February, 1893, before the Committee on Ways and Means, in which I find a passage which bears upon the line of thought which the Senator from Kentucky is pursuing. In reply to a request for information in regard to the gold reserve, Secretary Foster says:

Seeing these things, the Secretary—

That is, himself—

felt that we should keep all the money we could in gold. About $25,000,000 was the limit he could pay for. He had no trouble to get gold if he had the money to get it with.

Mr. ALDRICH. Exactly.

Mr. GRAY. The Secretary proceeds:

Possibly, sometimes, when five or six or seven millions of requisitions would come in in a day, for which he would have to pay gold if all were paid in a day, I probably have suggested to Mr. MacLennan that he had better wait a day or two until we got in a better shape, because I did not want to pay out gold for current liabilities. I knew just as well as I was living that this thing was going to come, and I wanted to be as strong as I possibly could.

He was referring to a condition of things certainly antecedent to the election of 1892. He proceeds:

So you see in my report I made as good a statement as I could of our condition, and asked you to give the Treasury more money, so this gold reserve might be increased.

In another place he says, in reply to a question from Mr. PAYNE, what I shall read. Mr. PAYNE said:

You went on to a point where, if you continued the old statement—

That is, the old method of bookkeeping—

it would have showed a deficit, but you still had plenty of money in the Treasury for all needs?

Secretary FOSTER. Certainly.

That is, if he had kept the old method of bookkeeping he would have showed a deficit. He states in another place that that change in the method was by treating as available cash $54,000,000 of money that was kept as a redemption fund for the national-bank notes——

Mr. ALDRICH. That was done in accordance with a provision of an act of Congress; he was required to do that by the act of 1890.

Mr. GRAY. And extending $25,000,000 of the maturing Government obligations.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. President, it is not to be supposed that Mr. Foster would have failed to make identically the same report in regard to the raids that had theretofore been made upon the Treasury if Mr. Harrison had been elected that he made after the election of Mr. Cleveland, and that is, that if this demand for gold should prove to be as large the coming year as it had been for the past two years the gold in the Treasury would be diminished below the reserve line.

My friend says I failed to read the next paragraph, which is a very important one.

Mr. ALDRICH. I wish the Senator would read it now.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will read it now:

As will be seen by the estimates submitted, the receipts of the current and the next fiscal year are not likely, if present conditions continue, to fall below expenditures.

Mr. ALDRICH. Go on.

Mr. LINDSAY. "Yet"—what?

Yet in view of the fact that the surplus for this year will be small, upon the basis stated, with the probability of a falling off in receipts for causes mentioned—

Not the election of Mr. Cleveland, not the change of control of the Government to the Democratic party, but for reasons that he had before mentioned—with the probability of a falling off in receipts for causes mentioned, I think the revenues should be so increased as to enable the Treasury Department to maintain a gold reserve of not less than $125,000,000, and to maintain a comfortable working balance in the Treasury cash.

Which it is very clear was not then in the Treasury.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will allow me right there, in order to show that the Secretary of the Treasury did mean exactly the conditions I have alluded to, namely, the election of a Democratic President, I read from page 10 of his report:

The estimated receipts are based upon conditions prevailing prior to the late election. Public opinion having decreed a change of policy, particularly in the tariff laws, the altered conditions resulting therefrom render it impossible at the present time to estimate the annual income with any marked degree of accuracy, and it is impossible to predict the effect that such proposed radical changes would have upon the future revenues of the Government.

So the exact conditions to which I have referred were the conditions the Secretary of the Treasury had in mind in making the statement which the Senator has read.

Mr. LINDSAY. It has not been the history of tariff legislation in this country that to change a prohibitive tariff, such as the McKinley Act was in many respects, to a revenue-producing tariff would reduce the revenues of the Government. My friend says that the express purpose of the McKinley Act was to reduce the revenue. That was certainly the declared purpose of it, and every possible method known to human experience to reduce the revenue had been resorted to. Under all the old tariff acts, revenue tariffs, low tariffs, had increased the revenues rather than diminished them. So that was not what Mr. Foster was looking forward to. He was looking forward to the operation of other and different causes than the reform of the tariff. He says on page 14 what I was about to read when I was interrupted:

As a general revision of our customs laws is now probable, I do not feel at liberty to suggest any special method for increasing the revenue, though I should otherwise think that an additional tax on whisky, which could be collected without additional cost, would furnish an easy method.

That is, if his own party had continued in power and he had felt authorized to give advice, he would have advised the increase of revenue in order to keep gold in the Treasury and in order to have a comfortable working balance after keeping up a gold reserve of $125,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LINDSAY. The Senator can not take me off the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator from Kentucky was through.

Mr. LINDSAY. I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 23, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 22, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF CAMPBELL VS. MINER.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Elections No. 2 to make a report in the contested-election case of Timothy J. Campbell against Henry C. Miner, from the Ninth Congressional district of the State of New York, and to say to the House that the committee desires its consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2, makes a privileged report, which the Clerk will read. Does the gentleman desire to have the report read for immediate action?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Yes, Mr. Speaker; that is the desire of the committee, and I ask that the report be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to whom was referred the contested election case of Timothy J. Campbell against Henry C. Miner, from the Ninth Congressional district of the State of New York, respectfully report to the House that they have had said case under consideration and find the facts to be as follows:

The contestant was an independent candidate, and the contestee was the regular Democratic candidate, for Representative in Congress from said district at the regular election held therein on the 6th day of November, 1894.

The Republican candidate was John Simpson, and the Socialists and still another organization had candidates for the office. Soon after the election the State board of canvassers of the State of New York canvassed the vote of the district, and declared the contestee elected over the contestant by a plurality of 954 votes; and the secretary of state of said State issued to him a certificate of his election, and he now represents the district in the House. That, after this certificate was issued, the contestant served a notice of contest of the election upon the contestee, in which he alleged, as the sole grounds for the contest, the failure of the contestee to file the itemized statement of his expenditures in aid of his election, as required by the statute of New York, the casting of illegal votes at the election, and the bribery and intimidation of the voters by the contestee. To this notice the contestee served an answer in denial and made counter charges therein of the same character as the charges made against himself in the notice.

Subsequent to this testimony was taken in support of the contest; but no testimony whatever has ever been taken by the contestee; and neither party has filed a brief in the case.

Your committee report that they have carefully examined said evidence and fail to find anything therein which even tends to support any of the grounds of contest set forth in the notice, except the testimony of one witness. This witness swore that, on the day of the election, a Democrat named Benjamin, who was near one of the voting precincts in the district, proposed to him that if he would stay in a store there located he would pay him for his day's work, and that he gave him some money to give to other persons with which to buy votes for the Democratic ticket; that the witness gave to four or five persons $2 each of this money for the purpose of enabling them to purchase votes therewith, and that Benjamin gave to them the Democratic pasters, and that witness saw Benjamin give money and pasters to an indefinite number of other men during the day. It is not shown, however, that any of the men to whom money and pasters were so given either voted themselves or procured others to vote at said election; nor is it shown what was done by them with the money and pasters; nor does it anywhere appear in the evidence what number of precincts there were in the district; what vote was polled or returned at any precinct, or at what particular precinct the transaction testified to by this witness occurred.

While, therefore, the testimony of this witness raises a presumption that money was illegally used at this election to bribe the voters at one of the precincts, yet there is not sufficient evidence in the record to enable the committee to determine that it was actually so applied, or the extent to which it affected the result; and they are of the clear opinion that the contestant has wholly failed to establish any of the grounds of contest which were set out in his notice in the case.

Your committee further show that after the reference of this case to them, and before the final hearing of the same, the contestant moved the committee, under oath, for leave to reopen the case and to take further testimony therein to prove the matters alleged in his notice of contest, and also to prove that he had been regularly indorsed and nominated, before the election, as the candidate of the Republican party in said district, and that said Simpson had been induced to become a candidate for such nomination by contestee, but had not received the regular nomination of said party, and that when the question as to whose name should be printed on the Republican ticket as the candidate for Representative came before the board of police commissioners of the city of New York, the board being equally divided as to whether the name of Simpson or the name of Campbell should be placed thereon, Simpson, at the instigation of the contestee, applied for a mandamus before Judge McAdams, a judge of a court of record in said city, to compel said police commissioners to place his name upon the ticket as the Republican nominee, and that the court refused to give contestant a fair opportunity to be heard on such application and granted the mandamus; that thereupon the said board placed the name of Simpson on the ticket and, by reason of this, the said Simpson received at the election 5,214 votes, being the entire vote cast for him at said election, and which votes, the contestant alleges, would otherwise have been cast for him. That contestant was prevented from proving these facts while he was taking his testimony in the case by reason of his arrest upon certain proceedings for contempt which were instituted against him before said judge, on account of some things said by him while testifying in this contest in his own behalf, which arrest had interfered with his taking of testimony and scared and intimidated witnesses who, but for the institution of these proceedings, would have testified for him in the case; that said proceedings for contempt were kept hanging over him until long after his time of taking testimony had expired, and that one week of the time for taking testimony allowed to him by statute was lost to him through the misconduct of the contestee's attorneys. This motion of the contestant was resisted by the contestee, who filed his affidavit in opposition thereto.

Your committee show to the House that these facts, which the contestant asked leave to prove, were not stated and set forth as a ground of contest in his notice in the case. They also show that the testimony in the record utterly fails to disclose the truth of contestant's statement that he lost any time by the conduct of contestee's attorneys; but does clearly show that, without any just excuse or reason therefor, he permitted all but five days of the forty days' time allowed him by law in which to take his testimony in the case to expire before he took any evidence whatever; that he was not arrested for contempt until after the time for taking his testimony had expired and was not held in custody upon said charge except for a few moments, and that his witnesses were in no wise intimidated from testifying; all as is shown by his own evidence now on file in the case.

The committee, waiving the question as to whether the facts which contestant asked permission to prove would, if proven, constitute a valid ground of contest, declare that the testimony already taken by him shows that it is very doubtful whether he would be able to establish such facts even if the case were opened up for his benefit. Actuated in the matter by the considerations which have been submitted, the committee overruled the said motion of the contestant, and declined to permit him to take additional testimony.

The committee also report that on the final hearing of the case before them the contestant urged that the election law of New York, under which said election was held, was unconstitutional and void, for the reason that the provision requiring the candidate for Representative in Congress to be nominated for the office by a party convention or petitioned for by a certain per cent of the voters before his name can be placed upon the ticket to be voted for constitutes an abridgment of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and is a denial by the State to persons within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws as guaranteed in section 1 of Article XIV of the Federal Constitution. For this reason he insisted that the election was a nullity, and that the seat in controversy in this contest should be declared vacant.

This provision of the New York election law, whose unconstitutionality is urged, is a conspicuous feature of what is known as the Australian ballot system, which system has been in force in a number of States of the Union for a considerable period of time, and the constitutionality of this feature has never, to the knowledge of your committee, been questioned in the courts. It is to them incredible that it should have gone so long without having been challenged, if it is in contravention of the Constitution. If it is really open to this objection, a large per cent of the members now holding seats in this body are not entitled to retain the same. The committee themselves entertain no doubt of the constitutionality of the provision, but do not deem it advisable to prolong this report by giving the arguments in support of their views.

In view of the matters and things hereinbefore set forth, your committee in conclusion recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That Timothy J. Campbell was not elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress for the Ninth Congressional district of the State of New York, and is not entitled to the seat.

"Resolved, That Henry C. Miner was elected a Representative to the Fifty-fourth Congress from the Ninth Congressional district of the State of New York, and that he is entitled to his seat."

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were agreed to was laid on the table.

SEAL FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries on a resolution of inquiry. The report is favorable.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with a copy of the report of Henry W. Elliott, made pursuant to the order of special act approved April 5, 1890, on the condition of the fur-seal fisheries of Alaska, together with all maps and illustrations accompanying said report, as submitted by the author to the Secretary of the Treasury November 17, 1890.

The report (by Mr. PAYNE) is as follows:

The Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to whom was referred House resolution No. 110, having duly considered the same, report: That the information sought by this resolution will be of great value to the House in its investigation of the line of the seal fisheries; and the committee recommend that the resolution pass without amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SCHOOLS OF MINES.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill No. 3558 and to substitute in lieu thereof a bill unanimously passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill (S. 790) to aid the States of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Nevada, Wyoming, Colorado, and South Dakota to support schools of mines was read at length.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is that bill reported from the committee?

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Idaho to have the authorization of the committee to bring up this Senate bill——

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. I have, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. This being identical with the House bill reported from the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. I have that authority.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right to make a point of order on the bill.

Mr. TURNER of Georgia. May we have some explanation from the gentleman, subject to the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The point of order can be reserved, if there be no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill was considered by the Committee on Public Lands, when all the members of that committee were present; that it was considered for upward of an hour, and that committee unanimously instructed me to report the House bill favorably.

I am informed that a similar bill, in fact an identical bill, was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining erroneously, and that committee reported it favorably. I will say that the Senate has twice passed upon this bill favorably. The Senate Committee on Public Lands recommended it unanimously and the Senate passed it Monday. I have consulted the Commissioner of the General Land Office and he has no objection to the bill, and there is no objection from any quarter, so far as I know.

In explanation of the bill I will say that it is intended to aid in the establishment of schools of mines and mining where mining is practically conducted. The Philadelphia Public Ledger, an independent journal of high character, has indorsed this bill editorially. I will add further that the only place where mineralogy and metallurgy and kindred sciences can be scientifically and successfully taught is where mining is practically carried on. Had schools of the character contemplated by this bill been established in the past, our mineral resources would have been much more rapidly and largely developed than they are up to this time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is this a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. It is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which involves an appropriation, and therefore it must be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. It does not necessarily involve any appropriation.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, certainly it does. It proposes to take one-fourth of the receipts from the sale of mineral lands and use the money for this purpose.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. The bill simply provides that 25 per cent of the receipts from sales of mineral lands shall be given for these schools; and also that a like amount shall be appropriated by the States in which the schools are located. It provides further that students from all the States shall be admitted to these schools on equal terms and conditions with students from the mining States, although the latter States will pay probably four-fifths of the amount required for the support of these schools.

Mr. AITKEN. Does this bill provide for aid to mining schools that are now maintained in States that have no Government mineral lands?

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. It provides for taking 25 per cent of the receipts from the sale of Government mineral lands for the support of these schools.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill proposes to take 25 per cent of the receipts from the sale of mineral lands, which would otherwise go into the Treasury, and devote it to this purpose, and therefore it is a bill which must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether the sciences of mineralogy and metallurgy are not taught by the agricultural colleges throughout the United States?

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. It may be that they are taught in some of the agricultural colleges, but not intelligently and scientifically, because they can not be taught in a thorough and practical way except where mining is actually conducted.

Mr. POWERS. Is there not an agricultural college in your State?

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. No.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I will say that in my State we have a mining school and also an agricultural college, but they are separate institutions.

Mr. POWERS. Why do you separate them?

Mr. PICKLER. The mining school is where mining is carried on practically.

Mr. POWERS. The very theory of the agricultural colleges is that they shall teach all these branches.

Mr. PICKLER. It may be that they do teach them in some States, but not in my State.

Mr. AITKEN. I wish the gentleman from Idaho would inform us what advantage this bill offers to States that have mining schools already established and are maintaining them, but that have no Government mineral lands for sale.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. We will admit their students on the same conditions as students from the mining States. You can not teach these sciences practically unless the students have an opportunity to go out and examine the mines and shafts and tunnels and all operations of mining.

Mr. AITKEN. The gentleman does not mean to say that there is no mining going on, except in States where there are Government mineral lands for sale?

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. There is practically no mining for the precious metals, except in the mineral-land States.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the consideration of this bill, provided it shall be considered first in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. AITKEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. AITKEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

REPORT OF MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. STEELE called up for amendment the House concurrent resolution in relation to printing and binding the report of the managers of Soldiers' Homes, but at the suggestion of the Speaker consented that it should lie over until to-morrow.

INCLINE RAILWAY, WEST MOUNTAIN, HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. LITTLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time for the completion of an incline railway upon the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation as provided by act of Congress approved December 21, 1893, is hereby extended for the term of three years from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That said act is hereby continued in full force and effect.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 4241) for improving Aransas Pass; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 25) to extend the time for making the assessment of real estate in the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A bill (S. 790) to aid the public-land States to support schools of mines—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory"—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 1230) to extend the limits of the port of entry of New Orleans—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

A bill (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHICAGO.

Mr. LORIMER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill. This resolution was passed by the Senate on last Monday.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That in addition to the amount authorized to be expended for the temporary employment of draftsmen and skilled service in the preparation of plans and specifications for the public building at Chicago, Ill., as provided in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1895, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, out of the appropriation heretofore made, a sum not exceeding $25,000 for the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for said building.

Mr. DOCKERY. Reserving the right to object, I trust we shall have some explanation.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] will be permitted to explain.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I called, with other members of this House, upon the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him to take up immediately the work of constructing the new public building at Chicago. He said that he had not yet received a sufficient appropriation to employ a skilled architect and other skilled labor to do the work of drawing the plans and specifications. He suggested that he draft a resolution to carry out that object, and send it to the Senate; which he did on the 9th of this month. As I have stated, that resolution was passed by the Senate on last Monday; and I hope there will be no objection now to concurrence in it by the House.

This House passed a year ago a bill authorizing the construction of a public building at Chicago, and appropriating $300,000 for the purpose of building a temporary post-office. By the same bill authority was given that $80,000 be used for architect services. When the bill reached the Senate it was so amended that only $30,000 was appropriated for such services, and the bill in that shape was concurred in by the House. Since that time the Secretary of the Treasury has discovered that it is impossible to have the work of drawing the plans for that building done properly for $30,000, and he now states that, in his opinion, $25,000 additional will give him a sufficient amount of money to proceed with the work.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LORIMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's proposition is to increase the amount for the architect?

Mr. LORIMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman state how much of the increased appropriation which he now asks is to be paid to the architect?

Mr. LORIMER. It all comes out of the appropriation already made.

Mr. COX. I understand that; but if this bill should be passed how much will be appropriated to pay the architect for drawing the plans?

Mr. LORIMER. Fifty-five thousand dollars to do all the work.

Mr. COX. And the gentleman stated in his remarks, as we understood, that the $300,000 heretofore appropriated is only for a temporary post-office in Chicago.

Mr. LORIMER. This is to pay for the services of the architect.

Mr. DOCKERY. I observe that this bill refers to an appropriation made in the sundry civil act of last year. I was not a member of the subcommittee which prepared that bill, and I do not now recall the exact amount of the appropriation for this purpose or the terms on which it was made, but as I catch the reading of this bill, it makes an additional appropriation for a special architect.

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all.

Mr. LORIMER. This is to be taken out of the appropriation already made.

Mr. SAYERS. This bill proposes merely to give the Secretary of the Treasury authority to use for this purpose $25,000 out of the appropriation made at the last session of the last Congress for the construction of a public building in the city of Chicago.

Mr. LORIMER. That is the idea.

Mr. HENDERSON. And it does not increase the appropriation, as I understand it, one dollar.

Mr. LORIMER. Not a dollar.

Mr. SAYERS. It does not increase the appropriation because there is a limit fixed on the cost of the building, and there was a certain amount of the appropriation heretofore made which was allowed to be used for this purpose.

Mr. LORIMER. Yes, of the $300,000.

Mr. SAYERS. That was appropriated for the purpose indicated.

Mr. LORIMER. Yes; for the purpose of constructing a temporary building, and to pay the architect for the preparation of the plans.

Mr. CANNON. If I understand my colleague's proposition, it is this: It is believed that the authorization of $25,000 to an outside architect will not only beget haste where a building is so much needed, but it will be economy as well.

Mr. LORIMER. Undoubtedly; and the Secretary of the Treasury states that he can not go on with the work until this additional amount of the money heretofore appropriated is set aside for this special purpose.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question for information. As I understand the matter, an appropriation of $300,000 was made as a beginning for the construction of the post-office building in the city of Chicago——

Mr. LORIMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY (continuing). But, of course, it is expected that the appropriations for this purpose will go on from time to time, and that the building will finally cost between four and five million dollars?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. DINGLEY. And authority was given to use $30,000 of that sum for the preparation of plans, etc.?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; $55,000.

Mr. COX. There was thirty thousand to start with, I think.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And it is proposed to increase it now to $55,000.

A MEMBER. Let us have the bill read; perhaps that will settle the matter.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me proceed for a moment. Thirty thousand dollars of the appropriation was set aside for the purpose of securing the services of architects, and now it is proposed to increase this allowance $25,000 more for the same purpose—that is, for the preparation of plans and specifications and the superintendence of the building—making a total of $55,000 in all to be taken from the original appropriation. But, gentlemen, we must not lose sight of the fact that whatever increase is made here, the cost of the building will be just that much more in the end, and that we are, undoubtedly, if we take any portion of this appropriation already made for the purpose indicated, simply increasing the total cost to that extent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You are right about that.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the only point that I wish to draw the attention of the House to—for I am in harmony with the construction of this building—is that it was thought originally that $30,000 was a sufficient sum for the preparation of the plans. It is now thought necessary to set aside $25,000 additional—making $55,000 in all—for the same purpose. Now, what I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois is this: Is it possible that the mere preparation of the plans of the building is to cost $55,000?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is the preparation of the plans simply?

A MEMBER. No; it includes superintendence.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand the language is the preparation of plans only. I have not examined the bill.

Mr. COX. The amount sought to be appropriated here would go to the architect.

Mr. DINGLEY. For the preparation of the plans——

Mr. LORIMER. And for the superintendence of the construction.

Mr. CANNON. If my colleague would allow me——

Mr. MILNES. The appropriation is simply to assist the Government Architect.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). As I understand it, and my colleague can correct me if I am wrong, the $55,000 means something more than the bare preparation of the plans.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is exactly what I am trying to find out.

Mr. CANNON. Am I not correct?

Mr. LORIMER. Undoubtedly. It means that the assistant architect shall follow up the work and supervise the construction of the building.

Mr. MILNES. Let us have the bill read. That is the best way.

Mr. LORIMER. I desire to say that $55,000 is a very small amount of money to pay for the preparation of plans, investigation of materials, and the supervision of a building which is to cost $4,000,000.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me a moment before proceeding, I would like to read the exact language of the sundry civil appropriation act which was approved on the 2d of March, 1895, bearing upon this subject. It provides:

In pursuance of the act of Congress entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a Government building at Chicago, Ill.," approved February 28, 1895, the sum of $300,000 is hereby appropriated for the commencement and continuation of the building, of which amount the sum of $30,000 is hereby authorized to be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporarily draftsmen and skilled service which may be necessary in the preparation of plans and specifications for the said building, this amount to be exclusive of any moneys that he may be authorized to expend for the services of engineers, draftsmen, and other persons employed in the preparation of plans and specifications for any other public buildings.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is only for the preparation of plans?

Mr. SAYERS. That is all.

Mr. DINGLEY. And this bill is only for the preparation of plans.

Mr. LORIMER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of the Treasury says that with the amount of work on hand, and because of the size of the building, and the amount of money to be expended on this public building in Chicago, it will be necessary to employ an assistant architect, and that with the money which he has on hand, $30,000, he can not proceed with the work.

I was about to say that $55,000 is a very small amount of money to employ an architect to do the work that an architect is supposed to do in the construction of a building the cost of which will be $4,000,000. There is not a concern in this country that would undertake the construction of a building of that magnitude for less than 5 per cent, which would amount in all to about $200,000. The doing of this work for $55,000 means that the work of supervising and drawing the plans of this building will cost the Government about 1⅜ per cent.

Mr. LOUD. But I should like to suggest to the gentleman that the architect would also supervise the construction of the building, which in this case the Government will provide for at an expense of several thousand dollars.

Mr. LORIMER. The architect who is to be employed under this resolution will supervise the construction of the building.

Mr. LOUD. But, as I understand, he will be paid an additional salary. There will be two inspectors.

Mr. LORIMER. We have a Supervising Architect, and the architect that this money will employ will look exclusively after the construction of the Chicago building.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman permit me a question? Is it true that the new building is to be erected upon the same ground upon which the old building stands?

Mr. LORIMER. On the same ground; yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will say that from the experience the Government has had with reference to the construction of the old building upon this particular piece of ground I do not believe that this House could do a wiser thing than to pass this bill or to so amend it that the Supervising Architect shall have the very best assistance that can be obtained in order to personally superintend the beginning of the construction of this building. There is very great danger that if the foundation of the building is not properly constructed there will be a sinking at one part of the building, so as to bring about in the course of time a necessity for large expenditures for repairs, which will cost the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars. Now, this is to be a very large building. The Government will expend $4,000,000 or more for its completion, and I regard it as of the very greatest importance that the Supervising Architect of the Treasury shall have the very best assistance in superintending the construction of the foundation.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to add right there that I concur with every statement that has been made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] as to the necessity of employing a competent architect? But as I understand the original bill and supplemental bill which is now pending, with the point of order reserved, this provides $55,000 for the simple preparation of plans.

Mr. HENDERSON. And specifications.

Mr. DOCKERY. Plans only, and I should like the gentleman to give us the items of that estimate, because this House can not act intelligently until we have the items of that estimate of $55,000. What amount of the $55,000 is to go to the payment of the salary of an architect?

I want to say further that I am in sympathy with the proposition to secure outside skilled service for the preparation of these plans, and while that is true, it is not necessary to absolutely ravish this $4,000,000 appropriation for the benefit of some architect who may be employed in this connection. As I remember it, with the enormous expenditures which were made for the construction of public buildings at the World's Fair, we only paid $10,000 for the plan of any building submitted by an architect. The association employed some of the most skillful architects in the United States, but the highest price ever paid to any of them for the preparation of plans for any of these buildings was $10,000. In all, I think, we paid $100,000 perhaps for the plans for ten buildings. Now, I think the House is agreed that we want to expedite the preparation of these plans and the construction of this building, but we do not want concealed in this appropriation of $55,000 a magnificent bonus to some architect, which is not necessary to secure the safety of the building or its architectural appearance.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me, upon the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that after the word "Illinois," in line 6, he insert the words "and for the supervision of its construction."

Mr. DOCKERY. I would be content to compromise on that, if we can get the plans and supervision of the building for that sum of money; but I apprehend that the gentlemen representing the city of Chicago would not consent to that, or somewhere along the line there will be an objection.

Mr. LORIMER. I will accept that amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that we can not hear a word of what is being said.

The SPEAKER. It is impossible for the Chair to hear.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment——

Mr. RICHARDSON. Has consent been given to the consideration of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent has not been given. This debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desired to hear what my distinguished and economical friend said on this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. You want to hear from me? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. After a while. I have the floor. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor; but the Chair is not quite sure that anybody has the floor. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRISP. We would like to hear something about it. I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House?

Mr. LORIMER. This resolution has not.

Mr. CRISP. This seems to be a very important measure to be considered without a report.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I have some little knowledge touching this matter. This joint resolution has passed the Senate, and its importance is such that my colleague is justified in asking the House to consider this Senate resolution; and I feel quite sure, with the amendment which my colleague stands ready to accept, to be offered by the gentleman from Texas, who is entirely familiar with this matter, that the Government will be amply protected; and I want to ask the gentleman from Georgia, with that statement, if he can not see his way clear to let the matter be considered by the House at this time, with such an amendment to be offered?

Mr. CRISP. I only want to understand what it is. I have not heard one single suggestion that has been made over there. It has been a private conversation between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and gentlemen on that side, and I could not hear it, except to know that it is a proposition (I gathered that much) to pay $50,000 or $60,000 to an architect in Chicago.

The SPEAKER. If the House would consent to be in order something better might be done.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection to its consideration if we can go into Committee of the Whole, where it ought to go, and where we can have some explanation.

Mr. HENDERSON and other members. That is right.

Mr. CRISP. That would not delay it more than a moment.

Mr. LORIMER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in perfecting designs, plans, and specifications for a public building at Chicago, Ill.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking should not this have first gone to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked to go into Committee of the Whole. By unanimous consent the House can do almost anything. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider joint resolution S. R. 50, which has been reported to the House. The first thing in order will be to report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. LORIMER. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with all general debate, and that the bill be taken up by sections under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed, and that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. CRISP. I want to have some explanation of the bill. That is what we went into committee for.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. CRISP. The Hall is very large, and gentlemen will have to elevate their voices so as to be heard.

Mr. LOUD. We ought to have some copies of this resolution so as to know what we are passing upon.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, some time ago certain of the members of this House called upon the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him if the work of drafting the plans and specifications for the public building at Chicago had been begun. He made the statement to the members who waited upon him that he had not yet money enough to do that work, and he would not begin the work until a sufficient sum of money had been set aside from the appropriation already made to complete the work. He agreed to draw a resolution, which he did. He sent it to the Senate on the 9th of January, and this resolution that we are now considering was drafted by the Secretary of the Treasury. It passed the Senate on Monday last.

Now, I want to say that $30,000 has been already set aside out of the $300,000 appropriated last year, and the Secretary says that that amount is just sufficient to do the work of preparing the plans for the building, and that he will not have enough left out of the $30,000 to do any other work on the building. He stated further that the Supervising Architect had so much work to do that it would be impossible for him to look after the construction of so large a building and give it the time and attention that would be required during the three or four years that would be occupied in completing the building; and for that reason he said he wanted about $25,000 more set apart out of the appropriation for the purpose of employing an architect to assist in making the plans and specifications and to supervise the construction.

Mr. PICKLER. As I understand, this appropriation is for the purpose of paying an assistant supervising architect?

Mr. LORIMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, will this appropriation pay for the services of this assistant architect as long as they will be needed to complete the building?

Mr. LORIMER. The Secretary of the Treasury said he thought that $25,000 would be the limit of the amount he would require for that purpose in order to complete the building—$25,000 in addition to the $30,000 already set aside.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what is the special necessity of bringing this matter before the House at this time, when there are many similar cases throughout the country, notably one in my own city, where a post-office building was provided for by an appropriation four years ago. In the city of Philadelphia, also, a mint building was provided for five or six years ago, and provision was likewise made for other public buildings in other places; all of which buildings are in practically the same situation as this proposed public building in Chicago. The same story is told to gentlemen who urge the construction of those buildings that is told to the gentleman from Chicago, namely, that there is not sufficient force in the Department to prepare the plans. Now, if this subject is to be dealt with here at this time, why should not all the other buildings be included in the proposition as well as the Chicago building? I know that I have been urged for several years to give way to Chicago, and have been assured that Chicago would help us in return, but when it comes to helping us, Chicago does not respond. [Laughter.]

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, when the appropriation of $300,000 was made the construction of a temporary post-office in Chicago was immediately begun. That building is completed, but I want to call attention to the fact that the Government building proposed to be erected at Chicago is intended not alone for post-office purposes. The offices of the collector of internal revenue, of the collector of the port, of the subtreasurer of the United States, and of the local pension bureau are all to be located in that building. At present the Government is at an expense for the rent of quarters to accommodate these different Government offices amounting each year to more money than what is asked for here by the Secretary of the Treasury to pay for the services of an assistant architect.

Mr. MILES. As I understand the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, the total appropriation which it is proposed to make for architectural designing for this building is $55,000. Is that right?

Mr. LORIMER. That is right.

Mr. MILES. What percentage is that of the total cost of the building?

Mr. LORIMER. One and three-eighths per cent.

Mr. MILES. That is for designing alone, I understand.

Mr. LORIMER. For designing, for preparing the specifications, and for superintending the construction of the building.

Mr. MILES. That amount is for the preparation of the plans, etc., but it does not include any money for the actual supervision of the building.

Mr. SAYERS. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that the gentleman from Illinois has agreed that I shall offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MILES. Very well.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury states that he can not proceed with the work on the Chicago building until a sufficient amount of money has been set aside for the particular purpose provided for in this resolution. As I have already said, the Government is now at an expense of at least $25,000 a year for the rent of offices in different office buildings in Chicago, and one year's delay in the construction of this public building will cost more than the amount now asked for by the Secretary. Another disadvantage of the present situation is that the people of Chicago who desire to do business with the Treasury Department, with the collector of internal revenue, and with the Post-Office Department are compelled now to go to three different sections of the city, whereas they could just as well and as easily do their business in one place if this building were completed. It is clear, therefore, that there is no economy in delaying the completion of this work. On the other hand, it will cost the Government every year that the work is delayed at least $25,000 for the hire of offices.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I desire to say that I went to the Supervising Architect myself, near the close of the last session of the last Congress, and asked him why the buildings that had been appropriated for during the Fifty-first Congress had not yet been constructed, or even the plans for them prepared. In reply he stated that he had not sufficient force in his office to make the plans or to begin the construction of those buildings. Now, the complaint which the gentleman from Illinois makes in regard to the Chicago building is the general complaint in regard to all the buildings that were appropriated for in that Congress. The appropriations were nearly all made at that time. No appropriations for public buildings have since been made, except four or five at the close of the last Congress. Now, Mr. Chairman, in one way or another, either as the gentleman from Illinois is proceeding or in some other way, there must be some change made in that Department, so that the work already provided for shall go on. The money must be appropriated in some way, so that when a building has been authorized by Congress and the appropriation for it has been made the work of construction shall at least begin. Now, I do not think it right that when money has been appropriated for public buildings so far back as the Fifty-first Congress, not even a plan has, in some cases, yet been made. Such was not the design of these appropriations. The purpose was that the work on these buildings should be commenced and their construction completed within a reasonable time.

Now, in this way or in some other way, appropriations of money for the making of these plans will have to be provided for. For my part I think it necessary that there should be a thorough overhauling of the office of the Supervising Architect. Gentlemen know how that office has grown up. There never was any law originally creating it as it now exists. It grew up as the result merely of a custom or practice. I believe the fact to be as claimed here—for such is the best information I can get from the Supervising Architect—that either he must have money for making these plans or he can not start this building.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] whether he has a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury or the Supervising Architect approving this proposition?

Mr. LORIMER. The letter for which the gentleman inquires went to Senator CULLOM.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is there a letter indorsing this bill?

Mr. LORIMER. There is not only a letter in existence indorsing this bill, but this bill was drawn by the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the letter in the RECORD this morning?

Mr. LORIMER. I do not know that it is.

Mr. CANNON. When did the bill pass the Senate?

Mr. LORIMER. On last Monday. I repeat that this resolution was drafted by the Secretary of the Treasury himself.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Illinois is looking for the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, I wish to submit one or two remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]?

Mr. DOCKERY. I understand that he does.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that this House desires to appropriate whatever sum may be necessary and proper for the preparation of plans and specifications. I am also persuaded that, whether or not it is carried in this bill by way of amendment, there will be appropriated now or hereafter a sufficient amount for supervision of the construction of the building. Now, in order that we may intelligently consider this bill, with the amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has agreed to accept, we ought to have the items of both estimates. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr CANNON], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who advocates this proposition, knows the practice which has obtained heretofore in considering appropriations, especially appropriations that do not come before the House with the sanction of any committee, which have not even been considered by a committee. He knows that in such cases we ought to have from some authoritative official source the items of the estimate.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] has already agreed to accept the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Texas authorizing the expenditure of this appropriation and the $30,000 heretofore appropriated, not only for the preparation of plans and specifications, but also for the supervision of the construction of the building. The gentleman having agreed to accept that amendment, it goes without saying that in his judgment $55,000 will be a sufficient sum for the preparation of plans and specifications and also to pay for the supervision and construction of the building. Now, I do not believe that any gentleman on this floor will claim that $55,000 is sufficient to cover both the preparation of the plans and specifications and also the supervision of the construction of the building from start to finish. Yet the gentleman in charge of this bill has agreed to accept an amendment which will limit the cost of all this work to the sum of $55,000. Now, then, we ought to deal fairly with ourselves and fairly with this great interest at Chicago. We ought to give enough money for the preparation of the plans and specifications, and there should also be provided hereafter a sufficient sum to pay for the supervision of the construction of the building. But this House ought not to be misled on this question by the acceptance of the amendment to which I have referred. I apprehend that the result of the matter will be that the $55,000 will all be expended for the preparation of the plans and specifications.

The question now becomes material, what is the correct and necessary amount to be appropriated for the preparation of plans and specifications? So far as it appears from any evidence yet submitted on this floor during the course of the debate, there is not a line or a word or a syllable or a figure tending to enlighten this Committee of the Whole on that question. Now, this bill ought not to be rushed pellmell through this House before such information has been furnished. We all want to do what is right in respect to this matter; but these able advocates of the interests of the city of Chicago—not any more zealous than some of the rest of us—ought at least to give us the items of the estimates of this appropriation. So far as I am concerned, I shall not be misled by the acceptance of the amendment providing that the $55,000 shall also cover the expense of the supervision of the construction. No one, I imagine, believes that this sum will be sufficient for both purposes. At all events, Mr. Chairman, that is not the issue here. The question is, what is necessary to prepare the plans and specifications; and in determining that question I ask gentlemen who represent Chicago to state to the House frankly what sum it is proposed to give to the architect and assistant architects who are to prepare these plans. If those estimates aggregate $55,000, and if they are reasonable estimates, I shall cheerfully support the bill now pending. But until such information is secured, I do not believe this House ought to be asked either to approve or to disapprove the pending proposition.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Missouri, before taking his seat, permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. If I can have the consent of the gentleman from Illinois, who is entitled to the floor, I will do so.

Mr. COX. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the language of the bill. It is as follows:

> That in addition to the amount authorized to be expended for the temporary employment of draftsmen and skilled service in the preparation of plans and specifications for the public building at Chicago, Ill., as provided in the sundry civil appropriation act approved March 3, 1895, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, out of the appropriation heretofore made, a sum not exceeding $25,000 for the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for said building.

Now, an appropriation of $30,000 was made for that purpose heretofore. This bill is to permit the employment of another man, as an assistant, at $25,000 more. I want to know what the original supervising architect is going to do when we supplement him, as we propose now to do, with an assistant?

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I have no further information than that which is carried in the bill. I will say to the gentleman that I have been a diligent inquirer after the truth, but have not secured any yet.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Missouri has said, $55,000 is a very small amount of money to prepare the plans and to supervise the construction of this building, which is to cost ultimately $4,000,000 or over. I agree that it is a very small amount. I know something of building, and have had some experience in that line myself, and I know that there is not a firm in the city of Chicago who would undertake the construction of this building at less than perhaps 5 per cent.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right there favorable to the proposition?

Mr. LORIMER. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. Is there not in this country an association which includes all of the reputable architects?

Mr. LORIMER. There is.

Mr. MILES. Have they not a fixed rate of percentage upon the cost of buildings?

Mr. LORIMER. I think so.

Mr. MILES. Is that not 3½ per cent when it includes also supervision?

Mr. LORIMER. I am not so sure. I had the impression that 5 per cent was the amount.

Mr. MILES. I mean including the supervision. Does it not amount to 3½ per cent on the total cost?

Mr. LORIMER. I can not state the exact amount.

Mr. MILES. You have said that the cost of preparing the plans and supervising this building is less than 2 per cent?

Mr. LORIMER. Yes; 1⅞ per cent.

Mr. MILES. And does the gentleman hope to have the designs prepared, and the specifications, and the supervision of this building done at such a rate per cent upon the whole cost? I do not think you can.

Mr. LORIMER. I was about to say that I considered it a very small amount for the work; but the Secretary of the Treasury stated to me that he thought $30,000 would pay for the drawing of the plans.

Mr. COX. Just at that point let me ask the gentleman if he has a letter or written statement of any kind from the Secretary of the Treasury to that effect?

Mr. LORIMER. No; I have not. But I will state now what the Secretary of the Treasury stated to me. He said that $30,000 would pay for the drawing of the plans, and that he thought $25,000 would pay, or about that sum, for the services of the assistant architect. Now, if $30,000 will pay for the drawing of the plans, and it takes three or four years to construct the building, then this assistant will be paid at the rate of about five or six thousand dollars a year for assisting in the work, and probably you can find a competent architect in this country who would be willing to work for that sum. If that be true, then preparing the plans and superintending the structure can be done, according to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the amount of $55,000, which is asked.

In addition to that, if the architect is not employed, and the Secretary of the Treasury is not authorized to employ an architect, then they can not begin the construction of the building, and every year that the construction of that building is delayed will cost this Government $25,000, or perhaps more than that, in money; so that just one year of delay is throwing away $25,000 or more in Chicago.

I can see no objection to taking up the resolution and passing it, and giving to the people of Chicago that which they so much need at the present time.

Mr. ATWOOD. Will the gentleman inform me how much this building is to cost in all?

Mr. LORIMER. Four millions of dollars.

Mr. ATWOOD. Is that the amount fixed by law?

Mr. LORIMER. It is.

Mr. ATWOOD. And it can not be exceeded?

Mr. LORIMER. Not unless the law is changed.

Mr. ATWOOD. Then, in my judgment, $55,000 will not be enough, nor more than a quarter enough. You will have to come back to Congress three or four times for the same amount of money that is appropriated in this resolution.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury is the person who is in charge of the affair. He is the man to whom we have to look for the construction of this building. If he says that $55,000 is sufficient for this purpose, then we ought to be satisfied with that.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me.

Mr. LORIMER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the attention of the committee, I desire to submit a few remarks in reference to the pending resolution. My judgment is, from the experience of the office of the Supervising Architect in employing superintendents of buildings during their construction, that the $25,000 additional will be sufficient for architectural supervision. Allowing the building to be completed within four years, $25,000 will make a salary of something over $6,000 a year, and I venture the assertion that the Secretary of the Treasury can advertise or send out notices that he desires to employ a competent person for the architectural supervision of this building for four years and that he will get fully one thousand letters from competent architects who will be willing to undertake it for $25,000, provided its completion is not delayed longer than four years. I think the appropriation is large enough, and I also think the expenditure upon this building for plans and specifications and for architectural supervision should be limited to $55,000. I do not think it ought to exceed that amount. At the same time the party employed in giving this architectural supervision should be amply paid—about $6,000 a year.

Before I sit down I will say further that there is a prime necessity for the immediate construction of this building. As I understand, the old building has been torn down or is about to be torn down, and the Government has been compelled to construct temporary buildings upon some vacant lots in the city. The buildings constructed upon these vacant lots will not be sufficient to meet the demands of the courts that sit month after month in the city of Chicago, not to speak of other branches of the Government service. It will cost the Government $28,000 a year, if I remember correctly, to rent rooms for judicial purposes in that city, and unless this building is undertaken at once and brought to completion as rapidly as practicable, considering the size and character of the building, we shall spend five times or ten times this amount in rent that we could avoid if we proceeded with its immediate construction.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, does not the gentleman from Texas know that it would be impossible, in advance of the performance of at least two-thirds of the work of the architect, to give to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] the categorical information that he requires before he will support this bill? I should like the judgment of the gentleman from Texas on that point. The gentleman from Missouri insists on a lot of information which he ought to know, as a practical man, could not possibly be given to him at this time.

Mr. SAYERS. I take it, Mr. Chairman, that all the committee desires to know is what will be the reasonable length of time within which this building will be completed. If it shall be completed within four years, then if this bill shall become a law, we shall have $25,000 with which to pay for architectural supervision. I understand from the gentleman from Illinois who has this resolution in charge that the $30,000 heretofore appropriated has been sufficient for the preparation of plans and specifications?

Mr. LORIMER. That is the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SAYERS. And all that is necessary now is to have an additional appropriation for the architectural supervision?

Mr. DOCKERY. Oh, no.

Mr. SAYERS. That is what I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say.

Mr. LORIMER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the attention of the gentleman from Texas, I will say that as I understand, the experience of the United States in the construction of a great public building in Chicago has not been an agreeable one. Somewhere from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000 in the last twenty-odd years has been expended for a post-office and custom-house in Chicago upon the square fronting the Grand Pacific Hotel. Most gentlemen here know the location.

That building was a flat failure. It is dangerous to life. It is not suited to the purposes for which it was erected; and although it has been occupied during these years, for repairs and otherwise it has been wonderfully expensive, and it is a burden now, because it costs something to get rid of it. Now, then, with the great increase in population in the city of Chicago, which we can not promote much, and which nothing seems to be able to stop, with its 2,000,000 of people——

Mr. QUIGG. How many?

Mr. CANNON. Sitting in the gateway of the commerce of the great West, the whole Northwest, as well as the East, are interested in sufficient quarters in the city of Chicago to enable the officials of the Government to properly transact the public business; and it has become an absolute necessity that this building should be removed and something put in its place. Gentlemen understand something about the ground and its formation at Chicago; the great difficulty in getting foundations; how these difficulties have been overcome, practically, by that enterprising people; how the architects and builders have been equal to the occasion; and in the light of their experience how these great buildings, 20 stories high, have been constructed, and safely constructed.

This building is authorized to cost $4,000,000, to be completed in four years. We have put up a temporary building on the Lake Front to house the post-office. The courts of the United States are in the Monadnock Building; the other Federal offices are moving over into the McNally Building—just moving in. We made an appropriation on yesterday, practically, of $35,000 for the furniture and authorizing its movement out of the public building and temporarily having it adjusted to the McNally Building. The rents are simply enormous. It is desirable to do this building rapidly, and to do it well. Now, then, for the plans and specifications—that is, where it is done upon the scale down here in the Supervising Architect's Office, working by the day and the month, and where the draftsmen are upon salaries—for the material alone in drafting these specifications and making these plans, like unto those made for the building to be torn down, and under the same system, $30,000 is an exceedingly low estimate to cover the cost.

Now, then, public sentiment in Chicago and throughout the Northwest, if not the whole country, demands that in this instance at least—and I believe it would be a wise precedent to make as to all public buildings—that there be a new departure, namely, that the local talent, that the best skill, under the plans of which the city has been builded, and safely builded, should be utilized on the plans for this four-million-dollar public building. This $25,000 that is proposed to be made available out of money already appropriated will enable the Secretary of the Treasury to go into the open market and get the best talent and best skill, that has been educated through the years that have passed in the construction of great buildings in Chicago, to bring their plans; and, with this appropriation, secure those plans; and so at a total of $55,000 to make complete specifications to build this building from the foundation to the cupola, if there is to be a cupola. That is, all the architectural work, including the plans, specifications, and drawings, is to be paid for out of this $55,000 appropriation.

Gentlemen may ask, do I understand $55,000 will be sufficient to pay the man who draws the plans and specifications, who creates this building, if you choose, upon paper, to stand over this building for the four years while it is being constructed, and to see that the material is inspected and the contract complied with in the construction? I answer no; I do not so understand. Public buildings are not erected in that way. There are superintendents of the building, men sufficiently skilled in plans and specifications, who inspect the materials and see from hour to hour and from day to day, from foundation to cupola, that the construction complies with the creation that is first made in the brain of the architect and wrought out with the aid of the draftsmen.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Is it not true that Chicago is the great distributing post-office for the whole Northwest?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes. The crying necessity for this work, and at once, is very great. I want to be frank with the House. As I understand it, $25,000 will utilize the best talent in Chicago and throughout the country that is skilled in putting up buildings in that locality, and for the want of the utilization of which $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 was worse than thrown away in the great pile that is now to be torn down before we can commence this construction.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How long does the gentleman think it would have taken the Government of the United States, proceeding by its usual processes, to have erected the buildings that were erected by the Chicago people for the World's Fair?

Mr. CANNON. Ask me something easy, my friend. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I asked the same question of my colleague, Mr. BOUTELLE, when I met him there, and he said he thought that if the Government had begun at the time Columbus discovered America and had been diligent, it would have got about two-thirds through by the time of the World's Fair.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I understand the gentleman from Illinois to admit frankly, as is his usual habit, that $55,000 would not be sufficient to prepare the plans and specifications and also to supervise the construction?

Mr. CANNON. I think it would not.

Mr. MILES. When the gentleman speaks of "supervision" he limits it to what is called architectural supervision, and does not include such supervision as a superintendent of buildings would give?

Mr. CANNON. That is correct. I think this bill covers the ground. The Secretary of the Treasury has control of the expenditure of the money. If the expenditure of this $25,000 is authorized, the Secretary goes out into the open market and employs the best skill in the country to make a plan and prepare specifications for this great building. In my judgment that is necessary, and therefore I am for the appropriation.

In conclusion, let me call attention to what I understand to be perhaps the most magnificent public building on earth, the one that is just approaching completion here, our great Library building. That was not planned under the ordinary rules which control the designing of public libraries. The design was paid for by appropriation, and, while perhaps the building is not constructed entirely in accordance with the first plan, I am sure there is no one of us that has seen it grow month by month and year by year who is not glad that Congress took that departure in procuring the plan for that great building. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the Senate joint resolution without amendment may pass, because the sooner it passes the sooner we shall get at this work and get at it properly, and the sooner we shall get rid of the burden we are bearing in the form of rent paid in imperfect quarters in the great city of Chicago for housing the Government officers in inconvenient quarters there. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken I wish to say a few words about this method of considering a proposition of this kind. I may premise by saying that I am not opposed to the erection of this public building at Chicago. I favored it at the last session of Congress because I had looked into the question and knew the necessity for it. Of course, I might have prevented the consideration of this joint resolution at this time by making an objection, but I was willing that the House should go into Committee of the Whole to have it explained, so that members might understand the case fully.

There has been some explanation, but I submit that it has not been that character of explanation upon which this committee or the House ought to act on an important business proposition of this kind. In the first place, we spend about $200,000 a year to maintain the Supervising Architect with his assistants and surroundings, and I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who has been here for a long time and has been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, what is the business of the office of the Architect of the Treasury, for which we pay $200,000 a year? What is the Architect's occupation?

Mr. CANNON. His occupation is to superintend a number of assistants, draftsmen, copyists, etc., in the making of plans and specifications for public buildings; but, if my friend will allow me, I will say that most gentlemen who have had much to do with that office believe that it does not promptly perform, and sometimes does not well perform, its functions.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know about that, but I suppose that we keep this officer and pay $200,000 a year to maintain his office to do this very work of preparing plans of public buildings. But, Mr. Chairman, from the pending proposition it would appear that he does not engage in that work, or that he is considered incompetent to make plans for this Chicago building, or else that there is some other reason, I do not know what, which actuates gentlemen in this case and causes them to propose to go outside of the Supervising Architect's Office and employ an architect not connected with the Government. Now, there ought not to be any necessity for this, and if there is necessity, we ought to know the reason, and why this special appropriation is necessary. If this bill had gone to a committee of the House, as it ought to have done, we would have had a report from that committee explaining the situation. As it is, we have not a line from the Treasury Department as to the necessity of this bill; we have not a line as to the desirability of this bill. Of course the gentleman from Illinois states the substance of an interview between himself and the Secretary, and of course we all know that he states it correctly. I do not question that at all; but it has been usual in the House of Representatives, as well as in the Senate, when it was proposed to deal with a measure like this, to send it to the Department and invoke the judgment of the officer in charge of that Department. If there is any reason why this money ought to be appropriated the Secretary ought to have an opportunity of saying so. If the Supervising Architect is incompetent, let us know that. If he is overworked so that he can not attend to this business, let us know that. If this is a proposition to give some architect in Chicago or elsewhere, not connected with the Government, a job, let us know that. Let us know what the purpose of the proposition is. That, I submit, is only right and fair.

Now, we have already appropriated $30,000 for the plans; and, as I understand, the proposition of this bill is to appropriate $25,000 more for the plans. I confess my ignorance as to what plans of this sort are worth, or rather what the services of gentlemen who produce such plans are worth. I know that of course services of that kind are sometimes very valuable; but I think the House ought to have some information to go upon the record showing what the services to be paid for in this case are worth.

My friend from Texas proposes to add to the bill an amendment so as to cover by this appropriation the supervision of the construction of the building. That is well enough; but it will not amount to anything; it will probably be struck out in conference, or, if not, it can be changed in the next appropriation bill.

Practically, as I understand, this proposition is to add $25,000 to the appropriation already made for the purpose of obtaining plans for the Chicago public building. Now, the Supervising Architect, I presume, is not required to do anything in this matter until the contract is made; so that if my friend from Texas is right in his amendment there is no urgent necessity for the passage of this resolution. I do not know whether the contract is yet let. Will the gentleman from Illinois state whether they have the plans yet?

Mr. LORIMER. The plans are not yet made.

Mr. CRISP. This is to complete the payment for the plans?

Mr. LORIMER. No; this is to employ an architect to assist in drawing the plans and to assist in supervising the construction of the building.

Mr. CRISP. What is the $30,000 for?

Mr. LORIMER. It is to be used for the same purpose. That amount not being enough, the Secretary of the Treasury asks for $25,000 more.

Mr. CRISP. But he does not ask it in any report to Congress.

Mr. LORIMER. Does the gentleman suggest that we send this proposition back to the Secretary of the Treasury to get a report from him?

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no; what I suggest is that the bill go to a committee of the House, so that they will let us know in due time all about the matter. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds should consider this proposition before the House acts upon it.

Mr. LORIMER. I want to say to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Treasury himself drew this bill.

Mr. CRISP. Then he ought to have sent a communication to Congress on the subject.

Mr. LORIMER. The resolution was sent to the Senate and was passed there; and I think that very probably the Secretary of the Treasury sent a communication to the Senate.

Mr. CRISP. Of course that would meet my suggestion, if we knew that to be a fact.

Mr. LORIMER. I do not know it to be a fact.

Mr. CRISP. We would like to know it; we would like to know the necessity for the passage of this resolution. We would like, in other words, to have it stated, if it be true, that notwithstanding we pay $200,000 for services in connection with the drawing of plans for public buildings, the Secretary of the Treasury recommends an expenditure of $55,000 additional for the preparation of plans for this building in Chicago; that he proposes to appoint an architect to supervise the Supervising Architect in the drawing of plans for that building. If that is the fact, we ought to know it.

Mr. LORIMER. Did the gentleman understand my statement that I called with other gentlemen on the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him to begin the work for the plans of the Chicago building——

Mr. CRISP. Yes, I caught that statement.

Mr. LORIMER. And that the Secretary of the Treasury stated in reply that there had not been a sufficient amount of money set aside to complete the work of drawing the plans and of looking after the construction of the building?

Mr. CRISP. What is the difficulty in having the work done by the present force?

Mr. LORIMER. He said that the Supervising Architect had so much to do that he feared he could not properly look after this work; that he wanted to employ an assistant architect to aid in supervising the drawing of the plans and specifications for the building and in looking after its construction. That is the statement the Secretary of the Treasury made to me; and he suggested that he would draw a resolution (if Senator CULLOM would look after it in the Senate and I take care of it in the House) providing that a sufficient amount of money be set aside from the money already appropriated, to complete the work of drawing the plans, so as to begin the construction of the building.

Mr. CRISP. Does the gentleman know for what purpose the Secretary of the Treasury has set down in his estimates now before the Committee on Appropriations an estimate of $50,000 increase for this building? Does that cover the same matter as the bill now proposed, or is it for something else?

Mr. LORIMER. I do not know.

Mr. CRISP. That is one of the facts that we ought to know; and if this bill should go to a committee we would know all those facts. There is no better system on earth for accomplishing legislation intelligently than our system of first referring a bill to a committee and having the committee investigate the matter. Our committees are composed of gentlemen of each party; and in their investigations they send for witnesses, they examine documents, they finally make report, and then when we need information on any point we can get it from the committee. I repeat what I have learned from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], that the Secretary of the Treasury has sent in his estimate increasing by $50,000 this very fund—an estimate of an appropriation to go into the regular appropriation bill of this year. We do not know whether that is intended to cover this $25,000 or something else.

Mr. LORIMER. I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury would say that $25,000 would be sufficient in addition to what he has to begin and complete the work, and at the same time ask an additional appropriation of $50,000 for the same purpose. It does not seem likely that the Secretary of the Treasury would make such a statement and demand at the same time.

Mr. CRISP. The trouble is that he has not made one statement in reference to it.

The gentleman must remember that the Executive Departments of the Government only communicate to the House of Representatives through the Speaker. No private conversation could be considered a report from the Secretary of the Treasury upon any proposition. The rules of the House require that whenever the Secretaries desire to communicate to the House they can do so only by committing the communication to the Speaker of the House, by whom it is referred to the appropriate committee. But what took place between the gentleman himself and the Secretary of the Treasury is simply a private conversation, and can have no more effect than any other private conversation.

Mr. LORIMER. Then it must be taken for what it is worth.

Mr. CRISP. Ah! but it is merely a second-hand statement, and not sent officially by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LORIMER. Then the second-hand statement is to be taken for what it is worth.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman, of course, understands that this statement or such a statement in the courts would not pass at all. It is a mere expression of opinion.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend from Georgia will allow me, I think I can make an explanation that will reconcile the difference that seems to exist.

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. This proposition says:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, out of the appropriation heretofore made, a sum not exceeding $25,000 for the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for said building.

Now, I call the attention of my friend from Georgia to the fact that that indicates the demand of legislation—not the demand of appropriation——

Mr. CRISP (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois and myself have been too long together here for him to undertake to intimate that you do not legislate on appropriation bills.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I am not speaking of that. I say that it is legislation. Under the law as it now stands, if the Secretary had in the vaults of the Treasury for this building four million or forty million dollars, he could not utilize it for the employment of this supervising architect without the power that we propose to give him here. He could not do anything that would enable him to utilize the people who have skill in Chicago building for this purpose.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Well, if my friend from Georgia will permit me to occupy the floor; I am holding it in his time.

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. POWERS. If I understand the matter rightly, in the original proposition $30,000 was set apart to pay the charges of an architect to prepare the plans and specifications of this building?

Mr. CANNON. No; for the preparation of plans and specifications; and under the law he would utilize the Treasury Department, through the Supervising Architect's Office, only.

Mr. POWERS. Very good; then $30,000 of the total appropriation was to be allowed for that purpose?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Now, the Supervising Architect and the assistants are paid officers of the Government, are they not?

Mr. CANNON. They are.

Mr. POWERS. Then, for what purpose was the $30,000 set apart to be used?

Mr. CANNON. Why, for paying salaries——

Mr. POWERS. Salaries in the Supervising Architect's Office?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. CRISP. No; the gentleman is mistaken. Two hundred thousand dollars is appropriated for that purpose. No part of the $30,000 goes to keep up the annual expenses of the Supervising Architect's Office. The gentleman certainly knows that.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, the employment of draftsmen and the clerical assistance necessary must be paid from the appropriation for the public buildings, and there is a limitation placed upon it that it shall not exceed the sum of $200,000 yearly, and this is drawn from these various appropriations for public buildings throughout the country. So that this $30,000 does go exactly in the payment of salaries for clerical services. I will say to my friend that it is peculiar in that respect. He has probably not examined it.

Mr. POWERS. My point is this: Does not the $25,000 now proposed to be appropriated go to the same service that has already been appropriated for?

Mr. CANNON. In addition thereto; and the object of the additional twenty-five-thousand-dollar authorization is to utilize the best skill and talent that is not in the public service for these plans.

Mr. POWERS. The object of the twenty-five-thousand-dollar appropriation is to employ an outside architect?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. To do the work that it was supposed the Supervising Architect himself would do, or his office?

Mr. CANNON. To assist him in doing it, just as we did with the Congressional Library.

Mr. POWERS. Now, does the gentleman say that the Supervising Architect pays out that $30,000 originally appropriated to any outside parties?

Mr. CANNON. To draftsmen and other employees.

Mr. POWERS. Then it comes to this, does it not, that we are appropriating $55,000 to pay outside parties?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; $25,000.

Mr. POWERS. I wish the gentleman would make that clear. I do not think it is understood here.

Mr. CANNON. I will read it:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to use, out of the appropriation heretofore made, a sum not exceeding $25,000 for the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for said building.

Mr. POWERS. What I want to get at is this, because I know the gentleman can give me the information if he understands the inquiry: I want the gentleman to explain to the House how the $30,000 heretofore appropriated is to be paid out, and also how this $25,000 is to be paid out. I understand that the $25,000 is to go to outside parties.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. POWERS. To assist the Supervising Architect?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Now, I wish to know how the Supervising Architect is going to utilize, in addition to this outside service, the $30,000 that has heretofore been appropriated.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely as he now would if he would go on.

Mr. POWERS, How is that?

Mr. CANNON. In the payment of copyists, draftsmen, and the whole clerical force in the Supervising Architect's Office, which force is paid from the appropriations for public buildings throughout the country, now limited to $200,000. That is, that there can not be more than $200,000 taken from the appropriations for public buildings to pay the force in the Supervising Architect's Office.

Mr. POWERS. Then the $30,000, in short, will go to pay the salary of officials in his office?

Mr. CANNON. Draftsmen and so on.

Mr. POWERS. For the work done in preparing these plans?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. Then what becomes of the suggestion that the $25,000 is to pay for supervision?

Mr. CANNON. In my judgment it is only such supervision as architects ordinarily give. The supervision of the actual construction of a public building comes from the superintendents or inspectors, and it would be just as well to look this squarely in the face. This is a proposition to appropriate $25,000 to bring in outside talent to assist in the preparation of these plans, so that we may, as we hope, avoid having another four or six million dollar failure in the construction of a public building in Chicago.

Mr. POWERS. Then the $25,000 does not go to pay some official for supervision of construction?

Mr. CANNON. Only as architects always supervise constructions?

Mr. POWERS. Now, what is the occasion for paying for any supervision of that building before you have got your plans made?

Mr. CANNON. There is no supervision until the plans are made.

Mr. POWERS. The supervision is as the work progresses along from month to month and year to year?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and can not commence until the plans are made.

Mr. POWERS. Is there any occasion to appropriate money for that purpose until the work is commenced?

Mr. CANNON. We are not appropriating for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The money is appropriated now.

Mr. POWERS. The architectural supervision can not take place until the construction begins, can it?

Mr. CANNON. We have got to have the plans first.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. I am talking in the time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the other gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]?

Mr. CANNON. By the permission of his colleague only.

Mr. CRISP. I will yield the floor in a moment or two.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks this is a safe, sound precedent to set in Congress——

Mr. CANNON. I do.

Mr. LIVINGSTON (continuing). To employ outside skill, at a cost of $25,000, to prepare plans for a public building? Do you propose to follow it up with all the other public buildings of the United States for all time to come?

Mr. CANNON. If I could have my way about it, I would utilize the best architectural skill in this country in the construction of public buildings; and believe I could save 10 or 20 per cent by it. [Applause.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then you would have to reorganize the division in the Treasury Department?

Mr. CANNON. I do not desire to make an unnecessary attack upon that division.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. CANNON. I believe it could be changed or reorganized, and in many respects to the profit of the Government, without abusing it at all.

Mr. CRISP. My friend from Illinois I think practically stated—I was going to say "admitted," but perhaps that would not be the right word—"stated," I will say, a fact I intended to try to elicit by a question. He said we should deal frankly with each other; and I will agree to that; and I understood him to say that this was an appropriation of $25,000 to provide plans for a Chicago building. Now, is not that all there is in it—to employ additional architects, with an opportunity to get $25,000 to erect a building for Chicago? Is not that all there is of it?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that is the kernel of this proposition, as I understand it. It may have some additions.

Mr. CRISP. Some trimmings. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. No; it may have some additional things, but that is the kernel of the proposition; and I am clearly of the opinion, from the standpoint of economy, that it is a wise expenditure.

Mr. CRISP. I did not expect the gentleman, in view of the peculiar surroundings, to oppose this proposition.

Mr. CANNON. I am for it, as I was for the Library building over here.

Mr. CRISP. Yes, sir; but the Library building was erected in a different manner from that in which this building is to be erected. It was erected by a gentleman who—no man knows better than my friend—has never had a superior in the supervision and management of the erection of great buildings. I mean General Casey.

Mr. CANNON. But the plan was made outside of the Supervising Architect's Office, and we paid for it.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know that I shall oppose this resolution, but I want the House to understand it. Here is a proposed bill authorizing the construction of a building at Chicago. We understand when gentlemen come in asking for a public building they are then very anxious to conform to all the usages in this respect, and reduce as far as possible all the expenses incident to it. They came in and asked for the erection of a public building at Chicago at a limit of $4,000,000. As public buildings are ordinarily constructed under the supervision of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury, they asked that $30,000 be given to that officer to make plans of the building. In that condition the bill is passed. Now these gentlemen are here appealing to this House and asking for $25,000 more; and for what? to employ an assistant architect—an assistant architect! to devise plans for this building. That simply means that it will take this building out of the office of the Architect of the Treasury and give it to some gentleman of some city, somewhere, to make the plans for that building.

Now, that is all there is in it. If it is necessary to do that in this case, why not abolish the office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury? Why spend $200,000 a year to keep up that paraphernalia, and then, when important work is to be done, to come here and ask for $25,000, not for the supervision—do not confuse this thing—not to do a thing but furnish plans; and when he furnishes the plans he gets $25,000 and his work is ended. Now, then, if it is necessary to do this we ought to abolish this Supervising Architect; and I am not sure but that it would be a good plan to let out all plans for public buildings to the architects generally of the country; it certainly would be economical, if we have to keep up a Supervising Architect's Office at $200,000 a year and at the same time pay $25,000 for the plans of a single building in a single city. That is exactly what you are doing; and if this committee votes to report this resolution favorably, it simply means that, in addition to what has been done in respect to this very appropriation, $25,000 is to be paid for suggestions from some outside architect to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury. That is all.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no estimate at all to this session of Congress for the continuance of the construction of the building at Chicago, the reason being, I suppose, that the Supervising Architect's Office has not been able and will not be able to complete the plans and specifications in time to enter into a contract during the next fiscal year involving a greater sum than the amount appropriated by the last Congress.

Mr. CRISP. I will ask my friend from Texas, because he knows and the matter has passed from my memory, how many public buildings are there the construction of which is now authorized by law, but which have not been built?

Mr. SAYERS. I can not answer definitely; but I should say from forty to seventy-five.

Mr. CRISP. From forty to seventy-five cities of the United States have secured legislation authorizing the construction of public buildings within their limits?

Mr. SAYERS. You mean cases where the buildings have not been completed?

Mr. CRISP. Yes; and the larger portion of them perhaps not begun, though I am not sure about that. I do know, however, that there are some of them, at least, on which no progress has been made. Now, all those public buildings stand exactly on the same footing with the Chicago building. They are all necessary, and they ought to be constructed, but here we have a proposition to take this case out of the general rule and pay $25,000 for the privilege.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is correct as to the purpose of this proposition, but I will say to him that the case of Chicago is entirely different from that of any other city. Take Philadelphia, for instance. The construction of a mint building there was authorized by the Fifty-first Congress, and that building has not been commenced, although $1,000,000 or thereabouts has been appropriated for the purpose of constructing it. But the present mint building in Philadelphia is being used, whereas in Chicago the building which this new public building is intended to supersede has been or is being torn down, and the United States courts are being held in rented premises at a cost of $25,000 or $30,000 a year.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman knows that we are paying five times that amount of rent in this city.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. Then why is the construction of the Chicago building more important on that account than the construction of other buildings here and elsewhere?

Mr. SAYERS. It is important to save the rent we are paying there.

Mr. CRISP. But is it not important to construct the other public buildings in other places that have been authorized, so as to avoid paying rent? Is it not important to construct additional buildings here?

Mr. SAYERS. They are being constructed. The new post-office building here, which will be completed next year, will accommodate 2,500 clerks.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; but it will not more than half supply the deficiency of accommodation for Government offices.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; I think it will supply more than half. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think one of two things ought to be done; either the Supervising Architect's Office ought to be increased to such an extent as will expedite the preparation of plans and specifications and the construction of this building, or outside help ought to be obtained. It would, in my opinion, be false economy to delay the construction of this building, the old one being pulled down and the Government being compelled to pay a large yearly sum for rent of other buildings for the courts and other branches of the public service. It would, I think, be inexcusable extravagance to do otherwise.

Mr. Chairman, if the Secretary of the Treasury says that he ought to have this amount of money, and that if he does not get it the plans and specifications for the building can not be completed soon enough to begin its construction during the next fiscal year, then, under the circumstances, he ought to have the money. The gentleman from Illinois assures us that the resolution under consideration was actually prepared by the Secretary, and his assurance should be sufficient.

Mr. MILLIKEN. And he ought to have the money also for all the other public buildings which have been authorized.

Mr. SAYERS. There is not the same necessity for the other buildings that there is for this building.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman knows that we are paying rent in nearly every place where there is no public building, and the smaller the place the larger the rent in proportion to the cost of a suitable building.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, if this matter were my own I would probably have followed the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] and would have come here armed with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury; or I might have asked first to have the bill sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I agree with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that that is the wiser and safer course to pursue as a general rule, and if this were a new proposition being considered for the first time in Congress I would insist upon that course now. But this measure comes here from the other end of the Capitol indorsed by that branch of Congress, and the situation is practically this: This joint resolution does not increase the limit of the appropriation for this building. That is fixed at $4,000,000. When the Representative from the district [Mr. LORIMER], who went with his Senator—Senator CULLOM, if I may be permitted to mention his name—to the Treasury Department to see if he could not get things in motion for the construction of this building, knowing how much it was needed, the Secretary said to him in effect: "I can not go ahead with your building unless I have a supervising architect. Thirty thousand dollars is already segregated from the $300,000 appropriated, but I must have $25,000 more before I can move, and if you and your Senator will put a proposition through Congress, by joint resolution or otherwise, which will give me that amount, I will go ahead with the work."

Now, the gentleman from Illinois is serving his first term here. He did not know the technicalities which would come up, but in accordance with an understanding between him and Senator CULLOM a joint resolution has been passed by the Senate, and the gentleman from Illinois now calls it up here—a joint resolution based upon a suggestion emanating from the brain of the Secretary of the Treasury, and upon conditions which justify this proposed legislation.

Now, one word about the suggestion that there may be in this some scheme for the benefit of some pet architect. I wish to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that when a committee of this House investigated the World's Fair we had before us Mr. Burnham, the chief architect engaged in the construction of the Fair buildings, and we learned from him, when we were pressing him as to the value of architectural services, that under no circumstances would he make a contract which would give him a less salary than $50,000 a year. It was in evidence before us that $10,000 was paid to several leading architects simply to consult as to the construction of an individual building. That evidence appears in the record of that investigation.

Now, we have before us the fact that this is a pressing matter. This discussion has enlightened us as to the situation. This resolution has already passed the Senate. The sum of $28,000 is now being paid in that city by the Government for rent. Under these circumstances, I waive the feeling which ordinarily I would share with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] that these things should go to a committee. We see that no mistake can be made; that the aggregate of appropriation is not increased; that these skilled services are needed; and with the experience before us of a building being torn down because of want of architectural skill in its construction, I say let us not hesitate at this initial point, but let us lay the foundations broad and deep. Let us in constructing this building avail ourselves of the highest architectural skill, so that this four-million-dollar building may not have to be torn down a few years hence on account of inefficient work. Let us act wisely; and I hope we shall act now. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, let me express at the outset my regret that this bill did not in the first place go to the appropriate committee; because I think it is always wise to have matters of this kind considered by a standing committee before they are brought up here for action. Yet, unanimous consent having been given for the consideration of the bill, we have it now before us, and I desire simply to explain as briefly as possible the situation in which we are placed.

As has been already said, the Office of Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department rests upon a simple act of legislation creating the Office of Supervising Architect, while all the machinery of that office rests on appropriation bills. For example, here is the provision in the last legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act:

Office of the Supervising Architect: In the construction branch of the Treasury: For Supervising Architect, $4,500; and one assistant messenger; in all, $5,220.

Then there comes in this provision under which all this machinery in the Office of the Supervising Architect depends:

And the services of skilled draftsmen, civil engineers, computers, accountants, assistants to the photographer, copyists, and such other services as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary and specially order, may be employed in the Office of the Supervising Architect exclusively to carry into effect the various appropriations for public buildings, to be paid for from and equitably charged against such appropriations: Provided, That the expenditures on this account for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, shall not exceed $200,000.

Now, that is the whole legislation on which the Supervising Architect's Office rests. That sum of $200,000 which is to be equitably assessed on the various appropriations for public buildings is the fund which the Supervising Architect uses to employ, at whatever compensation he sees fit, architects, draftsmen, clerks, copyists, and all other officials employed in his office. Contrary to the principle carried for years in our legislative appropriation bills, by which this House in general controls every official and his salary in a distinct item, we give the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purposes of the Supervising Architect's Office, $200,000 to be assessed upon appropriations for public buildings, from which fund are paid the expenses of preparing plans and specifications and of employing superintendents of construction in the erection of all our public buildings.

Now, how comes about the slow processes by which public buildings are now being constructed? The difficulty is simply this: First, that in the machinery of that office, as in most Government offices, there is so much red tape that often the regular office force is not able to do the work as efficiently as an outside force controlled by ordinary business methods would do it. That is incident to whatever work the Government does. Whenever it undertakes to do a particular piece of work it does it more slowly and more expensively than a private establishment would do similar work.

But there is another special difficulty that comes up. We authorized for a number of years the construction of an unprecedented number of public buildings. We have not done much in that direction during the last four years. I believe that hardly a single public building has been authorized during the last four years. But it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that there are to-day a large number of public buildings authorized the construction of which has not yet been commenced, besides a great many buildings which are proceeding by the slow, creeping process, which is always very expensive.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Supervising Architect say the difficulty is that Congress is not sufficiently liberal in its appropriations for the Supervising Architect's Office. They claim that they can not procure the services of draftsmen, clerks, copyists, etc., in sufficient numbers, under the appropriations made (although we give them $200,000), to keep up the work, and that on account of that fact slow progress is made with reference to these buildings.

Now, to get outside of that slow process in the construction of the building at Chicago, which ought to be expedited, I agree entirely with what has been said upon that subject to-day—in order to get outside of that process in the last sundry civil bill we provided for an expenditure of $30,000, to be taken from the appropriation for the building itself, to prepare the plans and specifications. That, of course, gave the Supervising Architect's Office not only the $200,000 of the general appropriation, but $30,000 additional to be devoted exclusively to this building.

I understand from what has been said on the floor during this discussion that the Secretary of the Treasury says that $30,000 is not enough to prepare the plans and specifications, and that $25,000 more must be had, making $55,000 in all, to prepare the plans and specifications. I do not have sufficient information to know whether this is a larger sum than ought to be appropriated for that purpose or not; but I call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is simply given authority to expend not exceeding this amount for the purpose named. I take it for granted that he will expend the sum properly in order to secure a more rapid completion of the building. I think this building ought to be expedited; there is no doubt about that. It is not only a public building in one of the greatest cities of the land, but in one of those cities which is growing most rapidly, and I believe that it is a matter of economy, as well as justice to the people of that city and to the country, to expedite its construction. I do not know that there is any better way to do it than that proposed here, which is to specifically set apart the sum named for the purpose contemplated.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Maine that there has been no expression on this floor by any gentleman in this discussion in opposition to expediting the work on that building. The only question is as to the proper compensation that should be awarded to the architect.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that.

This should be exclusively under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I feel we can rest safely in his discretion in the circumstances. I wish the matter had been considered first by the proper committee of the House, for we should have had more definite information; but unanimous consent was given to take it up in this way without the prior consideration of the proper committee, and we must base our action on such information as has been produced in the discussion. For myself, after an examination of the matter with some care, it seems to me that the plan proposed here is, on the whole, perhaps the only practical solution of the matter now. Hence I shall give my vote for the resolution.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope the gentleman from Maine, my colleague, will permit me to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have been ready and are ready now to consider any bill which may be sent to them.

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly. I do not mean to say that it is any fault of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COX. Why not consent that it shall go there now?

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman must not forget that I have an understanding with him as to an amendment.

Mr. LORIMER. I supposed that that amendment was already in. I had already given consent to it.

Mr. SAYERS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Illinois," in line 6, insert: "And for the architectural supervision of its construction."

Mr. DINGLEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that perhaps it would be better to insert the amendment at the close of the paragraph. That is where reference is made to the designs, plans, and specifications of the building.

Mr. SAYERS. That, I think, would be proper, Mr. Chairman, and I ask that the amendment be added at the close of the bill in line 13, after the word "building."

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. SAYERS, it was agreed to.

Mr. LORIMER. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill as amended back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill back with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CANNON. Is that motion made by way of amendment, or does it take precedence of the other?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it takes precedence of the other. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The motion of Mr. CRISP was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER], that the committee rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the amendment, and recommend to the House that as amended it do pass.

The motion of Mr. LORIMER was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill., and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, and with the recommendation that as amended it do pass.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LORIMER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE PUBLIC LANDS AND THEIR WATER SUPPLY.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk a concurrent resolution, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, under the direction of the Department of the Interior, 6,000 copies of a paper contained in the Sixteenth Annual Report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, entitled "The public lands and their water supply," together with the accompanying maps and illustrations, of which number 1,500 copies shall be for the use of members of the Senate, 3,000 for the use of members of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 for the use of the Geological Survey.

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to report back to the House two bills (H. R. 328 and H. R. 347) both having for their object the disposition and sale of lands known as the Vashon Island Military Reserve, in the State of Washington. Those bills were sent to the Committee on Public Lands, but they relate to lands still under the control of the Secretary of War, and they should be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask for that change of reference.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the correction in the reference will be made.

CHAPLAIN AT WEST POINT, ETC.

Mr. HULL. I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Military Affairs and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 1309 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for the appointment at the United States Military Academy at West Point of "one chaplain, who shall also be professor of history, geography, and ethics, and one assistant professor of the same," is hereby repealed, and instruction in said branches of history, geography, and ethics shall hereafter be given by such other professors and instructors as may be designated by the Secretary of War; and the duties of chaplain shall be performed by a chaplain detailed from the Army.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection, if it is to go to the Committee of the Whole, where it should go.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read, and I think my friend will not ask for the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole after he hears the reading of the report. The result of it will be a cutting down of expense.

The SPEAKER. The report can be read if there is no objection.

The report (by Mr. HULL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the appointment of chaplain at West Point, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the same back with the recommendation that it be amended by striking out all after the word "repealed," in the eighth line, and inserting the following:

"Provided, That the duties of chaplain at the Military Academy shall hereafter be performed by a clergyman from civil life, to be appointed by the Secretary of War for a term of four years, and the said chaplain shall be eligible for reappointment for an additional term or terms, and shall, while so serving, receive the same pay and allowances as are now allowed to a captain mounted."

The duties of chaplain have heretofore been performed by the professor of history, geography, and ethics. These duties have so largely occupied his attention that the duties of chaplain have been neglected.

The recent death of the professor, who was also the chaplain, has made a vacancy, and it is the unanimous opinion of the academic board at West Point that the law should be amended so that whoever shall be appointed chaplain can devote his entire time to such duties, and the instruction in branches heretofore taught by the chaplain can be taken up by other professors now in the Academy.

It will be a saving in the expenses of the Academy, and result in an improved condition so far as the moral instruction is concerned.

The committee recommend the pay of captain mounted, which is $500 additional pay to Regular Army chaplains, but regard this post of sufficient importance to justify this slight increase.

A letter from the Superintendent of the Military Academy is also submitted, and made part of this report.

Mr. HULL. I ask that the letter of the Superintendent of the Academy be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 22, 1896.

SIR: Referring to the bill now before your committee for amending section 1309, Revised Statutes United States, I beg leave to submit the following statement of the needs of the Military Academy, which call for some legislation upon the subject of the chaplaincy.

It is hardly necessary, I presume, to point out the importance of the most careful attention to the moral and religious training of the cadets. These young men, removed as they are from their homes and family influences, should be given every advantage that it is possible to give them for the cultivation of those elements of character without which the high training which their minds and bodies receive can bring but secondary results. The degree of success which has attended the efforts of their religious advisers heretofore is shown by the fact that more than one-third of them are communicants, over 80 being of the Protestant and over 30 of the Roman Catholic faith. It may be doubted whether so large a percentage of church communicants can be found in any other lay institution.

It is the opinion, however, of the academic board that these good results have been obtained in spite of certain difficulties which can be removed, and that but for those difficulties the results would have been still greater. The duties of a professor are to some degree those of a disciplinarian. There can be but little doubt that many young men are deterred from seeking the advice of the chaplain if they see in him a master rather than a friend, and if they fear the imputation that their visits to him are for the purpose of gaining his favor as a professor rather than due to religious interest. It is the opinion of the board that the chaplain will have a better opportunity if he be relieved of all academic duties.

The instruction now given in the department of history, geography, and ethics, the head of which is, under the present law, also the chaplain, can very well be given in the department of law without overloading that department. Under the latest allotment of time the department of law will have the first class for two hours on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, while the department of history, if continued, will have the same class for two hours on Tuesdays and Thursdays of each week. Neither department will be fully employed, which is at variance with the usually compact organization of the academy. If the two be consolidated, the head of the department will still have but ten hours a week in the class room, which is less than the time employed by a majority of the professors.

Having abolished the separate department of history, etc., it remains to provide for the duties of chaplain, and here lies the opportunity to do a great good or a great harm to the country. There is probably no place in this country where the wrong man can have so far-reaching an influence for evil. He is to come in contact with and profoundly influence the characters of a body of young men every one of whom is to be placed in a position of grave responsibility under the Government. The man fitted to occupy the position of chaplain must be young, active, highly educated, talented, manly, sympathetic, and broad in his religious views; one who can command the respect and affection of the cadet, and at the same time share his feelings; one whose own convictions are deep and strong, and who can at the same time teach the Christian religion to persons of every shade of feeling and sentiment, without too much insistence upon dogma or church etiquette. Such a man being not easy to find, it is important that the field of selection should be the widest possible. The whole body of clergy of the United States is not too wide a field. To provide that an Army chaplain be detailed, as has been proposed, is to restrict the choice to a very narrow field, and is, in my judgment, full of dangers. Having made the field as wide as possible, the social standing and the compensation offered should be such as to attract the best material in it.

It is the opinion of the academic board that the chaplain should, in these respects, be on a footing of equality with themselves; that is, that when first appointed he should receive the pay and allowances of lieutenant-colonel. Aside from the expense of living at West Point, which is greater than at less isolated places, and the importance of giving the chaplain abundant means for entertaining the cadets at his table, it is not to be expected that the person possessing the rare combination of qualities enumerated above will consent to enter a community in which he is not to receive a consideration equal to the highest.

The advantages of the proposed legislation are, in brief:

1. Greater efficiency of the chaplain in his special work.
2. Fuller employment of the department of law.
3. Economy in reducing by one the number of assistant professors.

4. Greater simplicity of administration, it being necessary to detail as instructors officers who shall be satisfactory to only one head of department instead of to two, as at present.

Yours, respectfully,

O. H. ERNST,
Colonel of Engineers, Superintendent United States Military Academy.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that this reduces the number of employees in the Military Academy and reduces the expenditure?

Mr. HULL. It does. It dispenses with the employment of one professor, who is now, because of length of service pay, getting $4,500 a year, and it cuts off an assistant professor.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the pay of the chaplain?

Mr. HULL. Two thousand dollars a year and his allowance of quarters as captain of cavalry.

Mr. PICKLER. What does that amount to?

Mr. HULL. It amounts to quarters and the privilege of purchasing his supplies at the Government stores.

Mr. PICKLER. Do you expect to obtain the services of the chaplain described there for $2,000 a year?

Mr. HULL. He also gets pay for length of service, which makes it $500 a year more than a chaplain of the Army.

Mr. PICKLER. What is this theology that is laid down?

Mr. HULL. That is the theology of the Superintendent of the Academy. The board does not prescribe what a man's religious view shall be.

Mr. PICKLER. Why were the services of the chaplain absolutely unsatisfactory?

Mr. HULL. They were absolutely unsatisfactory on the ground that he was a teacher more than a chaplain.

Mr. PICKLER. I mean the office of chaplain heretofore.

I ask if it has been unsatisfactory in its results upon the army officers?

Mr. HULL. It is unsatisfactory to the academic board at West Point, on the ground they set out there that he was more of a teacher than a chaplain.

Mr. PICKLER. I noticed, Mr. Speaker, that there is quite a platform of principles or doctrine to be taught by this chaplain, and I only inquired as to whether that is binding on the chaplain.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn. [After a pause.] I withdraw the motion for a moment to allow my colleague to ask a change of reference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine must withdraw his motion entirely.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do.

FIRING ON SCHOONER HENRY CROSBY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith, in compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of December 28, 1895, a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of all the correspondence of record in the Department of State, in relation to the schooner Henry Crosby, fired upon while at anchor at Azua, Santo Domingo, December 10, 1893.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 22, 1896.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask a change of reference of the bill (H. R. 3202) to pay for improving the streets in front of the post-office site in the city of Sacramento, State of California, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Claims. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I also ask change of reference in the bill (S. 427) to provide for a municipal building and court-house in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It should go to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the changes of reference will be made. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

HOWARD ELLIS.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the petition of Howard Ellis, late consul at Rotterdam. I ask the Clerk to read it, and I also ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the reading of a memorial. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not hear the request.

The SPEAKER. The request is for the reading of the memorial.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. It is simply the petition of Howard Ellis.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Was the request to print the memorial in the RECORD?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. It was also to print the memorial in the RECORD.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is very unusual to print memorials in the RECORD, and I dislike to have to make objection.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Then I ask that it be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no objection to its being read, simply for information. Do I understand that the object of the memorial is to make an inquiry?

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Simply as to the injustice done Mr. Ellis when he was consul at Rotterdam.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It ought not to be printed in the RECORD; but I do not object to its being read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the memorial will be read. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The memorial was read.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion, the Chair submits a request of a member.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MARSH, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker, as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics of that Department suggesting the printing of a compilation of trade returns of the United States from 1790 to 1895—to the Committee on Printing, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, together with a copy of a report of a survey for a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 108); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3827) to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the International Marine Conference of 1889, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 110); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MCRAE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, adversely reported (Report No. 109) the bill (H. R. 14) for the relief of purchasers of timber and stone lands under the act of June 3, 1878; and the same was, under the rule, laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1409) providing for the construction and equipment of two steam revenue cutters for service on the Great Lakes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1478) providing for the construction and equipment of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Atlantic Coast of the United States, with headquarters at the port of New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1243) for the construction of a dry dock at Key West, Fla., to submit an adverse report thereon. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 541) for the relief of Orin R. McDaniel, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 213) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Missouri River between its mouth and the mouth of the Dakota or James River; and across the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Minnesota River, in the State of Minnesota, and South Port, in the State of Louisiana; and across the Illinois and Des Plaines rivers between the mouth of the Illinois and the city of Joliet, in the State of Illinois; and to prescribe the character, location, and dimensions of the same, to report it with amendments. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1419) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the city of Chamberlain, S. Dak., to report it adversely, with the recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed, as a similar bill, in fact the identical bill, has already been reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 176) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1353) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the building of a railroad bridge at Little Rock, Ark.," approved March 2, 1891, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 295) making an appropriation for the improvement of the road to the national cemetery near Pensacola, Fla., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 256) to establish a military post at or near the city of Grand Forks, in Grand Forks County, in the State of North Dakota, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 39) to provide for the construction of a military and commercial telegraphic line along the coast between Yaquina, on Yaquina Bay, and Port Orford, to connect with Newport, on Yaquina Bay; Alsea Bay; Florence, on Siuslaw Bay; Gardiner, on the Umpqua River; Empire City and Marshfield, on Coos Bay, in the State of Oregon, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 174) to construct a road to the national cemetery at Dover, Tenn., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 340) to amend the military record of John H. Skinner, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1445) to authorize the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian and Oklahoma Territories, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 167) for the relief of John O'Keane, of the State of Washington, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FRYE. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report favorably a bill to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service, with a written report, as a substitute for the bill (S. 1461) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service. I ask that Senate bill 1461 be indefinitely postponed, and that the substitute be treated as an original bill and placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill (S. 1461) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service will be postponed indefinitely, and the original bill will be read by title and placed on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 1701) to promote the efficiency of the Revenue-Cutter Service was read twice by its title.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1675) to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State or Territory into another State or Territory, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 556) to prevent the carrying of obscene literature and articles designed for indecent and immoral use from one State or Territory into another State or Territory, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 253) for the relief of Charles H. Wilson, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 252) for the relief of Stalnaker Marteney, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

ADMISSION TO SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. SEWELL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 46) entitling veterans of Indian wars to admission to soldiers' homes in the United States on the same terms as veterans of the late war of the rebellion, to report it adversely. I beg leave to read an extract from the present law on this subject in explanation of the adverse report:

SEC. 2. That all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the regular and volunteer forces of the United States who are disabled by disease, wounds, or otherwise, and who have no adequate means of support, and by reason of such disability are incapable of earning their living, shall be entitled to be admitted to said Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, subject to like regulations, as they are now admitted to existing branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

So there is no occasion for the proposed law; and the committee directed me to report the bill adversely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

SANTEE SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. ALLEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to ask that the papers I present relating to the bill (S. 1284) making appropriation to pay the Santee Sioux Indians in Nebraska and South Dakota for lands, unpaid annuities, and for other purposes, be printed as a public document, and that the original papers be returned to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. VEST (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1719) to provide a temporary government for that portion of the Indian Territory heretofore occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, and to be hereafter known as the Territory of Indianola; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 1720) for the relief of John W. Kennedy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1721) to remove the charge of desertion from John Lyons; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANCHARD introduced a bill (S. 1722) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas, by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1723) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge over and across Caddo Lake, at Mooringsport, La., by the Kansas City, Shreveport and Gulf Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1724) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Black River, in Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1725) authorizing the Kansas City, Watkins and Gulf Railway Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Red River at the city of Alexandria, La.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1726) to approve and ratify the construction of a bridge across the Red River, between the States of Arkansas and Texas, at a point above the town of Fulton, in Arkansas, on said river, built by the Texarkana Northern Railway Company, but now owned and operated by the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company, and to authorize the latter company to maintain said bridge over said waterway, subject to certain stipulations and conditions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1727) to reorganize the Pay Corps of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1728) granting a pension to W. F. Randolph; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1729) to prevent the oppressive exercise of judicial power in the courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ALDRICH introduced a bill (S. 1730) for the relief of Thomas F. Tobey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 1731) for the relief of Maj. William M. Maynadier, a paymaster in the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1732) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Holroyd, widow and administratrix of the estate of John Holroyd, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1733) for the relief of Capt. W. J. Kountz; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1734) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah H. Wood; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HILL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1735) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue arms to National Guards; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1736) to grant a tract of land in the District of Alaska to the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1737) granting a pension to James G. Hartzell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1738) to regulate interstate traffic in wild game; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 1739) granting an increase of pension to Elijah N. Wines; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 1740) to amend section 5294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or mitigate fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 1741) to authorize the Muskogee, Oklahoma and Western Railroad Company to construct and operate a line of railway through Oklahoma and the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. CALL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 62) for the survey of the route of a ship canal across the Peninsula of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. WILSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 812) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, in making the inquiry concerning the prices of armor for naval vessels under the resolution of the Senate of December 31, 1895, be authorized to employ stenographers and to send for persons and papers, and that the expenses of the inquiry shall be paid upon proper vouchers from the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

ZEBULUM PARKER.

Mr. GEAR. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to inform Mrs. Albert Hurn, sole surviving heir of Zebulum Parker, as to what use, if any, was made by the Government of the plans and patents of Zebulum Parker in the construction of the canal around the Des Moines Rapids, Iowa.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think the resolution is in proper form. In the first place——

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "Mrs. Albert Hurn," etc., and insert——

Mr. PLATT. That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. That he be "directed to inform the Senate as to what use, if any, was made by the Government of the plans and patents of Zebulum Parker."

Mr. GEAR. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to inform the Senate as to what use, if any, was made by the Government of the plans and patents of Zebulum Parker in the construction of the canal around the Des Moines Rapids, Iowa.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN ALASKA.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer a resolution. I do not apprehend that it will incite any opposition. I ask for its consideration at this time.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, notwithstanding the laws of the United States prohibiting the importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquor in the Territory of Alaska, complaints are made that intoxicating liquor is imported, manufactured, and sold within the limits of the Territory; and

Whereas the collector of customs and the presence of a revenue cutter have not been able to put a stop to the aforesaid illicit traffic; and

Whereas the facility with which intoxicating liquor is introduced and sold within the Territory begets a disregard for law, fosters smuggling, and enables the illicit traffic to become so well organized as to render it almost impossible of detection; and

Whereas the liquor traffic in Alaska, carried on as it is in violation of existing law, has a demoralizing effect upon the people, both white and native: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate such information as he may possess of the ways in which the existing laws are violated, the extent of such violations, the defects, if any, in existing laws which enable such violations to occur, and to suggest such changes in the laws now in force as will enable the United States to regulate or prohibit the importation, manufacture, or sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. FAULKNER. I fully concur with the views expressed in the resolution offered by the Senator from California, and have introduced a bill that is now before the Committee on Territories covering the question embodied in the resolution. I sincerely hope that as soon as the information is obtained from the Secretary of the Interior the Committee on Territories will act upon that bill and report something to relieve that section of the country from the misfortunes that follow the illicit selling of liquor all through the Territory of Alaska.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution be read once more.

The resolution was again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

FLORIDA SHIP CANAL.

Mr. CALL submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to examine into the subject of a ship canal across the peninsula of Florida, and report to the Senate as to its advantages to the commerce of the Gulf of Mexico, and to report to the Senate in regard to it.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to inquire what has become of the resolution which I introduced and which was partially considered yesterday morning. I desire to call it up when the morning business is closed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that the Senate is still under the order of morning business. Are there further concurrent or other resolutions?

IMPRISONMENT OF EUGENE V. DEBS.

Mr. CALL. I have been requested to offer a resolution, which I ask may be read and lie over under the rule.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie over, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of seven Senators shall be appointed who shall be charged with the duty of inquiring into the imprisonment of Eugene V. Debs for an alleged contempt of court, who shall report to the Senate and recommend such legislation as may be necessary for the just enforcement of the law and the protection of citizens from arbitrary and offensive exercise of judicial power.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RIGHTS OF CITIZENS OF ARMENIAN BIRTH.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, on motion of Mr. CULLOM, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant requesting information in regard to the treatment of naturalized citizens of the United States of Armenian origin and their families by the Turkish Government.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, January 23, 1896.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill., with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHICAGO, ILL.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that the joint resolution which has just come from the other House be laid before the Senate. I should like to have the Senate concur in the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, on page 2, line 14, after the word "building," to insert "and for the architectural supervision of its construction."

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESERVATION OF HERDS AND FLOCKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WARREN on the 20th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That in view of the late unprecedented shrinkage in numbers and values of farm animals throughout the United States, as shown by the last published reports of the Department of Agriculture, the attention of the Committee on Agriculture is hereby especially directed to this subject, with the request to consider and report to the Senate, or to invite the Finance Committee to consider and report, by bill or otherwise, what legislation, if any, is necessary to preserve our herds and flocks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit some remarks upon the resolution under a notice which I have heretofore given.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Wyoming has a right to address the Senate on his resolution.

Mr. PUGH. I understand the resolution which I have charge of has precedence of the resolution of the Senator from Wyoming. I should like to inquire as to the status of my resolution?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that, under the rule of the Senate, his resolution went to the Calendar.

Mr. PUGH. That was not my understanding. Precisely the same action, as I understood, was taken on the resolution yesterday morning as had been taken on the two or three mornings previous—that it retained its place, and was to be presented to the Senate in its order by the President of the Senate. I certainly did not understand that it went to the Calendar, or I should have objected and asked that the resolution retain its place and go over, as it had done on three or four different days previously, without prejudice. If that is the position of the resolution, I ask that by unanimous consent it be restored to its former place and that it be in order to be presented, as it has been heretofore, during the morning hour. Of course I shall give way to the Senator from Wyoming to address the Senate on his resolution, as he has given notice of a desire to do so; we always yield to such requests, and I have done so uniformly. I ask unanimous consent that my resolution be restored to the position it had and that I thought it retained and had not been displaced from by the action taken yesterday morning. That was certainly the understanding of the friends of the resolution on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will look at page 976 of the RECORD, the Chair will see that it must have been the understanding of the Senate that this resolution merely went over without losing its place. The request was that it should be laid aside. Then the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] said:

We can bring up this question again after the Senator from Colorado has concluded his speech.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] then said:

I shall be obliged if the Senator from Alabama will let the resolution lie over temporarily.

The Vice-President then announced:

The resolution will go over for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I have not forgotten the circumstances under which the resolution of the Senator from Alabama was before the Senate yesterday. The RECORD shows that the predicament in which the resolution would find itself was foreshadowed, and the Senator was warned of the very difficulty which he now encounters.

Mr. PUGH. I deny that statement.

Mr. HILL. The Senator's denial can be put in the RECORD, but the fact remains nevertheless.

Mr. PUGH. If such a statement was made it was not heard by me. I certainly would not have consented.

Mr. HILL. The difficulty was that the distinguished Senator did not give the attention to my opening remarks to which they were entitled. I distinctly stated that I regretted that the Senator from Alabama should press the resolution at that time. We tried to have an agreement so that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] could make his speech. We could not agree. Therefore, the resolution was pressed about ten minutes before 2 o'clock.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from New York asked me distinctly to allow the resolution to go on the Calendar. He made that distinct request of me, and I refused it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will please not interrupt me without my permission. The Senator would make no agreement whatever. He pressed the resolution for consideration, and forced me to speak. I stated in my remarks substantially that I should only be enabled to speak a few moments and then I should have to discontinue, that that was the predicament unless the Senate displaced the regular order of business which was to come up at 2 o'clock. With that situation perfectly understood, the resolution was then before the Senate, although I protested that I did not wish to speak then and have my remarks cut in two, but I was forced to speak, and in about five minutes my remarks were cut off by the announcement that it was 2 o'clock by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] who was then in the chair. Therefore, the resolution of the Senator from Alabama has gone where all such resolutions go, to the Calendar, to be called up at some future time by motion of a Senator. The resolution of the Senator from Wyoming is properly before the Senate. He gave notice that he desired to speak this morning, and he has a right to proceed. That is the exact parliamentary situation.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President, I have no idea that the Senator will ever finish his speech on my resolution, whenever he can delay action upon it and get time to make his remarks some other day.

I am very much embarrassed by the statement which the Senator makes, that the status of my resolution and the destiny of my resolution was fully understood. I am constrained to say that in my belief he was the only Senator who did understand that the fate of the resolution would be what he insists upon now it was when 2 o'clock arrived for the unfinished business. I think he is the only Senator who understood that that would be the effect of the action taken on my resolution, or of anything that was said about it, or that occurred about it.

Mr. HILL. I trust the Senator does not mean to make that question. I think there are several Senators who understand it precisely as I do. The clerks so understand it, the Presiding Officer so understands it, and I think the Presiding Officer yesterday so understood the effect of it. The Senator then walked right into the place which had been left open for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. PUGH. I can easily be entrapped by such a skillful parliamentarian as the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I tried to avoid it and to have an agreement so that when we did take up the resolution we could finish it. I do not like to discuss the resolution for a short time and then to be cut off. Whenever the resolution shall be taken up let the discussion be continued until it is finally acted on. It is a very important resolution.

Mr. PUGH. So I understand, and so I have frequently stated. Ever since it has been in order during the morning hour for my resolution to be laid before the Senate it has been laid before the Senate, and I never imagined that anything which occurred yesterday morning placed the resolution in a different position from what it occupied when the hour of 2 o'clock was reached previously, when the resolution had been laid before the Senate. I have been misled if that is the decision of the Chair, and I do not believe that many Senators understood that that was to be the position that the resolution occupied on account of the action taken yesterday morning. I ask the Vice-President to decide what is the status of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that this is a matter over which the Chair has no control. The rule of the Senate must be enforced. The resolution was considered up to the hour of 2 o'clock, when, under the rule, it went to the Calendar. The Senator from Alabama now asks unanimous consent——

Mr. PUGH. I now move that the resolution be taken from the Calendar and placed upon——

Mr. HILL. The Senator from Alabama can not take the Senator from Wyoming off his feet. The Senator from Wyoming has a right to address the Senate on his resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. The Chair will state to the Senator from Alabama that the Senator from Wyoming was recognized, and yielded to the Senator from Alabama to ask unanimous consent. Does the Senator from Alabama desire to ask unanimous consent that his resolution be again placed before the Senate?

Mr. PUGH. I ask that it may occupy the status it did yesterday morning, and then that it go over, without prejudice, to allow the Senator from Wyoming to address the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question to the Senate, and then will recognize the Senator from Wyoming. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. I object to the speech of the Senator from Wyoming being interrupted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate——

Mr. PUGH. I understand the Senator from New York objects to my request.

Mr. HILL. I object to it being made at this time. The Senator from Wyoming is entitled to the floor, and he has not yielded, as I understand.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit to the Senate the request of the Senator from Alabama that the resolution be taken from the Calendar and lie on the table subject to call. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. To that I respectfully object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. PUGH. I give notice that I shall renew my motion tomorrow morning in the morning hour and call for the yeas and nays on it. The Senator from New York can not escape going on record on the resolution.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What has become of the resolution reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]?

Mr. CULLOM. That resolution has not been called up for the reason that the Senator from Wyoming had given notice that he desired to speak this morning. I determined, therefore, to wait until he had concluded his remarks, when I shall attempt to call up the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to know if the resolution does not come up as of right after the Senator from Wyoming shall have concluded?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will determine that question when it arises.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope, whether the resolution comes up at that time of right or not, that the Senate will allow me to call it up for disposition.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I desire to renew the notice given yesterday that I shall ask the Senate, immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow, to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is before the Senate, on which that Senator is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it has occurred to me during the late very interesting debates in this body upon foreign relations, gold and silver, bonds and loans, popular and otherwise—mostly otherwise—to inquire, are there not other interests equally important that should be kept fully abreast in the public mind with these acknowledged burning subjects? For instance, how fares thefarmer and stockgrower? What efforts are we making to sustain the greatest of all our interests, that of agriculture?

The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] have in late speeches touched upon certain of the products of agriculture, and to some of the contentions of the Senator from Missouri I intend briefly replying before I am through. Comparisons disclose that the returns from all other avocations and industries combined are insignificant when measured by the fabulous total of our farm production. I need only mention the one product of hay, little thought of and rarely ever discussed, to illustrate my proposition. The annual hay crop of the United States is worth over $450,000,000—more than four times as much as our annual product of both gold and silver at its coinage value, or over six times its present market value, and about one and one-fifth times as much as the total annual product of gold and silver of all the world. Yet hay is seldom mentioned in the halls of Congress, while gold and silver engage us at times for days, I might almost say months, together. I desire not to detract one iota from the importance of our precious metals, and I wish to be distinctly so understood, but I use this comparison to fortify my position, that I am justified in inviting your attention at this time to grave questions of public policy respecting certain languishing industries.

I desire, in proceeding with the discussion of live stock this morning, not to attack any political party as such, but I propose to follow the official figures in this investigation, casting the responsibility where I believe it rests, and let the chips fall where they may.

AGRICULTURE SUFFERING.

I contend that agricultural interests, along with others, are in a bad condition, and that there is a remedy; that the present bad condition is the direct consequence of the application of one theory or policy, and its remedy lies in adopting an opposite policy; that free trade or insufficient tariff is the bad policy; that a sufficient tariff, with incidental or even intended protection, is the remedy. The former is the policy of the Democratic party, the latter of the Republican party.

A CONDITION, NOT A THEORY, NOW CONFRONTS US.

I do not propose at this time to elaborate on theories and policies; "it is a condition, not a theory, that now confronts us"; and I offer, Mr. President, the official books and figures of the Democratic Administration to demonstrate that condition.

The Agricultural Department in its report No. 123, Division of Statistics, gives a table showing the numbers and values of farm animals in the United States from 1868 to 1895. An examination of that document can not fail to fill our hearts and minds with apprehension, as well as with a desire, if we be patriotic citizens, to overcome or improve the appalling conditions made there so painfully apparent. To be fair, and brief as well, I will date my comparisons no further back than the year 1879. It was in that year—because of resumption of specie payment—that values became stable, and gold, silver, and paper reached a parity, which has been since maintained. Dividing the time between 1879 and the present in cycles representing Republican and Democratic Administrations, the result is the following:

LIVE STOCK TABLE.

A comparison between Republican and Democratic Administrations as shown by the values of domestic animals, horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and swine.

When we resumed specie payment in 1879 our domestic animals, horses, mules, cattle, sheep, and swine, were valued at	$1,445,423,063
During the ensuing six years, until the election of Mr. Cleveland in 1884, the values increased to	2,467,868,924
A gain during six years of Republican rule of	1,022,445,862
During the ensuing four years, until the election of Mr. Harrison in 1888, values decreased from	2,467,868,924
To	2,409,043,418
A loss during four years of Democratic rule of	58,825,506
During the ensuing four years, until the second election of Mr. Cleveland in 1892, values again increased from	2,409,043,418
To	2,461,755,698
A gain during four years of Republican rule of	52,712,280
During the last two years, under the second Administration of Mr. Cleveland, and under proposed and accomplished free trade and sweeping tariff reductions, values again decreased from	2,483,506,681
To the comparatively insignificant total of	1,819,446,306
Showing the enormous loss in two years of Democratic rule of	664,060,375

Mr. President, over $664,000,000 loss in two years in live stock! Do the American people comprehend this? That their losses in live stock alone have been $1,100,000 for every working day during the past two years? And this, too, in these piping times of boasted plenty, prosperity, and pugnacity—toward England!

That there may be no misunderstanding the facts, I ask that the official table of the Department of Agriculture be printed as a part of my remarks:

Number and value of farm animals in the United States for the years 1868–1895.

January 1—	Horses.		Mules.		Milch cows.
	Number.	Value.	Number.	Value.	Number.	Value.

1869	6,332,793	533,024,787	921,662	98,386,359	9,247,714	361,752,676

CLASSIFIED TABLE.

Mr. President, I will give the classified shrinkages for the last one year quoted as to both numbers and values. All classes shrank except milch cows.

	Number.	Value.
Milch cows alone gained	17,229	$3,603,068
Horses shrank	187,821	192,494,219
Mules shrank	19,123	35,304,977
Oxen and other cattle shrank	2,243,952	53,790,618
Swine shrank	1,040,782	50,883,359

But it remained for sheep to show the most disastrous shrinkage in both numbers and value and to mark most plainly the poisonous effect of an un-Republican policy.

SHEEP TABLE.

In 1884, under Republican policy, our sheep were 50,626,626 in numbers and of the value of	$119,302,706
Under influences of the threatened Mills bill they shrank to 42,599,079 in numbers and to the value of	90,640,369
A shrinkage of 8,027,547 head and in value	29,262,337
From the lowest point recorded under the Mills bill fright up to 1893, under Republican guardianship, sheep increased to 47,273,553 in numbers and to the value of	125,909,264
An increase of 4,674,474 head and an increase in value of	35,268,895
But again upon Mr. Cleveland's second election we turn backward and downward as usual under the blighting, withering influence of a wrong policy, and in two years sheep decreased to 42,294,064 head, of the value of	66,685,767
A loss of 4,979,489 head and a loss in values of	59,223,497

A shrinkage in two short years of nearly one-half!

THE OTHER SIDE OF THE LEDGER.

Now, to exhibit the other side of the ledger. Here is a statistical table (I ask to have it incorporated in my remarks) which shows our importation of wool has increased to nearly triple, not in two years nor three years, but in the first ten months of this present year, ended October 31, 1895.

Imports of wool (in pounds).

	Ten months ending October—
	1894.	1895.
Class 1	25,807,462	113,672,709
Class 2	2,841,422	16,731,985
Class 3	54,574,386	80,652,544
Total	83,223,270	211,057,238
Rags and waste	1,081,441	17,824,008

Imports of wool goods (values in dollars).

	October—		Ten months ending October—
	1894.	1895.	1894.	1895.
Carpets	$109,752	$89,841	$614,421	$1,356,307
Clothing	77,228	113,302	673,088	1,296,210
Cloths	405,339	1,911,057	4,775,874	21,807,899
Dress goods	285,841	1,248,895	6,506,170	19,528,051
Knit fabrics	48,196	318,183	503,069	1,988,349
Shawls	10,165	57,789	69,553	370,264
Yarns	20,327	107,186	236,388	1,632,852
All others	73,020	171,156	542,235	1,919,785
Total	1,029,868	4,017,409	13,981,398	49,899,717

SHODDY.

And in the meantime our importations of wool goods have nearly quadrupled, the last month quoted (last October) showing increasing importations, while shoddy—that abomination which cheats alike the woolgrower, by displacing his product, and the consumer, by affording but insignificant wearing service—increased 1,700 per cent in number of pounds imported—from 1,081,441 to 17,824,008—and this, too, in ten months.

With absolutely no benefit therefrom, we depreciate our wool-growing property nearly one-half and wool-manufacturing assets also, while we pour out to England, China, and other foreign countries a stream of gold increasing from 300 per cent to 1,700 per cent per annum for wool and wool commodities that we could as well produce ourselves if we but return to the sane common-sense principles of collecting smart revenue tariffs from wools and woolens inaugurated nearly eighty years ago and never overturned until by the notorious Fifty-third Congress, which the American people so signally repudiated at the polls in November, 1894.

Can a plainer story than this be told? Or can figures be produced from nearer the throne than those I offer?

These figures are taken from the ledgers of a Department presided over by that Cabinet officer who essays to speak oftener and plainer of the policies of the Executive and his Administration than anyone, and whose utterances are usually accepted as inspired by the present head of the Democratic party.

DESPERATION.

And yet, Mr. President, the able Senator from Missouri, with Spartanlike valor and desperation, throws himself into the breach and attempts to maintain the Administration, the Wilson bill, and the utterly false and untenable position that woolgrowers are more prosperous under free wool than ever before. Prosperous? How? Because the value of their flocks is nearly cut in half and numbers greatly reduced?

NOT DUE TO PANIC.

Mr. President, it will not do in this connection to lay the blame to a panic, and then assert that Republican wrongdoing brought on the panic and consequent dissipation of both numbers and values of live stock, because, sir, we have endured panics before with no such results. We had a panic in 1873, but the fluctuation in values and numbers of live stock was, according to the Agricultural Reports herewith submitted, scarcely noticeable. The shrinkage after 1873 is just clearly enough shown in these tables to indicate that there was some disturbance and that live stock took notice thereof; but the change was so unimportant and infinitesimal that when quoted it only serves by comparison to show the enormity of our late losses. I would make comparisons but for want of time.

It is not alone to panic values, so called, that I call your attention, but to the fact made absolutely manifest in these tables that numbers increase and values appreciate invariably under Republican Administrations, while with corresponding regularity and mournful emphasis they decrease and depreciate under Democratic rule.

NOT DUE TO RISE AND FALL OF GOLD AND SILVER.

And it will not do to attribute all of this remarkable shrinkage to the rise of gold and fall of silver, because neither one of the metals has gone up or down in the scale correspondingly with live stock in the changes of Administration.

Mr. President, the shrinkage in values in live stock, always attendant upon a Democratic Administration of this Government, has become so marked in the past few years, so tremendous, so appalling, as to seem to point, unless soon corrected, to almost annihilation of the flocks and herds of the United States, obliging us to soon depend upon other nations for even our meat as well as our wool product.

POLITICAL FUNERALS.

The Senator from Missouri taunts the Republican party upon the political effect of the McKinley bill, and he says:

What was the result of that legislation? The Republican party came back from their appeal to the people utterly discomfited and defeated. They gathered into this hall a funeral procession, stamped with the disapproval of the people of this country. The McKinley law was repudiated distinctly and emphatically.

Well, Mr. President, it is a tender subject, this of political funeral processions. They are always sad and sometimes expensive, but the one mentioned by the Senator is now ancient history—a chestnut, so to speak. Why didn't my friend allude to something more recent? For instance, the very marked obsequies accorded the late and lamented Fifty-third Congress?

The McKinley bill was passed by a House of Representatives consisting of 173 Republicans, 156 Democrats, and 1 Independent. A not large Republican majority, in truth.

The Wilson bill was passed by a House consisting of 127 Republicans, 219 Democrats, and 10 Farmers' Alliance or Populists. A pretty decided Democratic majority, it is admitted.

The Democrats thus gained from 156 in the Fifty-first to 219 in the Fifty-third Congress. The Republicans lost from 176 in the Fifty-first to 127 in the Fifty-third Congress. A Democratic gain of 53 and a Republican loss of 54.

In the present Fifty-fourth Congress the Republicans gained from 127 in the Fifty-third to 244. The Democrats lost from 219 to 105. A Republican gain of 117 and a Democratic loss of 114.

Nothing to brag of from a Democratic standpoint, it seems to me.

HOODOO VS. JONAH.

And judging by the "off-year" elections of 1895, the election of 1896 will leave scarcely a "corporal's guard" of the faithful to mark the spot where once stood an imperious, triumphant, rampant Democracy fighting under the unpatriotic black flag of Wilsonism—emblem of protection to foreign industries and distress to our own. Gentlemen on the other side are welcome to all the satisfaction they can get from the contemplation of results of the McKinley bill displaced by the Wilson bill. If the McKinley bill of Republican fame was a "hoodoo," your own Wilson bill has certainly been a "Jonah," and it seems to me a most conspicuous, indigestible, and soul-stirring Jonah at that. If I may be permitted to make comparisons, I believe that the Jonah of Biblical times was a sweet morsel in the bosom of that ancient and respectable whale when compared with the nauseating, rantankerous Wilson bill in the distended stomach of the corpus delicti of Democracy. After the next November election, when my friend from Missouri and the remnant of the Democratic party shall have taken to the woods and are anxiously inquiring if indeed there is still "a God in Israel," and pleading that if so His face may be again shown them, they will never utter the name Wilson as a talismanic persuader nor present the flagrant Wilson bill as their testimonial of character and their evidence of good faith.

FREE WOOL NOT A BOON.

Mr. President, I listened to the able and eloquent Senator from Missouri, as I always do, with pleasure, whether agreeing with him or not, willing and anxious to be convinced that free wool is a boon and a deficit in revenues a blessing. But, alas! he did not, to my mind, produce one tittle of responsible proof beyond his own dogmatic declaration that such was true.

I have not the time now nor the disposition to enter into an extended wool speech—I may do so at some future time—but I desire in passing to notice some of the contentions of the Senator from Missouri on this subject. His first proposition is as follows:

I believed then and can prove now that free wool has done more for the woolgrowers of the country and for the woolen mills of the country than any legislation that the Republican party has ever enacted.

Where is his proof? I search the printed copy of his speech in vain. Beyond showing the reaction—and it was disappointingly slight in this case—always following a complete demoralization of prices and which is so well understood, nothing is in evidence to substantiate the claim. What would be the best evidence to prove this proposition? Why, the testimony of the woolgrowers themselves, and the testimony of the wool manufacturers themselves, to be sure. Has he introduced such? No! Who are the best judges of the prosperity of woolgrowing? The woolgrowers themselves, or men not interested in the business and who have no particular knowledge of its ramifications? Who are the best judges of woolen manufacturing? Have the growers petitioned Congress for free wool, or the manufacturers for lower tariff? On the contrary, they are on record, in the archives of this Capitol, through petitions, memorials, and resolutions innumerable. Individuals and associations unanimously claiming distress under free wool and asking for relief for an industry almost annihilated as to woolgrowing and severely crippled as to manufacturing.

Mr. President, the evidence is on the other side. I am unwilling to discredit or impeach the testimony of witnesses who know the facts and who tell the truth, having certainly no incentive for lying, for if they are making more money now than before they would as a matter of course desire present conditions to continue.

FALLING PRICES OF WOOL.

Now, as to figures, I deem those most correct that are obtained from direct financial transactions in business. I have here in my hand the actual statements, accounts current, bills of sale, and memorandum covering the shipment and sale of all the wool grown by one firm covering the nine years from 1887 to 1895, inclusive, (the period covering threatened Mills, actual McKinley and Wilson bills). The papers are too voluminous to print in full, and as they are the private papers of a business office I will not ask that they be incorporated in my remarks, but submit an abstract, showing concretely the transactions. These papers are originals, not copies, can be verified by affidavits of both vendors and vendees, and I will hold them at my desk subject to the inspection of any interested party.

I offer this as a fair criterion, because it is from not only a large but an old holding, founded over twenty years ago, using the same ranges ever since, and one methodically conducted. Furthermore, I know personally both sellers and buyers and all particulars about the flocks and their clip.

Under the baneful influence of the threatened Mills bill this wool in 1888 brought but a trifle over 14 cents per pound. It rose regularly through a Republican Administration to 18½ cents per pound, and when a Democratic Administration came it as regularly and more rapidly fell to 9 cents per pound.

Can anything be more conclusive than such evidence as this, drawn from the actual daily or yearly transactions in wool?

COMPARATIVE PRICES OF WOOL.

Table showing annual shipments and returns from the total clip for nine years of a Western sheep grower to a Boston commission house, the wool being all that was grown from their flocks and their increase, and handled and shipped and sold in the same way every year.

Year.	Number of pounds.	Net per pound at shipping point.	Date account was closed.	Remarks.
		Cents.
1887	262,773	14.06	Nov.29,1887
1888	229,646	14.06	Nov.14,1888
1889	304,961	15.9	Dec. 5,1889	Administration changed this year from Democratic to Republican.
1890	369,387	17.8	Nov.21,1890	McKinley bill passes, but after portion of clip was sold.
1891	390,701	18.5	Feb. 27,1892	McKinley bill in full force.
1892	318,630	17	Apr. 4,1893	Large part of clip yet unsold when Democratic party won at polls.
1893	303,174	13.4	Jan. 1,1894	Free wool threatened and Wilson bill introduced last of year.
1894	218,388	9	Apr. 17,1895	Wilson bill passes.
1895				Clip not yet all sold, but that portion sold indicates no higher prices than for 1894.

But I present further evidence.

It has been the custom of wool merchants and commission men to issue for the use of their clients and customers circulars from time to time, quoting market rates—prices actually given and taken in daily commerce. I have here in this bundle a full set of such circulars covering the past ten years. I have selected those showing prices of Wyoming, Utah, and vicinity wool at and near important dates in the consideration of tariff bills, and I have marked off from the circulars I present all extraneous matter and the quotations of other sorts, so that the RECORD may not be unduly encumbered. But the entire collection is subject to the inspection of any Senator.

MILLS BILL WOOL FLUCTUATIONS.

January 5, 1888, before the Mills bill was introduced, prices were:

Territory (including Wyoming, Montana, and Utah) wools: The principal sales now are on a scoured basis of 62 to 65 cents for fine; 58 to 60 cents for fine medium, and 55 cents for medium. Prices of wool in the grease have ranged from 15 to 24 cents; but the bulk of the transactions were at 17 to 20 cents per pound.

Mills bill reported in the House April 2, 1888.

April 13, 1888, prices had fallen:

Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah wool—	Cents.
Fine, average	14 to 16
Fine medium, average	16 to 19
Medium	17 to 20
Coarse	14 to 17

The Mills bill passed the House July 21, 1888, and was referred to Senate Finance Committee, and July 27 prices were:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, average	14 to 16
Fine, heavy	12 to 14
Fine medium	15 to 18
Medium	19 to 21

Thus it seems wool fell from 15 cents to 24 cents January 5 to 11 cents to 20 cents per pound April 13. The introduction of the bill had done this, whereas when the bill actually passed the House wool did not drop, but reacted to 12 cents to 21 cents, effects having been overdiscounted.

The Mills bill was reported to the Senate October 3, 1888, with free wool eliminated, and October 5 prices showed:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, average	15 to 17
Fine, heavy	13 to 15
Fine medium, average	16 to 19
Fine medium, heavy	14 to 16
Medium	18 to 21

A slight increase.

In November, 1888, occurred the election of a Republican President and Congress, and November 23 wool is quoted at:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, average	16 to 17
Fine, heavy	14 to 15
Fine medium, average	18 to 21
Fine medium, heavy	16 to 17
Medium	20 to 23

An increase to just the prices prevailing before the Mills fiasco was precipitated upon us.

M'KINLEY BILL WOOL FLUCTUATIONS.

In April, when the bill was introduced, prices were:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	16 to 17
Fine, heavy	13 to 15
Fine medium, good	18 to 19
Fine medium, heavy	16 to 17
Medium	20 to 22

In October, after the bill passed, the quotations were:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	16 to 17
Fine, heavy	14 to 15
Fine medium, good	19 to 21
Fine medium, heavy	16 to 17
Medium	22 to 23

In April, 1891, the quotations show:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	16 to 17
Fine, heavy	14 to 15
Fine medium, good	19 to 21
Fine medium, heavy	16 to 17
Medium	22 to 23

October, 1891, values have remained the same for nearly eighteen months last past:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	16 to 17
Fine, heavy	14 to 15
Fine medium, good	19 to 21
Fine medium, heavy	16 to 17
Medium	22 to 23

April, 1892, showed a slight average fall from six months before, but the same average as two years before, as follows:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	16 to 17
Fine, heavy	14 to 15
Fine medium, good	18 to 20
Fine medium, heavy	16 to 17
Medium	20 to 21

And now, after six quotations each, showing effects of Mills bill threatening, and McKinley bill accomplishments, we turn to

WILSON TARIFF BILL FLUCTUATIONS.

The bill was introduced in the House December 19, 1893, and December 29, ten days afterwards, we find the prices of wool have slumped away to but two-thirds the price last before quoted and before a free-wool bill was drawn; thus again showing how the effect of threatened changes are discounted before their passage:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	12 to 13
Fine, heavy	9 to 11
Fine medium, good	13 to 14
Fine medium, heavy	11 to 12
Medium	13 to 14

One month more of Wilson bill scare and up to January 26, 1894, wool has slumped another cent per pound:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	10 to 11
Fine, heavy	9 to 10
Fine medium, good	11 to —
Fine medium, heavy	10 to 11
Medium	11 to 12

Wilson bill passed the House February 1, 1894, and February 23 wool had risen a little, as follows, showing again the paradoxical reaction process; but, aside from this, there existed a suspicion that the bill could not pass the Senate:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	10 to 11
Fine, heavy	9 to 10
Fine medium, good	11 to 12
Fine medium, heavy	10 to 11
Medium	11 to 13

June 22, 1894, the Senate having in the meantime agreed to the free-wool provision of the bill, another fall is recorded:

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	10 to 11
Fine, heavy	7 to 9
Fine medium, good	10 to 11
Fine medium, heavy	9 to 10
Medium	11 to 12

September 28, 1894, one month after the passage of the bill, the following quotations, slightly higher, still again show that always present, but difficult to explain, "reaction":

Utah and Wyoming wool—	Cents.
Fine, good	10 to 11
Fine, heavy	8 to 9
Fine medium, good	11 to 13
Fine medium, heavy	10 to 11
Medium	13

AS TO 1895.

The following is the market quotation for January 1, 1895, and is lower than the last quotation (September, 1894):

Utah and Wyoming—	Cents.
Unwashed, light fine	8 to 10
Unwashed, heavy fine	7 to 9
Unwashed, fine medium	10 to 11
Unwashed, selected medium	11 to 13
Unwashed, low	10 to 11

April 1, 1895, finds prices unchanged, as follows:

Utah and Wyoming—	Cents.
Unwashed, light fine	8 to 10
Unwashed, heavy fine	7 to 9
Unwashed, fine medium	10 to 11
Unwashed, selected medium	11 to 13
Unwashed, low	10 to 11

The 1st of April having passed, elections in many small cities and nearly all country towns showed the overwhelming drift of public sentiment in favor of Republicanism and protection, and confidence returned. Also the belief grew that 1896 election would emphasize those of 1894 and 1895 in this regard. Thus, the shortness of time remaining to the present Administration and the prospect of change, added to the unprecedented short stocks of woolen merchandise, have stimulated production and trade, and the convening of the Fifty-fourth Congress, with avowed intentions of imposing a tariff on wool, has also improved prices.

But the fact remains that fine staple Wyoming wool was selling in Boston at the beginning of 1893 at 60 cents the scoured pound. It is worth to-day barely 37 cents—other wools in proportion. These prices can be verified from the market reports of any reputable Boston journal or from the books of any reputable dealer.

Mr. President, I quote from the speech of the Senator from Missouri:

Fine, unmerchantable, was worth in September, 1894, 13 to 15 cents. December 19, 1895, it was worth 14 to 15 cents, showing a gradual improvement in prices during one year under the Wilson law. These figures are taken from the American Wool and Cotton Reporter for December 19, 1895, which I have and can produce if necessary.

This is the nearest to proof of anything the Senator offered as to improving wool prices, but expected tariff relief is what stimulated this rise, as shown by the following, published just after the date mentioned. I ask the Secretary to read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Boston Commercial Bulletin, December 28, 1895.]

The situation shows a decided change. There is more confidence among holders and more interest on the part of the buyers. The prompt movement in Congress to restore a duty on wool and to give greater protection to manufacturers is responsible for the changed condition of the market. * * *

Holders in some cases have virtually withdrawn their wools from the market; others in some instances have placed limits on their stocks anywhere from 1 to 4 cents per pound above the level of early December sales, and all are indifferent about accepting business on the terms at which they would have taken it a fortnight ago. The advances asked, however, have not been established by actual sales, and the market is largely nominal pending developments. * * * The situation is a novel one, as the wool trade never before faced the possibility of legislation to take wool off the free list, although it had abundance of experience of the disturbing effect of the movement to put it there and its results.

But whether the protective policy shall prevail in this instance or be halted by Executive disapproval, wool men generally feel that the vital change is not far off, and are therefore less disposed to part with stocks at recent low prices.

WHO KILLED COCK ROBIN?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri asserts that sheep have been butchered by the thousands, and that the shepherd kings, Mr. Lawrence and others, have caused it. True, the sheep have been, necessarily, butchered by thousands—yes, even by millions—to pay debts and expenses and provide food for the poverty-stricken sheep husbandman; in poverty because of the hostile or "incompetent Democrats"—to borrow the Senator's words—but not because of the advice of shepherd kings.

I send to the desk and ask to have read, first, a quotation from the Senator's speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The paper will be read in the absence of objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

We have heard from interested protective sources that sheep have been butchered by the thousand. It is true. Who caused it? The shepherd kings of Ohio, Mr. Lawrence and his colleagues, who, when we passed the Wilson bill, went among their people and said, "These incompetent Democrats have rendered your sheep worthless; cut their throats and pile them on the market."

Mr. WARREN. My esteemed friend from Missouri does himself great injustice in this declaration. He has been misinformed, and his statement is wholly without foundation in fact.

Mr. President, it is said figures will not lie. They will not if honestly given and not juggled with, but so-called statistics and figures under prejudiced and unfair arrangement are sometimes, indeed, the blackest of liars. I am reminded of this whenever called upon to scan the humbuggery of wool figures offered by free traders and self-appointed guardians of sheep growers and wool manufacturers, who assume to know more of these industries and what is good for them than the men who have devoted a lifetime to their upbuilding and improvement. It is asinine for those who repealed the McKinley bill to protest that they did it in the interest of the woolgrowers and wool manufacturers and to claim credit for self-imposed services, patronizing hospitality, and chaperonage.

Now let Mr. Lawrence speak. I send to the desk and ask to have read a quotation from a speech delivered by him before the Association of Woolgrowers of Ohio, copies of which were sent to thousands of sheep growers. Mr. Lawrence has in all his private and public utterances and letters, widely distributed, given similar advice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WHAT SHALL WE DO WITH OUR SHEEP?

Woolgrowing can not be made fairly remunerative under free wool. Our policy is to fatten and sell the wethers and old ewes, but keep all suitable for breeding and increase the number as rapidly as possible. The year 1896 will, to a moral certainty, reverse the free-wool perfidy; then, even in advance of a new protective tariff law, sheep will rapidly go up in value.

We naturally ask, will not conditions improve before 1896, even under free wool? It is safe to say prices of wool will, like all other commodities, fluctuate, sometimes advance somewhat, and it is scarcely possible that prices can decline below the level of the free-wool prices of the last year.

In view of all this, woolgrowers are advised to keep and enlarge their flocks of breeding sheep.

Mr. WARREN. Now I ask to have read from the desk the marked paragraph in Senate Miscellaneous Document No. 77, which I send up, showing what the woolgrowers say, through their national association, in an address directed to every woolgrower in the land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whatever may be the result, this association urges all engaged in sheep husbandry—

(1) To maintain State and county woolgrowers' associations.

(2) To cooperate with the national association.

(3) To maintain their flocks of sheep and especially to keep and increase the number of ewes, at whatever sacrifice. We so advise because, first, until the President's message of December 6, 1887, there never had been any political party which ventured to favor free wool; second, because only a portion of any political party now is committed to any such policy; and third, because, judging by apparent public sentiment manifested in many forms, and by the justice of the policy of protection, it is believed there never will be in any future Congress any danger to sheep husbandry by hostile legislation.

INKY BLACKNESS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this only serves to show the density, the enormous breadth, width, and depth, and the inky blackness of the Senator's misinformation regarding this whole subject.

NO SUCH MONOPOLY.

It is idle to say that the wool men and woolgrowers are in connivance against consumers and that they propose "to exclude foreign wools, and to shut out the foreign manufacturer and give them the monopoly." It has not been so during the eighty years of tariff. There has never been a year, perhaps never a month, that wool and woolen cloths have not come into this country from foreign shores. The Senator himself disproves this part of his speech by another portion when he says: "We imported of woolen fabrics $36,987,904"—referring to 1893 under the McKinley tariff.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri says, and I quote him:

I see from the returns of protection papers, which never breathe a sentiment in favor of my opinions upon the tariff question, that the price of domestic wool has gone up in the United States; and, in addition to that, I can prove from the same sources that the woolen mills were never so prosperous as they are to-day and have been during the year 1895.

Protection papers, indeed. The Senator then offers as his only evidence from such quarters two items from the Wool and Cotton Reporter, one relating to wool, the other to manufacturers, neither one of which proves the Senator's assertion. But before disposing of the items let us accord due examination to their source.

Is this paper a protection sheet, and is its editor prominent in the ranks of protection? By no means. It was this very journal, the Wool and Cotton Reporter, that circulated the free wool petition in 1890 and presented it to Congress. Its proprietor, F. P. Bennett, appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee and, though not favoring "radical changes," as he said, fought the protectionist schedule and personally advocated free wool, or, what is much the same, a greatly reduced and ad valorem duty. The attitude of this very paper, later on, is shown by the article I send to the desk to have read:

The Secretary read as follows:

[From American Wool and Cotton Reporter of August 24, 1893.]

[Editorial.] A SIGNIFICANT APPOINTMENT.

* * * But with Mr. Wilson at the head of the committee, ably seconded with reference to the woolen interests by the Hon. M. T. Stevens, woolen goods manufacturers may rest assured that their interests will not be unduly discriminated against. They may congratulate themselves that after the unsatisfactory experience which we have had under an excessively high protection, the new Administration gives evidence that it is not its intention to go to the other extreme. With free wools, which will enable our manufacturers to purchase their raw materials on the same terms with their foreign competitors, and an average duty on goods of about 40 per cent, which may be increased or decreased as the class of goods made may demand, there is abundant reason for the manufacturer to look forward with confidence to the future, which, when our currency laws are placed on a sound and business-like basis, will bring, we believe, a good measure of prosperity.

[At this point the honorable Senator from Wyoming yielded the floor to Mr. PUGH to offer a resolution.]

Mr. WARREN. I have sent to the table and there has been read an editorial, which shows that that paper was for free wool. I desire to present to the Senate another article from that paper, and ask, Do the wool manufacturers indorse the paper quoted and its editor?

I send to the desk a few lines and ask that they be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The National Association of Wool Manufacturers has thought it necessary to adopt by unanimous vote a statement that—

In the judgment of this association Mr. F. P. Bennett, editor of the Wool Reporter, is not in accord with the views of the great body of the wool manufacturers of the United States, and his advocacy of tariff legislation prejudicial to the manufacturer, from the standpoint of membership in this association, is damaging to the best interests of the industry.

Mr. WARREN. After this reproof from the manufacturers we next find the proprietor of this "high protection paper" affiliating with the woolgrowers' association, and the American Sheep Breeder and Woolgrower of December, 1895, reporting the same, comments as follows. I send the item to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested:

The Secretary read as follows:

The trend of the convention was generally harmonious, and good humor and fellowship prevailed. The proceedings, however, took a ludicrous turn when Frank Bennett, of the Wool and Cotton Reporter, complacently came forward to offer himself for membership in the association and the influence of his free-wool paper in the cause of protection.

Mr. WARREN. So much for the "protection" standing of the Wool and Cotton Reporter and its editor and proprietor among wool manufacturers and woolgrowers.

WHAT ABOUT WOOLEN MILLS?

Referring to the statement in that uncertain sheet—the Wool and Cotton Reporter—that there were 45 woolen mills or parts of mills or improvements erected in 1894, against 61 in 1895, and admitting it true, if you please, it does not prove prosperity in the woolen manufacturing business of 1895, but in the light of common sense and precedent and well-known established principles, it proves in a way exactly the reverse. "Coming events cast their shadows before." And this never becomes truer than when applied to commercial business. Look, for instance, at the resumption of specie payment. The knowledge promulgated long beforehand that specie payment was to occur served to reduce the price of gold, and long before resumption was an established fact, we were near a parity with gold, silver, and paper. The Sherman Act of 1890, for the purchase of silver, sent silver up in price during its consideration and before its passage to nearly the highest point it ever reached, while the reaction and lower prices followed soon after the law itself had actually passed.

The same with wool. When the Mills bill threatened, wool went down, low down; with the Wilson iniquity measure pending in 1894 and before the repeal of the McKinley law, wool went down, lower than ever before in the history of the world, and reaction, either slight or marked, follows as a matter of course. But, Mr. President, aside from this well-known principle, other factors entered into mill building in the years mentioned.

It was known during all of 1894 that sweeping changes and reductions would be made in the woolen schedule, and added to this was the uncertainty as to just how the changes would affect the woolen manufacturing; consequently every mill halted its building operations and waited to know what should be the final result. Needed extensions and repairs were left undone. The Wilson bill passed; the tension over, the worst known, and a certainty—even though a sad one—established, the mill men then knew what they had to meet. In many cases repairs, extensions, or additional buildings for existing manufacturing plants were made absolutely necessary, in order to change the mode of manufacturing to meet conditions imposed by the new tariff in competing with foreign manufactures. They had to invest more money to save that already invested in the business. This accounts, in part, for the building exhibit, but, Mr. President, what counts for still more is the fact that in the elections of 1894 the American people rose in their might and declared at the polls they would not rest under the Wilson bill and they stamped the indelible seal of their disapprobation upon this un-American measure. Thereupon the mill men and the sheep men once again took heart, firmly believing, as they do now believe, and as I believe, that they must only await the next Presidential election and the action of the Fifty-fifth Congress to again see reasonable prosperity through judicious Republican legislation.

Now, as to what the wool manufacturers say. Note their annual report for 1895, from which the Clerk will please read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the annual report of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers, January 8, 1896.]

The American mills have partaken of none of the prosperity which has blessed Bradford and Batley, England. In some lines of manufacture they have been fairly busy; but in others, and notably in the cloth manufacture, which employs the looms of the great bulk of our mills, the year has been one of severest trial; some of these mills have not been in operation; others have run only portions of their machinery; the most have been obliged to market their production at prices which render it hardly worth while to manufacture, if not at actual loss.

In summarizing the effects of the tariff it may be said that the cloth manufacture has suffered more seriously than any other branch, and the woolen-cloth maker more than the worsted; that some features of the schedule have not worked as disastrously as was anticipated, although sufficient time has not yet elapsed to permit a fair test of their bearing upon the industry, and, generally, that the schedule is found in operation to be unequal and ill balanced, weak at vital spots, and a failure as a revenue-getting measure. Experience completely sustains the assertion made at the time of its passage, that this industry was dealt with more harshly than any other manufacture, and that it must necessarily stagger under the blow. This fact is now thoroughly understood by the public and appreciated in legislative halls.

The reason why the existing tariff is working so disastrously to the American wool manufacturer may be stated in one sentence: It is due to the substitution of purely ad valorem duties for the compound duties of previous laws.

* * * * * * *

It was argued that, by reason of the advantage of free raw materials, the American manufacturer would find himself not only in full control of the domestic market, but actively competing for the markets of the world. We have seen the havoc played with the domestic market. As for the foreign market, it has been practically confined, as nearly as can be ascertained, to two cases of woolens shipped to Bradford early in the year, and there discovered by the American consul, who immediately telegraphed to the Secretary of State in Washington that the conquest of the foreign markets had been accomplished! That episode has been the one amusing feature of the whole business.

MANUFACTURERS LOSE 55 PER CENT.

Mr. WARREN. As to the manufacturers generally, Dun's Review at the close of 1895 records the mournful fact that "there has been an increase of 55 per cent in manufacturing failures in 1895 as compared with 1894."

PRICE OF CLOTHING.

As to the price of woolen clothing, it has been growing gradually lower for years, but no consumer can tell the dates or percentages of the great shrinkages in wool prices by his bills paid for clothing, because prices have grown lower, tariff or no tariff, just the same.

WAGES ARE LOWER.

The assumption that wages are higher now than before the passage of the Wilson Act is a fallacy. Late advances in wages have simply been to the extent of restoring part or all, as the case may be, of the reductions made since 1892.

I quote again from the speech of the Senator from Missouri:

I have here a list of the advances in wages by woolen mills. Twice during the last year, in some instances, and three times in other, the wages of employees were advanced by the woolen mills.

I, too, have here a very complete list of over 450 establishments giving lists of wages, number of hands employed, etc., and the reverse is shown. In 1895 there were 13 per cent less hands employed than in 1892 at average wages of 14 per cent less than in 1890 and 17 per cent less than in 1892. Here are figures on a lot of 32 wool manufacturing establishments, taken as they come, being all in a given locality:

FEWER LABORERS EMPLOYED.

Number of establishments in which—
Wages are now as high as they were in 1891-92	10
Wages are now lower than they were in 1891-92	22
The number of hands employed are now as many as in 1891-92	17
The number of hands employed are now fewer than in 1891-92	15
Production and demand are now as good as in 1891-92	9
Production and demand are less than they were in 1891-92	23
The Wilson bill has compelled a resort to lower grade production	17

So that 10 are paying the same wages as in 1892, 22 are paying less; 17 are employing as many men as in 1892, 15 are employing less; 9 have as good a demand for goods as in 1892, 23 have less demand; 17 have been compelled to lower their grade of production, 15 have not.

SUMMING UP.

Now, in summing up, Mr. President, I have shown by evidence of irrefutable character—

First. That our live-stock interests had always thrived under Republican administration, the numbers and values together increasing, thus showing that it is not a matter of inflated inventory.

Second. That under Democratic administration both numbers and values of farm animals decrease, thus showing that it is not a change of bookkeeping, but is a contraction such as the state of business and the markets of the day alone enforce.

Third. That this variation in prices applies to all classes of farm animals with the single exception of the comparatively unimportant item of milch cows.

Fourth. That while many causes growing out of a wrong administration of our national affairs conduce to this shrinkage, yet in taking up the item of sheep and wool—the only one permitted me to review to-day—it is clearly demonstrated that in the free list and the lower-revenue tariffs imposed by the Democratic party occurs the assassination of the sheep and woolgrowing industry.

Fifth. That the shrinkage shown in other farm-animal values is as surely, if not as directly, traceable to free-trade ideas and practices.

Sixth. That corresponding with our own great national shrinkage is an immense increase in the business of foreign countries in crowding our markets with products which our own wanton legislation has crowded its citizens out of producing.

Seventh. That while sheep of the United States are worth but slightly more than one-half what they were two years ago, the wool exportation from England to America in 1895 was nearly triple that of 1894, the importations of woolens nearly quadrupled, and shoddy, that iniquitous adulterant and counterfeit, which defrauds the wearer of cheap and medium-priced clothing, increased by about 1,700 per cent.

Eighth. That the sheep growers, merchants, and woolen manufacturers alike protested against the changes proposed by the Wilson bill, and they have likewise all appeared before Congress since its passage with memorials, resolutions, and petitions asking immediate relief.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Missouri held awe-stricken in their seats the members of this body by his scathing, drastic excoriation, or bastinado rather, of the members, individually and collectively, of the highest tribunal in the greatest and most illustrious Government on earth. Senators sat hushed and with bated breath listening to his brilliant, eloquent phrases, to his earnest pathos, as he fearlessly denounced the wearers of judicial ermine—who, from long-established custom and environment, are debarred from "talking back"—for unworthiness and unfairness. And for what? Because, forsooth, law, or ordinance, or precedent, or rule, of nearly one hundred years standing had been reversed by that court. And yet this same Senator glories in the fact accomplished, that the economic law, rule, and precedent of wool tariff—established and continuing for nearly eighty years—has been overturned by that anomalous absurdity, the Wilson bill, that crowning infamy that the Senate first pitied, then endured, and then embraced.

Will the Congress of the United States duly weigh and consider the deplorable conditions of our live-stock interests? Shall we not "about face" and change our un-American, unpatriotic policy of especial protection to foreign stock growers and manufacturers to that time-honored American policy of protecting the interests of our own citizens and institutions?

Shall we stop this drain of our gold for foreign wools and woolens, and turn the tide again in our favor by the collection of gold for imports on such as we do not produce?

Why, sir, the birds of the air, the beasts of the field, the very reptiles beneath our feet, protect their own! Is it then too much to ask the great American people, including the Democratic party, to do likewise? Shall we do less?

PAYMENT OF GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS.

During the delivery of Mr. WARREN'S speech,

Mr. PUGH said: Will the Senator from Wyoming give way a moment?

Mr. WARREN. I will yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PUGH. I offer a concurrent resolution which I send to the desk and ask that it lie over under the rule. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. HILL. I should like to have the resolution read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). The concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt"; and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to the nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama offers a resolution and asks that under the rules it lie over for one day.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the order of business we are now on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming was addressing the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I will inform the Senator that I yielded to the introduction of a resolution, presuming that it would not even be read, and that it would lie over.

Mr. HILL. I asked to have it read, so as to know what it is.

Mr. WARREN. I did not yield the floor for the purpose of the consideration of the resolution, but merely that it might be offered under the rule.

Mr. HILL. The inquiry I rose to make was whether at this time it does not require unanimous consent to introduce a resolution?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York object?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. This is the morning hour, Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. The morning business had been concluded, and we had taken up the unfinished business of the preceding day. Therefore I raise the point of order, and object to the presentation of the resolution at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks that the resolution can not be received if the Senator objects to its reception.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

After the conclusion of Mr. WARREN'S speech,

Mr. DUBOIS said: Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the Senator from Idaho yield a moment for a formal matter?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PLATT. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next, upon which motion the Senator from Connecticut asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Before the yeas and nays are ordered, as the Senator has put himself upon record by that announcement, I desire to inquire if he knows of any important matter to come up between now and Monday? If he has any remarks to make, or knows of anything important to be done, I shall be very glad to withdraw my motion. I supposed I was expressing the view of nearly every Senator when I submitted the motion; but if the yeas and nays are called I might be put in the position of one who desires to pass over important business.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state that I should like the opportunity to submit some remarks to-morrow.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then I withdraw the motion, Mr. President, in order to allow the Senator that opportunity.

Mr. PLATT. Perhaps I ought to make an explanation. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], who is not now in his seat, has been exceedingly anxious to get consideration, yesterday, to-day, and this week, and is especially anxious to secure consideration to-morrow of a matter which is very near to him.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If the Senator from Connecticut had made that statement before, he knows, as does the Senator from North Dakota, that I would never for a moment have thought of offering the motion.

Mr. PLATT. The only parliamentary thing I could do was to call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Colorado is withdrawn. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I gave notice that I would address the Senate to-day, and it is according to the custom of the Senate when a Senator has given notice to speak at a particular hour that he is usually recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair knew nothing whatever of the notice that had been given by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. It is of record, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] rose in his place, and the Chair recognized him. If the Senator from Idaho will yield the floor to the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I do not wish to seem to be discourteous. The Senator gave notice that on Thursday, January 23, he would submit some remarks on Senate resolution No. 70, relating to the Monroe doctrine. I desire to submit some remarks on the matter that is pending before the Senate, which I am anxious to get a vote on. I desire to discuss it. Yesterday it seemed that no one was prepared to speak except myself. I was then ready to proceed, but other outside, extraneous matters took up the time, and I was unable to speak. So I announced to the Senator in charge of the bill and to various other Senators that I should speak to-day in the morning hour. I shall only speak a short time, say about thirty-five or forty minutes. I can finish to-day and so can the distinguished Senator from Virginia. If he speaks first I can not finish, because his speech will be much longer than mine.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me, I will state the case to the Senate.

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to say that I gave the formal notice, which is customary among Senators, that I would submit some remarks on the Monroe doctrine to-day, immediately after the conclusion of the speech of the Senator who has just yielded the floor; that I saw the Senator [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] who has charge of the bond bill, who stated that if I were speaking at 2 o'clock he would be willing to extend the time, and that it would not interfere with the arrangements of the committee. Having acted in conformity to the invariable rule and courtesy of the Senate, and after consultation with those who have the matter specifically in charge, I shall of course bow to whatever any other Senator or to whatever the Senate may decide.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. BUTLER to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HILL and Mr. JONES of Arkansas addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], who is in charge of the pending bill.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I regret exceedingly that there should be a misunderstanding as to the order of debate here. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] states correctly that he spoke to me several days ago about his desire to give notice that he would address the Senate on the subject mentioned by him, and asked me if he should be on the floor at 2 o'clock if I would not permit him to conclude his remarks. I told him there would be no disposition to cut him off and there would be no disposition on the part of anyone to limit him in time. Yesterday the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] also mentioned to me that he would be glad to occupy the floor on this bill at 2 o'clock to-day. Of course, it is a very unpleasant thing to me that two Senators should desire to occupy the floor at the same time, but I can not undertake to do anything to control the rights of either Senator.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the unfinished business has now been laid before the Senate, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived the unfinished business was laid before the Senate. That took from the floor any Senator who had been upon it before upon any other subject.

Mr. HILL. Therefore, I am entitled to the floor now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] in charge of the bill.

Mr. HILL. Now I desire to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I yield the floor to the Senator from Virginia if he desires to speak at this time. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. DANIEL. I render my profound thanks to the Senator from New York for that characteristic courtesy which becomes his position and which is always shown by him to his colleagues; but I beg leave to say that I prefer, under the circumstances which have existed, not to interfere with the recent arrangements made by the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. HILL. Then I will reserve my remarks, Mr. President.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think the Senator from Virginia and all Senators will understand that I have not any desire to be discourteous in the slightest degree. I should regret very much that such a thought should enter the mind of any Senator. What I have to say will not take long. I understand the speech of the Senator from Virginia will be quite lengthy, and I have risen to say the few words I desire to utter to-day. If I thought for a moment, or could conceive that I would be discourteous to the Senator from Virginia I would not go on. I can not think so, therefore I shall proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I presume the real question which is directly before the Senate at the present moment is whether by a vote of this body we will give our authority and sanction for the issuance of interest-bearing bonds, or whether we will declare that in the judgment of the Senate the unlimited coinage of silver is the first step which should be taken in any further financial legislation by this country.

No one here, I take it, expects or believes that anything will be accomplished at this session of Congress, so far as financial or tariff legislation is concerned. There is more politics than anything else in the seeming attempt to enact legislation on either of these subjects. The President and Secretary of the Treasury have informed the Congress and country in written communications what their views are and what should be done in the way of legislation relating to the finances.

The House of Representatives, very largely Republican, in part answer, has passed a bond bill, which in no sense fully meets the monetary suggestions of the President. The House of Representatives has also passed a tariff bill in order to raise sufficient money to carry on the affairs of the Government and pay its current expenses. The President and Secretary of the Treasury insist that a new tariff bill is not needed; that there is an abundance of money with which to pay the everyday expenses of conducting our affairs. The Senate committee, which has these bills in charge, has substituted a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver for the bond bill of the House and has not yet passed upon the tariff bill.

The views entertained by the different branches of the law-making power of the Government are so antagonistic and radical on the questions of finance and tariff as to preclude any reasonable hope of legislation on either subject at this time. The President insists on maintaining the single gold standard, and is for the nearest possible approach to free trade. He has no tolerance for any revenue legislation which goes further than providing sufficient funds to pay the running expenses of the Government. In addition to that he is a firm believer and most earnest advocate of free "raw material," especially wool.

The House of Representatives believes with the President in maintaining the single standard of gold, but there parts company with him. The House is committed to, and fully indorses, the doctrine of protection to American industries, not for the sake of revenue, but on account of its belief that these industries should be adequately protected by legislation against foreign competitors.

The Senate does not agree with the President on either question, nor does it agree with the House on either.

It is patent to anyone who has given the matter any careful investigation that the Senate is opposed to the maintenance of the single gold standard. There are a number of Senators who are not in favor of the single gold standard, and who will vote against a bond issue, who will not vote for the unlimited coinage of silver. They favor some medium course. It is reasonably safe to say, however, that the Senate will pass the bill before us for unlimited coinage as soon as a vote can be reached. This body neither indorses the President's radical views for "free raw material" and the lowest possible duties, nor does it indorse the policy of high protection. It is not certain that any tariff bill can receive a majority of the votes in the Senate, as now constituted. It is quite certain that no bill can pass which does not place a duty on "raw materials."

I have called attention to the political condition which the country finds itself in regarding the attitude of the President, Senate, and House on financial and revenue legislation in order to demonstrate the inutility of our votes and speeches, so far as enacting legislation is concerned, on the two great subjects which confront us, owing to the action of the House of Representatives.

I believe in discussion, especially of the financial question, and wish those Senators who always vote to maintain the single gold standard would give their reasons for their votes. They content themselves, for the most part, in decrying the unlimited coinage of silver, but fail to support their sneers with arguments, nor attempt to demonstrate the advantage of gold monometallism to this country.

I wish, Mr. President, we could pass laws at this session of Congress for the unlimited coinage of gold and silver and for such protection to "raw materials" and the manufactured products of the United States as would prevent the ruinous competition of the poorly paid labor of foreign countries. I believe emphatically in silver and protection, and think one is indispensable to the other, and that both are absolutely essential to the prosperity and happiness of our people.

The Populist Senators have had considerable to say during this session on financial and other subjects, and I heartily subscribe to many of their utterances. There seems to be, however, a concerted movement on their part to place Senators in the Democratic and Republican parties who are, and have always been, able and fearless advocates of the full and complete restoration of silver in the position of being untrue to silver unless they blindly indorse Populistic doctrines and methods. For the time being they are keeping the real aims and policies of their party in the background, so far as they can, and are posing here as the especial friends and advocates of silver. The junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] called attention to a circular letter addressed to the advocates of silver coinage which was issued at the beginning of this Congress, and argued from the fact that the Democratic and Republican silver believers in free coinage did not attend this meeting, that they were not genuine silver advocates. I will quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 30, 1895, page 428:

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] if he did not receive an invitation as follows:

"Hon. I. G. HARRIS.

"DEAR SIR: There will be a meeting of Senators friendly to silver in the Marble Room of the Capitol, on Monday morning, December 2, at 11 a. m., with a view of organizing the Senate on silver lines. You are respectfully invited to attend."

Signed by W. M. STEWART, W. V. ALLEN, W. A. PEFFER, and MARION BUTLER. Senators KYLE and JONES were not present, but came in that night and indorsed it.

The distinguished Senator from Tennessee replied that he had received the invitation, but did not accept it.

I was the recipient of a similar invitation, as were all real and supposed silver Senators. I am informed that two or three silver advocates responded to the call, merely to protest against the policy suggested in the circular. Nothing in the interest of silver could have been accomplished if the programme of the Populists had been carried out. Silver interests, so far as the Senate committees are concerned, are in the Finance Committee. Under the organization which has been consummated, or under any organization which would have been allowed, the silver sentiment predominates in that committee in the ratio of 8 to 5. We could not have done better under any other plan of reorganization of the committees, so far as silver interests are concerned.

Had the attempt been made and carried out to reorganize the Senate on silver lines, and thus form in the Senate a distinct silver party, our weakness would have been displayed just so soon as we attempted legislative action on any other subject than finance. It would be as hard for our gold friends in the Senate to unite on all matters as it would be for us. I agree fully, for instance, with the distinguished Senators from Missouri [Messrs. COCKRELL and VEST] and the distinguished Senators from Alabama [Messrs. MORGAN and PUGH] and the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] on the money question, but aside from that we differ on almost everything, more especially the tariff. The Senate has been organized on silver lines, plainly and distinctly, and it could not have been organized on any other lines, because a majority of the Senate, outside of the Populist vote, is clearly and distinctly in favor of silver.

The Senate does not depend, fortunately, on the Populist vote for its silver strength. It is not necessary, luckily, in order to gain votes for silver, that we indorse Populistic ideas in general. The Populists in the Senate will vote for the bill under consideration, and for any free coinage bill, and true silver men, regardless of party, are pleased to receive their votes. They do not vote for the unlimited coinage of silver, however, because they believe that silver should be basic money.

They want more money. They do not believe in basic money of ultimate redemption. Their theory is that the Government by its fiat can make money, and that it should do so, the amount of the money thus created to depend on the will of the people as expressed by its representatives in Congress. The hard-money men, who constitute a majority in this Chamber—this majority made up of Democrats and Republicans—believe that gold and silver should form the basis of our currency and that all forms of money should rest on those two metals, and that they should be the money of ultimate redemption.

Our argument is that there is not enough of gold to form a safe and adequate basis, and that the basis should be broadened by restoring silver. Our Populist friends care for neither gold nor silver, and would discard both and have the Government issue paper money, which is redeemable in itself.

I call attention to a debate in the Senate during the debate on the repeal of the Sherman Act, which clearly defines their position. It will be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of October 28, 1893, page 2923:

Mr. PEFFER. I move an amendment to be inserted immediately after the repealing clause.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add after the word "repealed," in line 13 of the amendment of the committee already agreed to:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be prepared immediately Treasury notes to the amount of $250,000,000, said notes to be in form, dimensions, and general appearance similar to those which have been prepared under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890. They shall be of the denominations $1, $2, $5, $10, and $20, one-fifth part in value of the total issue to be in each of said denominations; they shall be made payable in lawful money; they shall be received by the Government of the United States, and the officers thereof, for taxes and all public dues, and they shall be lawful money and legal tender, at their face value, in payment of debts to any amount whatever."

* * * * * * *

"SEC. 4. That when any of the said notes are received in the Treasury in the course of business they shall be reissued, and thus kept in circulation.

"SEC. 5. That this act shall take effect immediately after its passage."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, the Senate will see from the language of the amendment that it simply proposes the issue of $250,000,000 of Treasury notes payable in lawful money, and that the notes shall be receivable for taxes and all public dues, and shall be legal tender in payment of all debts to any amount whatever.

Mr. BATE. We can not hear a word on this side.

Mr. PEFFER. The amendment provides for the issuance of $250,000,000 of Treasury notes in the denominations mentioned in the amendment, payable in lawful money, and it provides that they shall be receivable for taxes and all public dues, and be legal tender in the payment of debts to any amount whatever. Whenever they are received in the Treasury in the regular course of business the amendment provides that they shall be reissued and kept in circulation; in other words, that they shall be placed as nearly as possible upon the plane of the greenbacks which are now in circulation.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand him to say that when these notes are issued they will themselves be lawful money?

Mr. PEFFER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. Then, if one of these notes, say a twenty-dollar note, be presented to the Treasury it will be redeemable in other notes of the same kind?

Mr. PEFFER. In lawful money.

Mr. HOAR. A twenty-dollar note issued under this amendment would be redeemable in the Treasury in ten-dollar notes or five-dollar notes of the same issue?

Mr. PEFFER. Or anything that is lawful money.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator understands, then, that these notes, being a legal tender——

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Senator to speak louder; we can not hear him.

Mr. HOAR. I want to understand the financial theories of the Senator from Kansas. The Senator understands, then, that these notes are to be lawful money, as he has said, and therefore if one of them is presented to the Treasury, say a twenty-dollar note, it may be redeemed by the Treasury in ten-dollar, or five-dollar, or one-dollar notes of the same issue, as lawful money. Is that the Senator's purpose?

Mr. PEFFER. It may be paid in lawful money, whatever kind of lawful money the Treasury has on hand, which can be used for any purpose, no matter whether it be gold, silver, or notes.

Mr. HOAR. Or paper?

Mr. PEFFER. Or paper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read again.

* * * * * * * *

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to prolong the debate, and I do not intend to do so; but I think it is important, after the part the Senator from Kansas has taken in the various discussions, that we should understand and the country should understand the financial theory which he represents.

This is a proposition to issue $250,000,000 of currency, to be legal tender for all debts, past and future, which is to be redeemable in itself. The Government is to be under no obligation, if a twenty-dollar bill of this currency so issued be taken to the Treasury for redemption, to redeem it in anything except two ten-dollar bills, or four five-dollar bills, or twenty one-dollar bills of the same issue—the same kind of money.

So it is irredeemable money, pure and simple. It differs from the greenbacks of the war (which it was intended to redeem when the Government had the power) by declaring on its face, in substance, that it is never to be redeemed—that is, unless the Government please—that there shall never be any obligation to redeem it. I think it important (as I have put the question to the Senator whether that is his meaning, and he has answered that it is) that his views should be understood.

Mr. President, a vote was had on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, and on the roll call the amendment received 7 votes, the other Senators, 58 in number, voting against it. Every Populist Senator voted for it. If you can issue $250,000,000 of irredeemable paper money to-day, you can issue $250,000,000 more to-morrow, and so on without limit.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me? I desire to correct the Senator, and I shall occupy his time but a mo ment. The Senator from Idaho ought not to put in a speech delivered in this Chamber the remarks of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] as defining the Populist position. Let me say that the statement that the Populist party here or elsewhere ever favored an irredeemable currency is not correct, and I hope——

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator will have ample opportunity to make that plain, if he can. I am reading their record. I am endeavoring to give their record.

Mr. ALLEN. But you are giving the Republican record and not the Populist record.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have quoted the amendment which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] offered and for which the Senator from Nebraska voted.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me, he puts in as part of that the definition which the senior Senator from Massachusetts gives of Populist doctrine. The Populist party does not recognize the senior Senator from Massachusetts as a Populist, nor does it recognize his authority to define the Populistic position.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Massachusetts asked the Senator from Kansas, and got a reply in the affirmative. The Senator from Massachusetts said, as I just read, in closing the colloquy—I quote his language—

I think it important, as I have put the question to the Senator whether that is his meaning, and he answered that it is, that his views should be understood.

There was no objection to that interpretation by the Senator from Kansas or on the part of any other Senator here, and the vote given is on record.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him one moment longer, I will not do so again. The Senator from Kansas all the way through insisted that the $250,000,000 which it was proposed to issue was to be in the same form and the same substance as the greenback; that it was to have the same legal construction and effect as the greenback. The Senator from Idaho understands well, and so does the senior Senator from Massachusetts, that the greenback is a redeemable money. What the Senator from Kansas was insisting on was that the volume of money such as we have now should be enlarged, and he sought to enlarge it in that way.

Mr. DUBOIS. Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the views of the Populist party on the money question than this amendment, debate, and vote. It is strictly in accord with their national platform. It may be that some day both gold and silver will of necessity be discarded as basic money, because there will not be sufficient of both metals to meet the demands of business and population, and that the Governments will furnish paper money, for money uses, such money based solely on the credit of the Government.

I do not think it wise, safe, or expedient to inaugurate that contest now, however, and, for one, object to being committed in the slightest degree, even by indirection, to such a policy. Our fight is for gold and silver as basic money, as against gold alone. That contest we can and will win if we can keep the issue clear and distinct.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] was not here when this position was taken by his party on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER]; but, no doubt, he would subscribe to the doctrine of his party as then announced. Within the last few days the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who is, without doubt, the best exponent of the principles of his party in this Chamber, stated his belief that the Government should own and operate the Pacific railroads, if not all railroads. That doctrine also is incorporated in their national platform.

I do not subscribe to it, and will not support it.

It would not be to the advantage of the people in any portion of the country, it seems to me, and in our own far Western section such a policy would be ruinous. The States of Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Idaho, Montana, and Wyoming, for instance, are very large in area, and, in proportion to their area, sparsely settled. In many counties in these States the railroad companies pay from 50 to 75 per cent of the taxes, and they pay from 10 to 25 per cent of the State taxes. You can not tax Government property; so that the moment the Government became the owner of these roads this additional burden of taxation would fall upon the few people in these counties.

It would be an unbearable burden to them, and there would be no advantages to compensate. The Government could not confiscate these roads. Even the Populists do not advocate that, for widows and minors and innocent people own their bonds and stocks in many instances, who could not be ruthlessly robbed of their property. It would require vast sums of money to buy them, which the people would have to pay. There are so many objections, in my mind, to the proposition, which could easily be enumerated, that I am utterly opposed to it.

Then, again, the Populists are free traders if they are anything on the question of the tariff. Every member of their party in the House voted for the Wilson bill, which was as nearly a free-trade measure as could be passed. The Senator from Kansas, Mr. PEFFER, voted against the amended Wilson bill in the Senate, but their party record and party platform are favorable to free trade. At any rate, they are not advocates of protection. I am, and especially to the so-called raw materials of wool, lumber, and lead ore. I could not properly represent the people of my State or do justice to my convictions if I were not.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me a moment? In so far as my tariff views are concerned they are strictly in accord with the Republican platform of 1860, upon which Mr.

Lincoln was elected to the Presidency, and which is found revamped, I think, in the Democratic platform of 1884. The two platforms, if the Senator will examine and analyze them, are in almost the same language. They are both to the effect that the primary purpose of the tax is to raise revenue, and that incidentally it may be so adjusted as to protect industries.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not understand the Senator from Nebraska to say that the Populist party are in favor of protection.

Mr. ALLEN. No; I state my tariff views. The Populist party platform of 1892 makes no definite declaration on the subject of the tariff. So far as my views are concerned, I say I entertain the same views that are declared in the platform of 1860, upon which Mr. Lincoln was elected, and which, if the Senator will examine carefully, he will find to be a revenue platform, and which the Democratic party declared in 1884 in almost identically the same language. I want to say to the Senator that if he will take the two planks out of those two different platforms and mix them up he can not tell to which platform either belongs.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator will have ample time to define his position. I make only one positive statement here. I am very guarded in my language. I state that at any rate they are not advocates of protection. Does the Senator from Nebraska say that they are?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am, as I said.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will excuse me just a moment, I will state that the Republican party as it now exists, I understand, declares in favor of protection in the first instance, with revenue as the incident of protection. I do not believe in that doctrine. The Republican party of 1860 declared in favor of revenue as the primary purpose of all taxation and protection as an incident to the levying of that revenue. I believe in and subscribe to that doctrine.

Mr. DUBOIS. The reasons given are sufficient to explain why the silver Republicans did not join with the Populists. There is no sympathy between us. The silver Republicans are in favor of hard money, while the Populists are in favor of irredeemable paper money. They vote for unlimited coinage of silver, not because they believe in silver as basic money; not because it is the money of the Constitution, but because the coinage of silver will make more money and will increase the volume of money per capita.

Unlimited coinage to them is but a stepping stone, a preliminary to irredeemable paper money. Unlimited coinage to us means a safe and adequate basis of money of ultimate redemption. Unlimited coinage will receive the vote of the Populists in this Chamber, and I am glad of it; but I object very seriously to being committed myself or of allowing the cause of silver to be committed to Populist doctrines in general.

Mr. President, on the 30th day of October, 1893, when the measure to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act was before us, I had the honor of addressing the Senate, and made use of the following expression:

> I can be a Republican and a consistent advocate of free coinage. I prefer to hold to my convictions on the other great questions while maintaining my convictions on the money question, relying on the good sense, judgment, and independence of the American people. So long as I am honored with a seat in this Chamber I shall continue this fight. I shall not cease the struggle here until free coinage shall prevail or I am no longer a member of this body.

There is nothing in present conditions to induce me to change the position announced at that time.

Mr. President, I shall vote for the report of the Finance Committee, which is before us and which declares for the unlimited coinage of silver, and regret that the vote of the Senate will not avail to secure its enactment.

There is plainly something wrong in this country, so fruitful in resources and opportunities, and so filled with intelligent, law-abiding, and industrious people. Business is slack, employment at fair wages, or at any wages at all, hard to get. Factories and mines are either idle or working at much less than their full capacity, while the great agricultural classes receive scarcely enough for their produce to pay the running expenses of their farms and plantations. There is no prosperity among the toilers, notwithstanding the statement made now and then that this or that factory or industry has commenced operations with an increased number of employees and increased wages.

An investigation of each isolated case reported, will show, in nearly every instance, that the increase has been from no employees to a few, and from very low wages to an amount which hardly affords a living. Since silver was demonetized, the condition of affairs has been growing steadily worse, and the prices of everything steadily falling. Various devices have been resorted to to stop this persistently declining market, but to no avail. We have passed the Bland-Allison and the Sherman silver laws, which, while only making a commodity of silver, and adding to the burdens of gold, still did some good and afforded some temporary relief, because they increased the volume of money; and we have repealed those acts, which made matters worse. We have passed the McKinley Tariff Act, a high protective measure, and we have repealed it. We have passed the Wilson-Gorman Act, and now desire and intend to repeal it.

The people have alternately defeated the Republican and Democratic parties in national elections since 1876, hoping, in their restlessness and hard condition, to find relief in a change.

The prophecies of those who object to unlimited silver coinage, that the repeal of the Sherman Act, or the enactment of the McKinley law, or the enactment of the Wilson Act, or the repeal of the McKinley law, or anything else they have tried, have been proven to be idle vaporings. They certainly must know that the evil lies somewhere else; they must know that the trouble has come through the demonetization of silver, and that it will remain so long as we adhere to the single gold standard.

I assume that they recognize this because nearly every one of them, if not quite all, declare that they would gladly restore silver, provided England would join with us in doing so. It does not occur to me that they can reasonably hope that England will take this step.

England adopted the gold standard in 1816 and has been striving ever since to induce the other great nations to do the same. She succeeded practically in accomplishing her object in 1873, when Germany and the United States demonetized silver. England is the great creditor nation, and the scarcer and dearer money is the greater is her gain and power. With our debts, and with the constantly increasing demand for money to develop our immense resources, we can not compete with England and the other European countries in the scramble for gold. When we get the gold we can not keep it, and about the only way we can get it at all, apparently, is to borrow it.

We owe Great Britain and her citizens two thousand millions of dollars; whenever she needs money she dumps as many of our securities as may be necessary upon our market and takes our gold. She has done that on a large scale several times within the last few years, with the result that business on this side has each time been paralyzed. Still, wise business men and great financiers, to say nothing of the metropolitan press, insist that the way to choke Great Britain into subjection is to send over another $200,000,000 worth of bonds and draw that much gold from her. England holds our indebtedness precisely as a banker holds a man's paper to whom he has loaned money on call. What must English financiers think of men who pursue such an argument as that?

But, Mr. President, there is much more to this business.

England purchases of us annually food products, cotton, and other raw materials in vast amounts. I suppose that last year those purchases amounte1 to $400,000,000; that represented only 60 per cent of what the same articles would have brought had silver never been demonetized. Thus she gets cheap material for her factories to work upon, cheap food for her operatives, and over all clears directly probably $160,000,000 in the purchase. Moreover, we have to pay England annually in interest and dividends $150,000,000 in gold, or its equivalent, and we are going to force her to adopt bimetallism! We are going to force her to give up annually a sum equal to 5 per cent interest on all the gold in the world, and at the same time force her to raise the price of the materials she uses in the factory and the food she feeds to her operatives!

We are going to do this, too, when her commissioners directly snubbed us in an international conference called for the special purpose of trying to give silver an international status as money. By this I do not mean to say that a majority of the people of Great Britain do not favor bimetallism—I believe they do; but it is over there as it is here, those in power are determined to destroy silver as money, despite the demand of the people. And now, Mr. President, let us, at the risk of repeating some things which have already been better said, look the real situation in the face, and try to reach a conclusion which will meet the approbation of millions of our countrymen who have imposed this great trust upon us.

There is business congestion, almost business prostration, in nearly all foreign lands—in Australia, in Argentina, in England herself—everywhere, indeed, except in bimetallic France and where the mines in South Africa are being worked. In our own country production has ceased to be profitable. The strength of our country, the men who give laborers employment in the field, factory, and mine, and who produce the articles the exchange of which makes commerce, have worked without reward for years. Though the people are increasing, agricultural lands are declining in value and a host of strong men, enough to make a mighty army, are unemployed. In the words of Mr. Balfour—

> We are undergoing that appreciation in the standard of value which is probably the most deadening and benumbing influence that can touch the springs of enterprise in a nation.

Because of new motors and labor-saving machines the working forces of the world have within a few years been doubled. In such a situation we are called upon to continue the gold standard and to increase our stock of money only as we can borrow gold by issuing bonds. This policy persisted in will still further reduce the value of every staple, the value of all agricultural lands, and make worthless the railroad securities throughout the country.

It will still further close the doors to labor; it will cripple capital by making all investments worthless, and all men who are in debt bankrupt. I believe the strain will put the very life of our Republic in jeopardy. I know it will greatly reduce the number of children in our schools and greatly increase the number of inmates in our prisons. On the other hand, Mr. President, I believe there was no mistake made when the motors and the labor-saving machines were invented; I believe there was no error on the part of the Infinite when the silver was planted in the hills and the deserts of the West.

I believe it was intended to be the lubricating fluid of commerce as the peaceful conquest of this continent by the Anglo-Saxon should progress, until every needed road, bridge, city, and school-house should be built, till the land should be subdued, and the mines worked to the extremes of both British and Spanish America. All admit that more money is an absolute necessity. Not paper evidences of indebtedness to pass as money, but real money. There is but one place from which it can be obtained; that is from the silver mines of the West. The money would cost the Government nothing but the recognition it gave it prior to 1873.

The withdrawal of that recognition has already cost the Government and the people more than the money cost of the great war, while through it the shrinkage in property values has been beyond estimate. There must be renewed prosperity given the people; there must be work supplied to the unemployed to avoid danger to our Republic. There must be more money—not purchased gold, not paper promises to pay, but the money of the Constitution—and it must come in a way that will not cost the Government anything to receive it. The men of the United States, man for man, need two dollars where any other people need one. We have a continent yet to subdue.

Let us cease to worry so much over the 3 per cent of our trade which is foreign, and try to quicken and make profitable the 97 per cent which is domestic. The internal purchases last year would have been a thousand millions of dollars more had the people been reasonably prosperous. The trade of the Eastern cities would have doubled and would have been conducted on fair margins of profit; the banks would have been more prosperous, and this policy would, in twenty-five years, cause the commercial center of the world to gravitate to New York.

Let us get Spanish America in accord financially with a common currency, and we will get its trade. 'Tis there the children of the next generation will have to seek their homes. It is in that field where the resistless energies of the Anglo-Saxon race on this side of the Atlantic must be exerted. This is our great national opportunity, and we shall be recreant to the mighty trust which has been placed in our hands if we do not improve it.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to make a long-drawn-out argument in favor of restoring silver. The subject has been treated exhaustively many times, much more ably than I could hope to present it, and no answers have been made to the arguments presented by bimetallists which attempt to prove our contention is not correct in principle. In fact, our opponents seem to rely chiefly on personal abuse of silver advocates in the Senate, and of ridicule of the States which they represent. There is nothing too mendacious or vicious for those advocates of the gold standard to say.

They deplore constantly the fact that the Western silver States have two Senators here, while New York State has but two, and point out the difference in population with an air of triumph, as if this disparity in population were ample reasons why the representatives of the smaller States should surrender their convictions to the keeping of the larger. They seem to forget that New York State has thirty-six members of the House, while Idaho, for instance, has but one, and that this proportion extends to all the States, and that the people are represented fully in respect to their numbers in the respective States in the House of Representatives and the electoral college.

This matter of representation in the Senate and House was fought out when our Constitution was framed. It would be profitable for these critics to read the debates which occurred on this subject at that time. The conclusion reached finally was that each State should have two Senators, and the prime reason was that the great and small States might meet on equal terms here; that the brutality of mighty majorities might be checked and justice done to the minorities; that the States might meet on common ground in this body, and from each other obtain justice for all.

Notwithstanding this, I read in the press of the East almost every day that the region I represent is but a "pocket borough," not entitled to consideration at your hands, and the inference is that it is peopled by a class of men who are a perpetual shock to the refined and virtuous East. California, Montana, Colorado, and all the mining States represented by silver advocates here are similarly attacked, and the personal and private characters of Senators representing those States are most wantonly and viciously assailed. No one escapes.

I could read extracts by the hour, embracing direct attacks on the private character of every silver advocate on this floor, but they are so vile that I do not care to dignify them by reproduction in the RECORD. The meanest and most vindictive of these newspapers are published in New York City, where for fourscore years the worst elements of our foreign immigration have found a lodgment and where there have been more scandals in connection with their city government and elections than in any other spot in our country.

Idaho and the West need no defense at my hands, much less is there any need for its representatives to explain their actions to the obsequious press of New York City. If our States are proper subjects for abuse, however, because they have two Senators each, with but a small population, as compared with New York or Pennsylvania, why should not some of the Eastern States, represented by gold advocates, be proper objects for attack also. Our mining States, these "rotten borough" States, have immense areas, are boundless in their resources, and are increasing in population in a marvelous manner.

They are the haven now, as they have been in the past, for the energetic and industrious and law-abiding people of our own and foreign countries. I do not wish to nor intend to disparage the smaller States of the East, for I have the greatest respect for them and their representatives, past and present; but they are small in area, as well as population, and their resources are well-nigh exhausted.

The increase in their population must, of necessity, be limited, and confined chiefly to the cities. Washington State, for instance, has an area of 66,880 square miles, while New Hampshire has 9,005 square miles. Washington Territory had 24,000 people in 1870, and New Hampshire State 318,300 in the same year. Washington State had 349,390 in 1890 and New Hampshire 376,530. Washington State is five years old, New Hampshire more than a century. Colorado is little more than twenty years old, yet has more population than either New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, or Delaware, and more resources and area than all of them combined. California has more resources and area and nearly as great a population as all of them combined. Utah, the new State, almost equals them in population, and I have no doubt that the next census will show that all of the new States of the West surpass these smaller States of the East in population.

The census for 1880–1890 shows that the percentage of increase in population during these ten years was: Washington, 350 per cent; Montana, 238 per cent; Idaho, 158 per cent; Colorado, 117 per cent; Rhode Island, 24 per cent; Delaware, 14 per cent; New Hampshire, 8 per cent; Vermont, 0.004 per cent.

While there are no great fortunes owned by families or individuals in our section, the facts are, as shown by the last census, that these mining camps, these "rotten borough" States of the New York press, rank first in wealth per capita, surpassing any other States of the Union. Massachusetts and Pennsylvania are old established and rich States, yet the people of Idaho are worth $2 each, as against $1 for each citizen of these great Commonwealths.

I repeat, Mr. President, that these States nor their representatives deserve the slurs and anathemas of an insolent, if not a purchased, press. It is no criterion because a State is small in population that its Senators will not be able and conscientious. In reviewing in your mind the long list of American statesmen who have occupied positions here, it will come to your recollection that the smaller States are not afraid of or ashamed to compare their list of illustrious Senators with the greater States. I believe that the smaller States select their Senators with more care than the larger.

The States of the East and South which are small in population have every reason to be proud of their Senators, past and present, and so far as the Senators from the mining States of the West are concerned, they will account to their constituents, and not to the New York press, and will not fear the judgment of their colleagues or of the country at large as to their ability, patriotism, or honor.

I desire to say distinctly, in order that I can not be misunderstood, that none of these vicious attacks of the metropolitan press on the advocates of silver have been countenanced by the Senators here who disagree with us on this great question, It would be well for these papers to follow the example of the Senators who support their side of the question at issue. They will not frighten anyone, nor will they make converts by their personal abuse.

Mr. President, I say, and challenge truthful denial, that there is scarcely anything recorded in history comparable with the work performed and the transformation produced by the men who during the past generation have dedicated the western half of this continent to civilization. I am not boasting, Mr. President; I am speaking in this strain only because I am tired of the sneers and the arrogance of the ignorant or willfully perverse. In this same connection, I beg further to say that until this West, which is my home, began to turn its streams of silver and gold upon the East, this Republic was but a second-rate power in the opinion of the world; but a fourth or fifth rate power in financial standing, on a level merely with Egypt and Turkey.

While the men of the West have been blazing the trails for and uprearing the temples to civilization they have at the same time supplied the men of the East with their vitalizing agent called real money, which has enabled them to transport and realize on their common, coarse commodities until they now have reached a point where their poor memories and their absence of common gratitude and their overwhelming egotism cry out, "Not unto you, but unto ourselves, all the glory is due."

The reason why the mining States of the West are for silver is not to be found in the statement that they have silver to sell. They have the gold also, and probably in as great abundance as silver. As silver depreciates gold appreciates, so that so far as the mere dollars and cents are concerned in the purchasing values of the metals it is practically immaterial to us whether we have gold monometallism, silver monometallism, or the double standard of gold and silver.

In addition to that, the value of the silver which is now being dug out or which can be produced in our States under any conditions amounts to but very little in comparison with our other resources.

It is and has been one of our industries, however, the same as gold production, and it has been, and should now be, treated as money of the Constitution. When the money function was taken away from silver by unjust and uncalled-for legislation, and the industry of silver mining crippled, our people and their representatives in Congress naturally inquired the reason, and this led them to study the question of money. The attention of our people has been especially and directly called to the subject of silver, no doubt, because we are producers of both gold and silver, and the results of investigation have united them firmly in favor of the restoration of silver.

As a fact, we suffer less absolutely than any other portion of the country on account of the demonetization of silver, and can endure the single standard of gold with less personal hardship than any other section. Taken all in all, as communities we are to-day, I think, better off than the Eastern States, and will continue to be. It is of little importance to us as compared with the farmers of the South, middle West, and East, and the wage earners generally, whether silver is restored or we maintain the single standard of gold.

Speaking for my State alone, which is not so well known and not so well equipped, perhaps, as some of her mountain neighbors, Idaho has more agricultural land than all of New England combined, and its soil ranks with the most fertile and productive to be found within the boundaries of our country. Almost every day there is filled with sunshine. In mountain and river and landscape there is an ever-changing and a never-dying charm. The ratio of deaths there, notwithstanding her bad people, is less than any other spot on earth. In mineral and agricultural and fruit-raising resources the State is so equipped that were it set apart and made an island of the sea she would be an empire within herself, without one needed attribute wanting.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the pending business be informally laid aside, and that the resolution offered a few days since by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL] may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside, not losing its place, that he may call up the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I can not yield to anyone.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Virginia must ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood that unanimous consent was asked for something, and I simply desired to call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the strong desire there is, certainly on this side of the Chamber, to have some time fixed for taking a vote upon the unfinished business.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I intended to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to agree to take the vote on a day next week, but I did not want to interfere with the Senator from Virginia. He desires to proceed, and I preferred not to interrupt him, even so much as for a moment.

Mr. ALDRICH. It will take only a single moment to do that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not like to interfere with the Senator from Virginia, but I am very anxious to secure an agreement.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Virginia is asking for unanimous consent, and I do not understand that it will interfere with him at all. I do not intend to make a suggestion that will lead to discussion.

Mr. DANIEL. I have taken the floor in pursuance of the formal notice given several days ago to the Senate, after, for the first time in the history of the Senate within my knowledge, having been taken from the floor by one who had not given notice.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly had no intention of interfering with the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia, that the unfinished business be informally laid aside and that the resolution of the Senator from New Jersey be laid before the Senate? The Chair hears none.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the resolution submitted by the Senator from New Jersey be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution called up by the Senator from Virginia will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. SEWELL on the 16th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Monroe doctrine, as originally propounded, was directed to the special prevention of the threatened action of the Allied Powers in reference to the revolted colonies of Spain, and the occupation, by way of colonization, of any supposed derelict territory on this hemisphere.

2. That the question of resisting any acquisition of territory by conquest was limited, as stated by Mr. Webster, to cases in which, by reason of proximity, such acquisition would be dangerous to our safety and the integrity of our institutions.

3. That the true ground upon which the Monroe announcement was based and upon which any similar position has been taken rests for its justification upon what may be our interests, and our interests only; and that neither by the Monroe doctrine nor any other official declaration have we ever come under any pledge to any power or State on this continent that binds us to act merely for their protection against invasion or encroachment by any other power.

4. That when a case arises in which a European power proposes to acquire territory by invasion or conquest, it is then for us to determine whether our safety and the integrity of our institutions demand that we shall resist such action by armed force if necessary.

5. That the Executive has pressed the Monroe doctrine beyond what was contemplated at the time of its announcement, and that the resultant sequence of the positions thus taken seems to be a committal of this Government to a protectorate over Mexico and the Central and South American States; that this would be most unwise and dangerous, and would violate the sound and well-established policy that we should avoid all entangling alliances with foreign powers, whether they be European or American.

6. That this action was premature, looking to the history of the controversy, and inopportune in view of the business and financial condition of the country.

7. That neither Congress nor the country can be, or has been, committed by the action or position of the executive department, in reference to the Venezuelan boundary controversy, as to the course to be pursued when the time shall have arrived for a final determination. It will then be our province and our duty to adopt such a line of policy and to take such action as may be then demanded by our sense of duty to the country and by a due regard for its honor and dignity, the welfare and safety of our people, and the integrity of our institutions.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, resolutions of the general assembly of Virginia indorsing the message of the President upon the Venezuelan complication with Great Britain were some days since laid by me before the Senate, and in venturing to-day to address the Senate upon that subject I have the gratifying assurance that I shall speak not only my own earnest personal convictions but those as well of the honored constituency which I in part represent.

Least of all the nations of the earth can Great Britain fitly object to the assertion of the Monroe doctrine by the United States, for, in the language of Edward Everett, it was announced not merely with the approval of the British minister of foreign affairs but had his earnest and oft-repeated solicitation.

Least of all nations does it become her to contend that it is not recognized as international law because it is not founded on the general consent of nations, for Great Britain herself invoked the United States to its utterance, not only without the consent but as well against the strong menaces of France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia.

Least of all nations can Great Britain fairly controvert that governmental policy which underlies the Monroe doctrine, for she, foremost and most conspicuously of all nations, has intervened in the affairs of the world at large, not only whenever her peace and safety were even remotely involved, but also wherever and whenever her capital could be invested, her commerce expanded, or territorial aggrandizement be exercised.

Even as to the existing dispute with Venezuela we perceive the outcropping of her own Monroe doctrine, so to speak, by her demand in a cession to Venezuela, at one time proffered, that no portion of the territory proposed to be ceded should be alienated at any time to a foreign power.

Yes, Mr. President, even the term "jingoes," now derisively applied to Americans who would resist foreign encroachments on American soil, is borrowed from the nomenclature of our British kin across the sea, they using it specially to designate the followers of Lord Beaconsfield, who favored a vigorous foreign policy. The expression was caught up from a popular song which ran:

> We don't want to fight, but, by jingo, if we do
> We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money, too.

The American jingoes are only chips of the old block—and very mild, moderate, abbreviated, and conservative chips at that, considering the block.

Least of all can the great nation from whom we derived "the language of Milton, the code of Blackstone, and the creed of Christ" flout the policy of arbitration. The main reason assigned by her prime minister for not accepting it—that is that many thousand British subjects have settled upon the disputed territory—begs the question. If they are there lawfully, an honest arbitrament would so ascertain and end the controversy. If they are but squatter sovereigns and land grabbers, or within Venezuela's rightful borders, neither they nor their sovereign can take advantage of their own wrong;—then they are a colony within the recognized denunciation of the Monroe doctrine, and even within the pale of the diluted resolutions of the Senator from New Jersey and the attenuated Americanism of the opposition.

Arbitration is the modern and the rightful method of settling differences between nations. It is the substitute for war. It appeals to humanity. It is necessary to civilization. It is Christianity.

The refusal of Great Britain to arbitrate a question, nominally one of boundary between British Guiana and the Republic of Venezuela, involving many thousand square miles of territory, has led to controversial correspondence between the British Government and the United States. In this correspondence our Government has stood for and recommended arbitration, but Great Britain has stood out against it and repelled it.

The circumstances of this controversy peculiarly impressed the policy of arbitration.

1. Boundary lines must rest on historic evidences and are readily capable of demarcation. Every civilized nation has a system of jurisprudence under which such a subject is easily explored and adjudicated.

2. Venezuela is in possession of much of the disputed territory, and has been long in possession. The loss to her would be greater than the gain to Great Britain, for it would be accompanied with all the humiliation and distress which are associated with the bereavement of national territory and the degradation of the national name.

3. Venezuela is the weaker nation. Would Great Britain treat Russia, Germany, France, or America as it treats her?

> Oh, it is excellent
> To have a giant's strength; but it is tyrannous
> To use it like a giant.

This is a free translation into our language of the French phrase "noblesse oblige."

The anxiety of the United States for a peaceful solution of the issue and their great concern in the interests involved have been continuously manifested, and, in every form of dignified diplomacy, have been communicated to the British nation.

Presidents have written messages, Secretaries of State have tendered the good offices of the United States, and Congress has passed resolutions—all in the spirit of conciliation, and all in vain.

In his message to Congress of December, 1891, Benjamin Harrison, then President, expressed his regret that the dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela, touching the boundary of British Guiana, had not been disposed of, and that the friendly efforts of the United States in that direction had thus far been unavailing. This Government, he said, will continue to express its concern at any appearance of encroachment on territories under the administrative control of the American States, and he well added:

> The determination of the disputed boundary is easily attainable by an amicable arbitration where the rights of the parties rest, as here, on historical facts readily ascertained.

President Cleveland, in his message to Congress of December, 1894, said:

> The boundary of British Guiana still remains in dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela. Believing that its early settlement, on some just basis alike honorable to both parties, is in the line of our established policy to remove from this hemisphere all causes of difference with powers beyond the sea, I shall renew the efforts heretofore made to bring about a restoration of diplomatic relations between the disputants and to induce a reference to arbitration, a resort which Great Britain so conspicuously favors in principle and respects in practice, and which is earnestly sought by her weaker adversary.

In February, 1894, the Congress of the United States resolved:

> That the President's suggestion made in his last annual message to this body, namely, that Great Britain and Venezuela refer their dispute as to boundaries to friendly arbitration, be earnestly recommended to the favorable consideration of both the parties in interest.

To all of those appeals—and to the appeals of the present Administration, of which I shall more specifically speak—and well knowing the American policy and the American interests in the question involved, Great Britain has turned a deaf ear. We fix the responsibility of the first wrong on Great Britain and we range both Congress and the Administration in their appropriate attitude as friends of justice and friends of peace.

Both the United States and Great Britain have been professed friends of arbitration between nations. They have both time and again added example to precept by so settling differences between themselves and by commending such plan of settlement to other nations. Twice has Great Britain arbitrated the question of her colonial possessions with the United States, twice with Portugal, and once with Germany. When the Franco-German war was brewing, Great Britain urged upon the two great nations a conference with each other to settle by arbitration. France refused—Sedan was her awful penalty. It is within recent memory that the Alabama claims preferred by the United States against Great Britain were settled by arbitration, the United States winning the case and Great Britain honorably paying the penalty. The controversies over the fisheries and the Bering Sea were both settled between them by arbitration, and in this century the United States has settled over forty international questions in this manner and over three-score and ten have been so settled among the various nations.

Just in proportion as mankind progresses and the arts of peace surround him with the comforts and luxuries of life, so increase the interdependence of man upon man, state upon state, and nation upon nation. As civilization advances, the complexity of its mechanism grows greater, and war in the like degree becomes the more destructive and the more horrible. Sweep commerce from the seas, break up the railroad and telegraph line, sever the electric line, cut the water pipe or gas pipe, and instantly hunger and thirst and darkness assail the city, while crops rot in uncultured fields and goods rot on deserted counters; while idle and famished throngs, demoralized and maddened, are ready to become a despot's tools. To bring upon the world the curse of war or to provoke it is a crime against God and man, a deed "to make all heaven weep, all earth amazed."

If so horrible a thing shall come to pass, be it remembered that the first step toward it was taken by Great Britain, when, being solemnly invoked for years to arbitrate a chronic question in which this Government felt deep concern, she refused to do it.

Some minor points should be eliminated from this discussion. The contention that the dispute covers but a narrow strip of territory, which is derided as "the mud flats of the Orinoco," is answered by the fact that between the extreme lines of boundary claimed by Great Britain and Venezuela are some 90,000 square miles of land, an area greater than any one of the thirteen original States of this Union as now bounded, and nearly twice as great as the Empire State of New York. Lord Salisbury describes the subject-matter as—

> Large tracts of territory which, from their auriferous nature, are known to be of almost untold value.

We are told in one breath that the President has gone a bow shot beyond Monroe, and that he has adopted a jingo policy. In the next breath we are told that he has given the whole matter away by saying that—

> Any adjustment of the boundary which Venezuela may deem to her advantage and may enter into with her own free will can not, of course, be objected to by the United States.

This is specific language applied to a specific condition of things. It was not destined to commit the United States to the doctrine that a foreign nation might be permitted to acquire American territory by any arrangement satisfactory to the grantor, and it is not fair to convert into the declaration of a general principle the mere utterance of a specific phrase containing a suggestion of adjustment, for as much was implied in the recommendations of both President Harrison and President Cleveland and in the resolutions of Congress recommending arbitration. The major proposition is "arbitrate by reference to a third party." It contains the minor proposition "agree with free will and in good faith without reference."

Two sets of resolutions are pending in the Senate. Those proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations are now on the Calendar, and I shall not discuss them in advance of their due consideration, further than to say that I regard them as simply embodying a detailed statement of the Monroe doctrine as embraced in the more general language in which it was uttered, and as according with the view given by Mr. Jefferson to Monroe that—

> We will oppose with all our means the forcible interposition of any other power as auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext, and most especially their transfer [that is, of any of our American territories] to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way.

I heard yesterday, Mr. President, a most eloquent and engaging speech from the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I imagined at one period of his speech, so high was his eulogy upon the British Empire and its heroes, and so severe some of his strictures upon the present Administration, that he was in fact opposing the doctrine of Monroe, or anything like it, but when I came to read it in cold type, I perceived that, instead of being the subjects of his strictures, those who advocate this doctrine are in reality the subjects of his praise, for he says, as to the Davis resolutions, which are so much misrepresented:

> The phraseology of the resolutions reported by the committee, Mr. President, is as unobjectionable as any language could be which endeavored to assert in binding and final terms a policy to which this Government desired to commit itself in dealing with the relations of foreign countries to this hemisphere. It is moderate, it is clear, and it is comprehensive. The objection to it, in my opinion, is that Congress is not called upon to give its sanction to any policy to be pursued toward the Governments to the south of us; and that at this particular juncture any legislation is unwise and can only accentuate existing difficulties.

So between the two Senators who have spoken to these resolutions offered by the Senator from New Jersey there is this difference, that the Senator from New Jersey thinks that his resolutions go far enough, while the Senator from Colorado characterizes those of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations as moderate, clear, and comprehensive, his only objection being not to what they contain, but as to the methods of dealing with the subject. The resolutions offered by the Senator from New Jersey seem to me to misinterpret the history and to pervert the plain language of the doctrine of Monroe; and if they be a correct reading of the last seventy years of our history, then I can readily believe with the Senator from Colorado that this doctrine has been greatly misunderstood.

That it was directed especially to the prevention of the threatened action of the Allied Powers in reference to the revolted colonies of Spain and the occupation, by way of colonization, of any supposed derelict territory on this hemisphere may be true, but it is only a half truth, for the language of Monroe covers—> any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power.

Why do Senators attempt to quote history, and quote but half of a sentiment or a sentence?

To their statement that the acquisition of territory by conquest was limited, as stated by Mr. Webster, to cases in which, by reason of proximity, such acquisition would be dangerous to our safety and the integrity of our institutions, the answer is complete that Mr. Webster himself applied the doctrine to the South American Republics, and that instead of being farther away from us now than they were at that time, they have practically grown closer by those bonds of civilization produced by rapid transit and communication.

It is admitted that the Monroe doctrine rests solely upon our interests, and that we have come under no pledge to any power or state that binds us to act for their protection. No one now desires to promulgate or to apply the doctrine with any other view than to act as an independent nation should act in furtherance of its own interests. But what resolution upon this floor or what Senator has suggested another idea; and why should the Senate resolve upon a question as to which there is no controversy?

The view of the resolutions offered by the Senator from New Jersey, which limits the doctrine to cases of invasion and conquest, is controverted by its own language, and as he has invoked Mr. Webster's name, let me reply to that resolution from Mr. Webster's speech in the Senate touching the transfer of Cuba by Spain to another European monarchy:

> An honorable member from Kentucky [Mr. Wickliffe] argues that, although we might rightfully prevent another power from taking Cuba from Spain by force, yet if Spain should choose to make the voluntary transfer, we should have no right whatever to interfere. Sir, this is a distinction without a difference. If we are likely to have contention about Cuba, let us first well consider what our rights are, and not commit ourselves. And, sir, if we have any right to interfere at all, it applies as well to the case of a peaceable as to that of a forcible transfer.

Mr. President, I could range a constellation of distinguished American names around the doctrine thus stated by Daniel Webster, but as it is lit up by a star of the first magnitude, I leave it alone in its glory.

That the President's action was premature and imprudent in view of our business and financial condition, it seems to me as but superficial criticism. The financial crisis came on five or six years ago—it may last five or ten years more. Meantime are the United States to take no cognizance of great affairs, but sit down supinely and let the wide world wag as it will? "Unsettled questions have no regard for the repose of nations"; we had to meet the question when it was presented, nor did it lie within our power or province to dictate to Great Britain and Venezuela when they should present it.

That the Executive could not commit Congress or the country by his action is readily admitted. But it may as well be stated at the same time that the country has never refused yet, in all its history, to stand by a President who was guarding its rights and interests, and that the masses of the people, as well as their representatives in Congress, will support him is too manifest to need argumentation.

The declaration of the resolutions that the Executive has pressed the doctrine beyond what was contemplated at the time of its announcement, and that it commits us to a protectorate over Mexico and the Central and South American States, is farfetched. And now I shall attempt to show this by analyzing the doctrine and its history. But let me say I am not for the doctrine because Monroe uttered it or anybody else has supported it. I am for it because it is sound American doctrine and embodies an American policy which is necessary to our tranquillity and safety.

And let me say, Mr. President, that while I am a believer in the doctrine of Monroe, I do not rest my advocacy of the principles embodied in the President's message upon that doctrine alone. If there had never been a Monroe doctrine, I should be in favor of making an American doctrine now, not resting it upon tradition, but upon the obvious interest and policy of the people of the United States.

Rufus Choate was once addressing a court and made a legal proposition. "Can you refer me, Mr. Choate," said the presiding judge, "to any precedent?" "I hope, sir, that none can be found," answered Mr. Choate, "for then your court would have the honor of making one to be respected hereafter." That is the way I feel as to the American doctrine embodied in the language of Monroe.

I shall, however, note before I go fully into the discussion, the declaration of the Senator from New Jersey, that Monroeism is a dead letter, and I shall have regard to his consignment of it to the tomb of the Capulets.

I can not better describe the effect of the Monroe doctrine than by adopting the language of Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State, in his report to President Grant of July 14, 1870, in which he said:

> This declaration resolves the solution of the immediate question of the independence of the Spanish-American colonies, and is supposed to have exercised some influence upon the course of the British Government in regard to the Absolutists' claims in Europe as well as in America. It has also exercised a permanent influence on this continent; it was at once invoked in consequence of the supposed peril of Yucatan on the side of Europe; it was applied to a similar danger threatening Yucatan; it was embodied in the treaty of the United States and Great Britain as to Central America; it produced the successful opposition of the United States to an attempt of Great Britain to exercise dominion in Nicaragua under the cover of the Mesquite Indians, and it operated in like manner to prevent the establishment of a European dynasty in the United States.

In extension or furtherance of the doctrine, Mr. Frelinghuysen, as Secretary of State, wrote on January 4, 1883, that, on the ground that the decision of American questions pertains to America itself, the Department will not sanction any arbitration by European States of South American difficulties, even with the consent of the parties. Mr. Blaine, in 1881, informed Mr. Noyes, our resident minister at Paris, that this Government would regard with grave anxiety an attempt on the part of France to force by hostile pressure the payment by Venezuela of her debt to French citizens, and the same year advised Mr. Morton, then our minister at the same court, that it was inexpedient for the United States to join with France and Great Britain in intervening to terminate hostilities between Chile and Peru.

For a dead letter and for a corpse in the tomb of the Capulets this doctrine has indeed played a great figure in the affairs of the world.

President Cleveland's message of December 17, 1895, with respect to the differences between Great Britain and Venezuela, was the most notable political event of that year. Its reception by Congress was worthy the dignity of the subject and the occasion. Controversies of party instantly subsided and in the hush of all personal, sectional, and political contentions both Houses instantly responded by voting the hundred thousand dollars asked for the constitution of a commission to investigate the subject. It was a sublime spectacle to behold how the call of patriotism made the people one. The commission of five eminent citizens has now been organized to give careful and impartial investigation of the matter, and pending that investigation I do not see fit to discuss the merits of the question. But if Congress has been unanimous, there have been dissenting voices from different parts of the country, mostly from the stock exchanges and centers of trade, which have found rumors of war disturbing to their business.

I am glad to say, however, that in the great State of New York he who once presided as Vice-President over this Chamber, and who is now the governor of New York, has not lost the equanimity of his American sentiments. Governor Morton says, in a message to the legislature of that State:

> The doctrine formulated by President Monroe, and which has since borne his name, has become so well established in American national policy that there is no room for doubt as to the opinion of our people concerning it.

He well adds:

> Arbitration affords a simple, humane, and peaceful method of determining the dispute, and it is scarcely conceivable, at this period of the world's history, that any great nation is willing to take the responsibility of the sacrifice of human life and the wanton destruction of property which would be the inevitable result of an armed conflict.

Since 1814, when Great Britain acquired Demerara, Essequibo, and Berbice by treaty with the Netherlands, the dividing line between these establishments, now known as British Guiana and Venezuela, has been a subject of difference between Great Britain and that country.

It is observable in the British Blue Book and the Colonial List that this line between 1885 and 1886 leaped forward so as to embrace 33,000 square miles of territory never claimed ostensibly in the official publications of the British Government before.

In 1840 Great Britain sent Sir Robert Schomburgk to ascertain and lay down the western boundaries of British Guiana. He proceeded to fix the line since known as the Schomburgk line, outlined it on maps, and marked it by posts and other indicia of boundary. Venezuela protested against this line, and the boundary marks set up by Schomburgk were removed by order of Lord Aberdeen. From time to time since 1840 various lines have been proposed by Great Britain.

Lord Aberdeen proposed a line in 1844 beginning at the River Moroco.

Lord Granville in 1801 indicated another line placing the starting point at a distance of 20 miles from the Moroco, in the direction of Punta Barima.

Lord Rosebery in 1886 placed the boundary west of the Guaima River.

Lord Salisbury in 1890 fixed the starting point of the line in the mouth of the Amacuro River, west of Punta Barima, on the Orinoco.

Lord Rosebery in 1893 brought forward a line again from a point to the west of the Amacuro as far as the source of the Cumano River and the mountains of Usupamo.

In 1876 Venezuela proposed to close the dispute by accepting the Moroco line proposed by Lord Aberdeen in 1844.

Lord Granville rejected this proposal and suggested a new line taking in a much larger tract of territory. Venezuela declined this proposal in 1882 and suggested arbitration. But before this had taken the form of any definite proposal Great Britain suggested a treaty which should determine the boundary and other disputed questions. In 1886 the Gladstone Government, as we are told by Mr. Olney, practically agreed upon a treaty containing a general arbitration clause, but before it was signed Lord Salisbury superseded Mr. Gladstone in office and declined to acceed to the arbitration clause unless Venezuela should confine it to such of the disputed territory as lies west of the line designated by him and abandon claim to the residue. Weary of the dispute, Venezuela, in 1887, withdrew her minister from the Court of St. James, and protesting before Her Majesty's Government and before all civilized nations and before the world in general against the acts of spoliation committed to her detriment by the Government of Great Britain, which she will at no time and on no account recognize as capable of altering in the least the rights which she had inherited from Spain, and respecting which she will ever be willing to submit to the decision of a third power.

On January 20, 1895, Mr. Olney, the American Secretary of State, addressed a note to our minister to Great Britain, in which he set forth the facts which I have related, with many others pertinent to the controversy, and fully expounding the American policy with relation to the aggrandizement of territory in this country by the nations of the Old World. His note is a powerful, clear, and unanswerable exposition of the subject. He explained the Monroe doctrine and cited the instances in which our Government had applied it. He referred to the British demand that her right to a disputed portion of the territory should be acknowledged before she would consent to an arbitration as to the rest, which, as he declared, "in effect deprived Venezuela of her free agency and puts her under virtual duress."

Territory—

He said—

acquired by reason of it will be as much wrested from her by the strong hand as if occupied by British troops or covered by British fleets. It seems, therefore, quite impossible that this position of Great Britain should be assented to by the United States, or that, if such position be adhered to with the result of enlarging the bounds of British Guiana, it should not be regarded as amounting in substance to an invasion and conquest of Venezuelan territory.

Further he stated:

Great Britain's assertion of title to the disputed territory, combined with her refusal to have that title investigated, being a substantial appropriation of the territory to her own use, not to protest and give warning that the transaction will be regarded as injurious to the interests of the people of the United States, as well as oppressive in itself, would be to ignore an established policy with which the honor and welfare of this country are closely identified.

Under these circumstances he instructed Ambassador Bayard to present these views to Lord Salisbury by reading to him his communication and to reenforce them by such pertinent considerations as would doubtless occur to him. Our Secretary of State thus called for a definite decision upon the point whether Great Britain would consent or decline to submit the Venezuelan boundary question in its entirety to impartial arbitration, and he expressed in conclusion the earnest hope of the President that the conclusion would be on the side of arbitration and that Great Britain would add one more to the conspicuous precedents she has already furnished in favor of that wise and just mode of adjusting international disputes.

Lord Salisbury replied to Mr. Olney's communication in two dispatches, both dated November 26, 1895, in which he disputed the applicability of the Monroe doctrine to the question, and declined on the part of Great Britain to submit to arbitration the territory in question beyond the Schomburgk line. Speedily after the receipt of these messages the President sent his message to Congress in reply to Lord Salisbury's contention that the doctrines of Monroe are generally inapplicable to the state of things in which we live at the present day, and especially inapplicable to the controversy involving the boundary line between Great Britain and Venezuela. He stated that—

The doctrine upon which we stand is strong and sound, because its enforcement is important to our peace and safety as a nation and is essential to the integrity of our free institutions and the tranquil maintenance of our distinctive form of government. It was intended to apply to every stage of our national life, and can not become obsolete while our Republic endures. If the balance of power is justly a cause for jealous anxiety among the Governments of the Old World and a subject for our absolute noninterference, none the less is an observance of the Monroe doctrine of vital concern to our people and their Government.

If a European power, by an extension of its boundaries, takes possession of the territory of one of our neighboring republics against its will and in derogation of its rights, it is difficult to see why to that extent such European power does not thereby attempt to extend its system of government to that portion of this continent which is thus taken.

In reply to the suggestion that the Monroe doctrine does not embody any principle of international law which is founded on the general consent of nations, he conclusively answered that—while it may not have been admitted in so many words to the code of international law, but since in international councils every nation is entitled to the rights belonging to it, if the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine is something we may justly claim it has its place in the code of international law as certainly and as securely as if it were specifically mentioned.

The President, further summing up his views, recommended the appointment of an American commission to investigate the case and declared that—

When such report is made and accepted it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist by every means in its power as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory which after investigation we have determined of right belong to Venezuela.

In support of these sentiments I speak now with such feelings as must have possessed Lewis Cass, of Michigan, when as a member of this body he here declared in 1856, with reference to the Monroe doctrine, that—

We ought years ago by Congressional interposition to have made this system and policy an American system by a solemn declaration, and if we had done so we should have spared ourselves much trouble and no little mortification.

Indeed, one of the grounds taken by the British prime minister in his letter to Mr. Olney is that this Government has never formally notified the government of any other nation of its claims under the Monroe doctrine. Why, sir, if he had turned over the archives of his own office and explored the letters of Secretaries Blaine and Frelinghuysen he would have found that he was in error in that statement, and surely he has access to the Parliamentary proceedings of his own country, which would abundantly enlighten him. For my part I am in favor of clearing the way so that he may have no excuse for falling into such an error hereafter.

The great names of our history are identified with this doctrine.

Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, John Tyler, James K. Polk, James Buchanan, Abraham Lincoln, U. S. Grant, R. B. Hayes, James A. Garfield, Chester A. Arthur, and Benjamin Harrison, and now notably Grover Cleveland, have given it their approbation.

Daniel Webster, Edward Everett, Henry Clay, John M. Clayton, William H. Seward, Lewis Cass, Hamilton Fish, William M. Evarts, Theodore Frelinghuysen, James G. Blaine, Thomas F. Bayard, and now Richard Olney are among the distinguished Secretaries who have indorsed and advocated it. It is embedded in the minds of the people as a necessary principle of American policy and is dear to their hearts as a glorious tradition of their national life. If it has been a dead letter, the Presidents and Secretaries of State of the United States and the great statesmen who have led their movements and molded their measures have been singularly ignorant and misinformed.

The immortal Farewell Address of Washington gave to this country an invaluable legacy in warning us to avoid implication in the ordinary vicissitudes of European politics or in the ordinary combinations and collisions of its friendships and enmities. The felicitous phrase of Jefferson, "Friendly relations with all nations, entangling alliances with none," became a proverb, and the successors of the fathers have often repeated this counsel, which was as obvious in its wisdom as it was impressive and cogent in its utterance. It was mainly based by Washington upon the fact that Europe has a set of interests which to us have none or a very remote relation, and that hence she must become engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns, while our detached and distant situation invited and enabled us to preserve a different course.

At the time when this advice originated the United States was the only republic—indeed, the only independent nation—of the Western Hemisphere. Its territory consisted of a narrow strip of land on the Atlantic coast, its population was thin and scattered, it had entered upon the experiment of a federated republic surrounded north and south by the colonial possessions of the great monarchies of Europe, while its boundaries, distant but a few hundred miles from the seaboard, were yet tenanted by powerful tribes of savages. The domestic situation naturally prompted and impressed the lesson of Washington, while beyond the seas the turmoils and perturbations which grew out of the French revolution were in themselves warnings to us to abstain as far as possible from implicating ourselves in them.

Beyond these considerations lay the fact that we had many perplexing questions of our own to deal with. We were in the infantile and formative period of independent existence. There was a new heaven and a new earth to the people, who felt the quickening pulses of freedom, independence, union, and nationality. To the new conditions our statesmen addressed themselves with vigor and skill, and if the spectacle of the rapid advancement through the wilderness of a fresh young people, the rise of new States, and the rounding out of our natural empire by diplomatic address and the conquests of arms be an imposing one in the physical progress of the race, yet more so must be the rare phenomena of intellectual development disclosed in the masterful statecraft with which new problems, novel and difficult, which pressed upon us, were grasped and solved.

As time progressed it soon became evident that if Europe had her set of primary interests which did not concern us, the American continent had a set of primary interests in which our concern was necessary and paramount to that of Europe. If nonintervention of America in European affairs was the policy of our situation, to preserve our peace and safety, so the noninterference of Europe with the affairs of independent American States became the corollary. As new republics sprung up in America, it became as manifestly our duty to assert the counterpart of Washington's advice as it was to him to utter it. Our international creed was not complete until we had rounded the declaration that we would not interfere in European affairs with the additional declaration that we would not regard with friendship European interference with those of independent sister American States.

James Monroe, the first of a line of Presidents who have taught this creed, was the fifth President of the United States, twice chosen to that office. He was one of the band of worthies who are regarded as the Conscript Fathers of the Republic. He was a profound student of political systems, policies, and movements, and he was deeply imbued with the spirit of Democratic faith and with the principles of our free Constitution. For over half a century his name was associated with the great events of war and peace which marked the rise of the American people, the extension of their empire, and the formation of their institutions. His Administration was known as the era of good feeling. John Quincy Adams called it "the golden age." His teachings have left a deep and lasting impression upon our history.

He was born in Westmoreland County, Va., on the 28th of April, 1758, and at the outbreak of the Revolutionary war he was a student at the old college of William and Mary. Laying aside his studies at the outbreak of hostilities in 1776, he, with three of its professors and some threescore of his fellows, including John Marshall, afterwards our first Chief Justice, joined their comrades from Harvard, Yale, and Princeton as volunteers in the Continental Army. Becoming a lieutenant in the Third Virginia Regiment, commanded by Hugh Mercer, he and his captain, William Washington, fell wounded side by side in the battle of Princeton, where their brave colonel lost his life; and early distinguished by his acts of gallantry in the northern campaigns, he arose from one degree to another until none surpassed him in public service or in the esteem and confidence of his countrymen.

His intimacy with Thomas Jefferson began in 1780, when he studied law under his direction while he was governor of Virginia, and he was a lifelong friend of his distinguished compatriots, Washington, Jefferson, Marshall, and Madison. His public employments were various, and his restless activity was always directed to the highest tasks. He was singularly wise, discreet, courageous, practical, and successful. He was so perfectly honest that Jefferson said of him—

If his soul were turned inside out, not a spot would be found on it—

And—

There was a downrightness and manliness and crystal-like integrity in his character which constantly grew upon his associates.

No American that ever lived was in closer sympathy with the genius of his country or more useful in the steady and able maintenance of its just policies. He was a member of the executive council of his State, three times a member of its legislature, and three times its governor. He was a member of the Continental Congress, a Senator of the United States, a member of the Virginia convention which ratified the Federal Constitution in 1788, and more than forty years afterwards he sat with Marshall and Madison in the convention that formed the Virginia constitution in 1830. He became minister to France under the appointment of Washington in 1794, and in that country he was received with great favor, while for his part he expressed his own and his country's sympathy with the French Republic so earnestly that his language was deemed by Washington scarcely in keeping with the neutral policy which his Administration proclaimed. He was again employed in the diplomatic service in 1803, in the Administration of Jefferson, and was associated with Livingston, our resident minister at Paris, in negotiating the purchase of New Orleans and the territory embracing the mouth of the Mississippi, which formed a part of the province of Louisiana recently ceded by Spain to France. He was Secretary of State and Secretary of War in the Cabinet of Madison, and at one time performed the functions of both offices.

As a member of the Virginia legislature he was one of those who brought forward the bill by which Virginia confirmed the Northwest ordinance of 1788 for the colonization by freemen alone of the Northwest Territory, which she gave to the Union, and dedicating portions thereof to educational purposes, thus laying the foundation of the great free and independent States which now occupy so commanding a position in the Union. He was destined to play a conspicuous part in rounding the dimensions of the United States to their natural boundaries by the Gulf of Mexico and the Pacific Ocean. In the treaty of peace with Great Britain it had been stipulated that the Mississippi River from its source to its mouth should be open to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States. Spain, then holding the Floridas, which included the territory afterwards known as Louisiana, objected, and many were disposed to surrender the American claim of right to this highway to the ocean. The Virginia delegates in Congress persistently refused to yield, and among them was Monroe, who in 1786 wrote a pamphlet asserting the right of the inhabitants of the Western country to the free navigation of the Mississippi.

It was due to the persistence of a few strong men, thus led by him, that the Spanish closure of the mouth of the Mississippi was prevented, and that the territory which passed from Spain to France was added to the United States of America, and it was his singular good fortune to have been Secretary of War of the United States at the time when Jackson won his famous victory over Pakenham at New Orleans on the 8th of January, 1815, and I will here indulge in the pleasing reflection that the great States of the West which now fill this Chamber with the representatives of their equality won to us by the policy of Monroe are parts of that territory, and that my own State had no small part in the far seeing and brave statesmanship which commenced the negotiation for its acquisition in the Administration of Washington and consummated it in the Administration of Jefferson.

Monroe succeeded Madison as President in 1816, and was reelected without opposition in 1820. For his Cabinet officers he chose John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; John C. Calhoun, Secretary of War; W. H. Crawford as Secretary of the Treasury, and William Wirt as Attorney-General; and with these able officers he dealt with consummate ability with the issues that came before him. He accomplished in 1819 the acquisition of the Floridas which, as minister to Spain, he had failed to do in 1804. But the act of his Administration by which his name is most distinguished was the promulgation of what is known as the Monroe doctrine, an utterance of his seventh annual message, of the 2d of December, 1823.

The occasion for the promulgation of that doctrine, its significance, its utility, and its place among the traditional principles of the American people I propose now to consider. It was brought forth by two important complications in our foreign affairs. In 1820 the Russian Emperor had issued a ukase declaring that the pursuit of commerce, whaling, fishing, and all other industries, whether on the islands or in the ports and gulfs of the northwestern coast of America from Bering Straits to 51° north latitude, belonged exclusively to Russia and that no foreign vessels should come within 300 miles of the coast.

About the same time affairs in Europe assumed a threatening attitude toward America. Napoleon had been overthrown at Waterloo on the 18th of June, 1815. The Bourbons were again in power, Louis XVIII longing to imitate "the Grand Monarque," came once more to the throne of France. The Allied Powers in Europe found fitting opportunity for undertaking to suppress the popular spirit engendered by the American and the French revolutions and to assert the divine rights of kings.

Their treaty was signed at Paris by Alexander of Russia, Francis of Austria, and Frederick William of Prussia, acting as absolute sovereigns, without the intervention of ministers or diplomatic agents. To read it in the garish light of these practical times one would suppose that these visionary monarchs imagined that they could make the world "one entire and perfect chrysolite"—that the millennium was about to flower out over the lava beds of exhausted revolution. Led on by Alexander of Russia, who was himself inspired by the Baroness Krudener, a woman of mystic eloquence, they assumed themselves to be the delegates of Providence, charged with governing three branches of the human family and consecrating themselves to an indissoluble fraternity for the protection of religion, peace, and justice. They invoked their peoples to glory in the principles which the divine Saviour had taught to man, and they invited all sovereigns to join their order of the Holy Alliance. The irreverent populace fitly nicknamed their scheme "The Conspiracy of Kings." They were "moral agriculturists," after the manner of Captain Wragge. There was never among nations a more complete exhibit of the wolf in sheep's clothing. Under this guise of sanctity lay dreams of conquest and a determination to suppress all assertions and advancements of the popular spirit. As vicegerents of fate, they proposed a crusade against the liberties of mankind. Of a tender disposition by nature, but wholly possessed by the doctrine of absolutism, Alexander was not unwilling to make concessions to liberal views, but he recognized no rights in peoples to move on their own lines of progress, and taught that policy and privilege should flow downward to the people from the throne.

The allied sovereigns of this alliance held congresses from time to time at Aix-la-Chapelle, Troppau, Laybach, and Verona, concerting plans for the propagation of their doctrines. The first manifestations of their power appeared in an effort to strengthen the shaky thrones of Europe and to crush out mercilessly every appearance of democratic principle and popular institutions. In pursuance of this behest an Austrian army exterminated the Neapolitan revolution and reestablished the Bourbon house against the protest of France and the disapproval of England. Soon another moved against the Piedmontese. France now cooperating with the alliance, a French army of 100,000 men was sent by Louis XVIII in 1823 under the Duc d'Angouleme into Spain to support the incapable Bourbon king, Ferdinand VII, who has been well described as an indolent sovereign who had neither the courage which commands respect, the generosity which wins affection, nor the wisdom which averts catastrophe. He, by the decree of Valencia, had abrogated the democratic constitution of 1812, which was ill suited to the Spanish nation, then in the throes of internecine strife, and he was without either the material resources or moral qualities which enabled him efficiently to cope with it and with the treasury depleted by the loss of revenues from the revolting colonies of America.

Europe indeed had been left in a most unhappy state by the wars which preceded the downfall of Napoleon, who in opening the career to talent had set aflame the ambitious spirits of the populace, which broke out afresh under the slightest relaxation of despotic vigilance. In Naples and Piedmont and in Spain and in France insurrection time and again sounded its angry note; secret societies menaced the Czar and swarmed throughout Russia; a regiment of his household troops mutinied in St. Petersburg, and all was not quiet even in Warsaw, where the Polish Diet rejected laws proposed by Alexander. Greece was in revolution against the Turk. The Holy Alliance in religious garb proposed to combine the kings of the earth together and wipe out all malcontents, and held out to Ferdinand of Spain that if he would crush constitutionalism and democracy in his kingdom they would combine and restore to his throne the now revolting South American States.

It is to be remembered that, while the Spanish Peninsula was the theater of the great struggle in the Napoleonic war, the colonies of Spain in South America had seized the opportunity to slip the noose of despotism and to assert their faith that Columbus had not discovered America to feed the mutineers of La Mancha and the cobblers of Castile.

While Soult and other veteran marshals of France were warring upon the Spaniards, the revolt of South America, which broke out at Caracas, in Venezuela, in 1810, had spread until now Mexico, Guatemala, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Chile, Bolivia, the Argentine Republic, and Uruguay had set up their independence and had been recognized by the United States. Great Britain had held aloof from the Holy Alliance. Lord Castelreigh, representing a country which had "extorted its liberties over its sovereign and changed the dynasty on the throne to secure them," pursued that line of conduct which became the representatives of a free people and abstained from complication with the conspiracy of kings.

Now, at last, her silence was changed to mutterings of discontent. She was unwilling to see the fruits of the Peninsula war thrown away and Spain made at last the prey of France. She saw in these new States of South America a fine opportunity to open marts for her own commerce free from Spanish restrictions and impositions which she was unwilling should be restored, and she found in them also a fine field for the operations of her capitalists, who had largely invested in South American bonds. Determined, if possible, to put a stop to the far-reaching designs of the alliance, and prompted by the natural interests of his country and her natural rivalry of the great powers, George Canning, the secretary of state for foreign affairs, arrayed himself against it and invoked American cooperation. Shrewdly did he say to Richard Rush, the American minister to England:

> Are the great political and commercial interests which hang upon the destinies of the new world to be canvassed and adjusted in Europe without the cooperation or even the knowledge of the United States?

The United States had indeed received a suggestion from the Emperor of Russia that they should join the alliance, but John Quincy Adams, Monroe's Secretary of State, had promptly answered:

> The political system of the United States is essentially extra-European. To stand in firm and cautious independence of all entanglements of the European system has been the cardinal point of their policy under every Administration of their Government from the peace of 1783 to this day.

And the overtures had been declined. He was still Secretary of State when it became necessary for the United States to declare the corollary of this doctrine and to warn Europe against interference with American affairs. "America for Americans" was a sentiment which had been greatly promulgated among the people, and it was for him to take an honorable and noteworthy part in its promulgation.

It was under the circumstances that I have described that Monroe delivered the message of December 2, 1823. In reference to our differences with Russia in respect to the interests involved on the northwestern coast of this continent, he indicated his assent to the proposal of the Russian Imperial Government to settle them by amicable negotiation and declared the disposition of our Government to cultivate the best understanding with it. But he added this sentence:

> In the discussion to which this interest has given rise and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power.

With reference to the conditions of Europe he then declared as follows:

> In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy to do so. It is only when our rights are invaded or seriously menaced that we resent injuries or make preparations for our defense. With the movements in this hemisphere, we are, of necessity, more immediately connected, and by causes which must be obvious to all enlightened and impartial observers. The political system of the Allied Powers is essentially different in this respect from that of America. This difference proceeds from that which exists in their respective Governments. And to the defense of our own, which has been achieved by the loss of so much blood and treasure and matured by the wisdom of their most enlightened citizens, and under which we have enjoyed unexampled felicity, this whole nation is devoted. We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety.
> With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere.
> But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.
> Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is, not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers; to consider the government de facto as the legitimate government for us; to cultivate friendly relations with it, and to preserve those relations by a frank, firm, and manly policy, meeting in all instances the just claims of every power, submitting to injuries from none. But in regard to these continents circumstances are eminently and conspicuously different. It is impossible that the Allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; nor can anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition, in any form, with indifference.

In the quotations which I have made from Monroe's message is found the Monroe doctrine. It will be observed that it is clear and comprehensive and that it embraces these propositions:

1. Noninterference on our part with the internal concerns of European powers.
2. Noninterference with existing colonies in America.
3. No colonization of free and independent American States for the future by any European powers.
4. No extensions of the political systems of Europe in America.
5. No interposition of any European power for the purpose of opposing or controlling in any other manner the destiny of American States.

Mark the words "any European power." No limitation to the Holy Alliance there.

This message was welcomed with joy in Great Britain and South America as well as in our own country. The price of South American securities leaped upward, much to the joy of English investors. The assurance of liberty rendered South America enthusiastic. The brave and statesmanlike utterances of our Chief Magistrate made American hearts leap for joy.

Sir James McIntosh declared that—

The coincidences of the two great English Commonwealths can not be contemplated without the utmost pleasure by every intelligent citizen of the earth.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said in the House of Lords:

If we had been tardy it was a satisfaction to find that America had on this occasion taken that decisive step which so well became its character and its interest. As that important decision was of the utmost consequence to every portion of the world where freedom was valued, he could not grudge to the United States the glory of having thus early thrown her shield over those struggles for freedom which were so important not only to America herself, but to the whole world.—Hansard's Debates, February 3, 1824.

Mr. Brougham, afterwards Lord Brougham, was cheered in the House of Commons when, in language of lofty eloquence, resembling that of Webster, he referred to Monroe's message:

An event had recently happened than which no event had dispersed greater joy, exultation, and gratitude over all the powers in Europe—an event in which he as an Englishman, connected by ties of blood and language with America, took peculiar pride and satisfaction—an event, he repeated, had happened which was decisive on the subject; and that event was the speech and message of the President of the United States to Congress. The line of policy which that speech disclosed became a great, a free, and an independent nation; and he hoped that His Majesty's ministers would be prevented by no mean pride, no paltry jealousy, from following so noble and illustrious an example. He trusted that as the United States had had the glory of setting, we would have the good taste to follow, the example of holding fast by free institutions and of assisting our brother freemen, in whatever part of the globe they should be found, in placing bounds to that impious alliance which, if it ever succeeded in bringing down the Old World to its own degraded level, would not hesitate to attempt to master the New World too.

And yet, sir, the British prime minister to-day criticises the United States because Great Britain was not formally notified in writing of a doctrine which both Houses of the British Parliament received with enthusiasm and the Commons with cheers, and which was decisive of the question then perplexing the British throne.

But with all the exultation with which Great Britain welcomed her American ally against the machinations of the Holy Alliance, there was a sting in it for her as well as for Russia. President Monroe had not only put a lion in the path of a particular scheme of despotism and aggrandizement, but had declared broad American principles which were thorns in the side of Great Britain and forewarnings to her as well as to the then conspiring monarchs. What England wanted was the cooperation of America to prevent other European powers from interfering in South America. She had no idea of inviting prevention of her own interference, while Canning, never assenting to the specific declarations of Monroe, held that "the United States had no right to take umbrage at the establishment of new colonies from Europe on any unoccupied parts of the American Continent." Indeed, England became in time so offended by Monroe's declaration against further colonization that she refused to cooperate with us in settling the Russian question. While great credit is often assumed by Great Britain for her stand against the Holy Alliance, and while some is deserved, she was not inspired so greatly by the spirit of freedom as by the spirit of self-interest in her profitable markets.

In a letter dated December, 1823, to the British minister to Spain, Mr. Canning displayed plainly enough his animus, for he said:

Monarchy in Mexico and monarchy in Brazil would cure the evils of universal democracy and prevent the drawing of demarkation which I most dread—America vs. Europe. The United States naturally enough aim at this division and cherish the democracy which leads to it, but I do not much apprehend their influence, even if I believe, which I do not altogether, in all the reports of their activity in America. Mexico and they are too neighborly to be friends. In the meantime they have aided us materially.

In other words, he was glad enough to get our aid to thwart a rival, but deplored and dissented from the principle on which the aid was given.

John Quincy Adams succeeded Monroe as President in 1825. No one was better fitted to propagate the policy of his predecessor. Indeed, the first hint of the Monroe doctrine in official documents is found in a communication of John Quincy Adams, the Secretary of State, to Richard Rush, our minister to England, dated July 2, 1823, in which he said:

These independent nations (meaning those on the American Continent south of us) will possess the rights incident to that condition, and their territories will of course be subject to no exclusive right of navigation in their vicinity or of any access to them by any foreign nation. The necessary consequence of this state of things would be that the American colonies henceforth will no longer be subject to colonization.

In the same month he informed the Russian minister that—

We should contest the right of Russia to any territorial establishment on this continent, and that we should assume distinctly the principle that the American Continents are no longer subject to any new European colonial establishments.

And it is unquestioned that it was at his suggestion that Monroe inserted the anti-European colonization clause in his message. To him, therefore, must be given full and unequivocal credit for this proposition, to the support of which he brought great abilities, indomitable courage, and untiring energy. His voluminous diary exhibits the zeal with which he propagated the idea, and his Chief as well as his country were greatly indebted for his splendid service. But Monroe added the broader proposition which virtually made this country in a broader sense the protector of South American independence.

President Adams in 1826 announced to Congress the expediency of accepting an invitation from the Republics of Colombia, Mexico, and Central America to take part in a congress at Panama. Out of this message grew a violent political agitation, and occurring at a time when the slavery question was forming into sharp issues, it has not yet ceased to be the subject of differences and misrepresentation. President Adams nominated as our representatives to the Panama congress Richard C. Anderson, John Sargeant, and W. B. Rochester, and they were confirmed by a decisive majority, but the Democratic party in Congress stoutly opposed the scheme of Mr. Adams, and it has been repeatedly stated that the Southern members joined in this opposition because one of the subjects proposed for consideration by the congress was the concerting of measures having reference to the more effectual abolition of the African slave trade. This is a very narrow and false view of the situation. To assume its correctness is to make a catch phrase of political campaigns a landmark of history. No doubt the question of slavery has often warped the opinions and actions of sections in this country on different questions, as it notably did in turning New England against the Mexican war and in the annexation of Texas, but the opposition to our participation in the Panama congress was based upon principles as old as the Government and as deeply rooted in popular conviction as the Monroe doctrine or any other tradition of our people.

Perusal of Mr. Adams's message shows that it contemplated not only the union of American States for liberal commercial intercourse, the adoption of principles of maritime neutrality, the doctrine that free ships make free goods, the invasion of Cuba and Puerto Rico, the status of Haiti, and lastly, as President Adams said:

The congress of Panama is believed to present a fair occasion for urging upon all the new nations of the south the just and liberal principles of religious liberty.

This was a bombshell. The Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate at that time consisted of Macon of North Carolina, Tazewell of Virginia, Gaillard of South Carolina, Mills of Massachusetts, and White of Tennessee—men of exceptional ability and distinction. The report of that committee, made by Mr. Macon, but drawn by Mr. Tazewell, shows that the opposition to our participation in the congress was rested upon considerations as broad as the limits of our nation, as patriotic as the spirit of independence and liberty, and as conservative and just as was the farewell message of Washington.

The report said:

If there be any subject more sacred and delicate than another as to which the United States ought never to intermeddle, even by obtrusive advice, it is that which concerns religious liberty. The most cruel and devastating wars have been produced by such interference; the blood of man has been poured out in torrents, and from the days of the Crusades to the present hour no benefit has resulted to the human family from discussions carried on by nations upon such subjects.

As to interference with Cuba and Puerto Rico, the report declared that the United States could never regard with indifference their actual condition or future destiny, but deprecated any joint action with the South American republics in relation with them, and it totally discountenanced any joint discussion or action with relation to Haiti.

If—

the United States permit themselves to be associated with these nations in any general congress assembled for the discussion of common plans in any way affecting European interests, they will, by such an act, not only deprive themselves of the ability they now possess to render useful assistance to the other North American States, but also produce other effects prejudicial to their own interest.

In respect to Haiti it set forth the difficulties involved in diplomatic intercourse with her, then recently assuming a position which was the result of a successful negro insurrection, and no doubt this question intermingled its great force with that of other considerations in reaching the conclusion to which the committee came.

At this distance of time it seems to me that the Senate committee acted with wisdom, and in the event this appears to have been demonstrated, for the congress itself proved a fiasco, although the Senate confirmed the ministers appointed by the President and the House voted the necessary appropriation.

After all—

Says Mr. Benton in his Thirty Years' View—

the whole conception of the Panama congress was an abortion. It died out of itself without ever having been once held, not even by the States which had conceived it. It was incongruous and impracticable even to attempt, more apt to engender disputes among themselves and utterly foreign to us, and dangerous to our peace and institutions.

Mr. Adams, in his message to Congress on this subject, impressed the wisdom of the Monroe doctrine, but suggested that if deemed advisable to contract any conventional agreement as a means of resisting interference from abroad with the domestic concerns of the American Governments, our views would extend no further than to a mutual pledge of the parties to the compact to maintain the principle in application to its own territory and to permit no colonial lodgment or establishment of European jurisdiction upon its own soil.

These expressions of Mr. Adams have been by some regarded most mistakenly, most unjustly, as limitations by John Quincy Adams upon the Monroe doctrine, whereas, according to the plain facts, they were extensions. According to the Monroe doctrine, we are unwilling to enter into any alliance with foreign nations for any purpose not in war, but are willing for ourselves to assert the doctrine of non-intervention by any European power. John Quincy Adams, while asserting the Monroe doctrine, was willing to enter into conventional arrangements with other countries for them also to assert it in their proper sphere, and yet Senators upon this floor quote his elongation of the Monroe doctrine as but an abbreviation thereof.

To give the abbreviated and tortured construction would refute the tenor of President Adams's repeated declarations and his entire career. He might well hold back from entering into the stiff and peremptory terms of a treaty with other nations binding us to interfere to protect them, and yet might reserve and insist on the policy of interference by us, our conduct in the premises being regulated solely with regard to our own interest and convenience. We have his own authority for the statement that he approved President Polk's emphatic indorsation of the doctrine, which is entirely inconsistent with the narrow interpretation given to his own language.

Henry Clay was a stanch friend of the South American Republic and availed himself of every opportune occasion to advance the republican spirit and to assert the doctrine of Monroe. His eloquent appeal in the House of Representatives in 1818 for the recognition of the independence of these Republics will never be forgotten, and in January, 1824, while Speaker of the House, he moved a joint resolution that the people of the United States—would not see, without serious inquietude, any forcible intervention by the Allied Powers of Europe in behalf of Spain to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have claimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States.

But he never pressed the resolution, because the question was soon abated. When Secretary of State in the Cabinet of John Quincy Adams, he directed Mr. Poinsett, our minister to Mexico, to urge upon the Government of that country the expediency of asserting the principles laid down in the message of Monroe, and emphatically declared against the establishment of new European colonies upon this continent.

On the 14th of April, 1826, Daniel Webster, then a member of the House of Representatives, addressed that body on the Panama mission and traced the history of the Monroe doctrine.

In answer to the criticism that it was loose and vague, he gave his view that it was—sufficiently studied, considered, weighed, and distinctly and decidedly approved by every one of the President's advisers of the time.

He declared that—

It can not now be taken back, retracted, or annulled without disgrace. It met—with the entire concurrence and the hearty approbation of the country. The tone which it bore found a corresponding response in the breasts of the free people of the United States. The people saw, and were rejoiced to see, that on a fit occasion our weight had been thrown into the right scale, and without departing from our duty we had done something useful and something effectual in the cause of civil liberty. One general glow of exaltation, one universal feeling of the gratified love of country, one conscious and proud conception of the consideration which the country possessed, and of the respect and honor which belonged to it, pervaded all bosoms. I look—on the message of December, 1823, as forming a bright page in our history. I will help neither to erase it nor tear it out, nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government, and I will not diminish that honor. It elevated our hopes and gratified the patriotism of the people over whose hopes I will not bring a mildew, nor will I put that gratified patriotism to shame.

He said—

Tyler's Administration did not have to deal directly with the Monroe doctrine, but the President had occasion to enunciate the principle on which it rests in general terms. Lord Brougham and Lord Aberdeen had animadverted on the proposed annexation of Texas in unfavorable terms; and in his Texas message of June, 1844, he expressed surprise that—a Kingdom which was made what it now is by repeated acts of annexation—beginning with the time of the Heptarchy and concluding with the Kingdoms of Ireland and Scotland—should perceive any principle either novel or injurious in the late proceedings of the American Executive in regard to Texas.

The Government and people of the United States—have never evinced nor do they feel any desire to interfere in public questions not affecting the situation existing between the States of the American Continent. We leave the European powers exclusive control over matters affecting their Continent. The United States claim a similar exemption from any such interference on their part.

He said—

What is this but the doctrines of Washington and Monroe in two instances?

President James K. Polk expressed his cordial concurrence in the wisdom and sound policy of the Monroe doctrine in his message of December 2, 1845, and frequently reiterated it. He declared in that message that it should be distinctly—announced to the world as our settled policy that no future European colony or dominion shall, with our consent, be planted or established on any part of the North American Continent.

The insertion of the word "dominion" does not alter the sense of the broad doctrine of Monroe, but it distinctly expresses the interpretation that President Polk gave to it. This expression was elicited by the differences between the Government of Great Britain and the United States as to the northwestern boundary. On April 29, 1848, he sent a special message to Congress with relation to the Indian insurrection in Yucatan, which Government, through its commissioner, elicited the aid of the United States. For this aid the dominion and sovereignty of the Peninsula was offered to the United States, and similar appeals had been previously made to the Spanish and English Governments. This country was then at war with Mexico, of which country Yucatan was a State. President Polk expressed his willingness to hold military possession of Yucatan and to defend the white inhabitants against incursions of the Indians, and he reaffirmed the doctrine of Monroe, declaring that the reassertion of this principle, especially in reference to North America, is at this day but the promulgation of the policy which no European power should cherish the disposition to resist.

The differences of Yucatan were soon settled by treaty between the whites and Indians, and the affair passed off without further consequence. (See his message, Wharton, volume 1, page 282.)

James Buchanan, who served his country in many high places, as Representative, Senator, Secretary of State, minister to England, and finally as President, was a constant and undeviating upholder of the Monroe doctrine. It is true that he drew the resolution which was adopted by the House of Representatives in 1826 by a vote of 99 to 95, in which that body expressed its opinion that the United States ought not to be represented at the congress of Panama in a diplomatic character, and they ought not to form any alliance, offensive or defensive, or negotiate respecting such alliance, with all or any of the South American republics; nor ought they to be comparted with them, or either of them, in any joint declaration for the purpose of preventing interference of any of the European powers with their independence or form of government, or any compact for the purpose of preventing any colonization to the colonies of America, but that the people of the United States should be left free to act in any crisis in such manner as their feelings of friendship toward these republics and as their own honor and policy may at the time dictate.

That resolution for lack, I fancy, of better material, has been proffered here as an indication that Congress, when adopting it, refused to adopt the Monroe doctrine. But we have from the lips of its author that he was careful to say not a word that trenched against the Monroe doctrine, and an inspection of its face is sufficient to show that he was so successful that there is not an intimation in that resolution against it.

In his resolution it will be seen that he happily combined the doctrine of Washington with that of Monroe. He entered into no entangling alliance with foreign nations, but preserved his own country in that independence of relation which it so long and proudly occupied and still occupies.

As Secretary of State of President Polk, he was his adviser when his messages relating to the doctrine were delivered, and he well declared in his letter to Mr. Hise of June 3, 1848, that the independence as well as the interests of the nations on this continent required that they should maintain an American system of policy entirely distinct from that which prevailed in Europe. To suffer any interference on the part of European governments with the domestic concerns of the American Republics and to permit them to establish new colonies upon this continent would be to jeopard their independence and ruin their interests. In his very last annual message to Congress, in 1860, at the time when the awful shadow of civil war stretched over us, he did not fail to consider the situation of Mexico and to express his hope for such a condition as would deprive European governments of all pretext to interfere in the territorial and domestic concerns of that country, then itself torn with revolution which afterwards resulted in the triumph of Juarez. We should thus, he said, have been relieved from the obligation of resisting, even by force, should this become necessary, any attempt of these governments to deprive our neighboring Republic of any portions of her territory, a duty from which we could not shrink without abandoning the traditions and established policy of the American people.

Mr. Cass, Secretary of State, declared in 1858 the United States will not consent to the subjugation of any of the independent States of this continent to European powers, nor to the exercise of a protectorate over them, nor to any other direct political influence to control their policy or institutions.

The civil war, vast and engrossing as it was, caused no interruption in the assertion of the Monroe doctrine by this nation. Under most difficult and trying circumstances it still held aloft that oriflamme.

Mr. Seward, as Secretary of State, went to the verge of war with France in his correspondence upon the subject with reference to the French occupation of Mexico. The United States refused to take part in the movement of France, Spain, and Great Britain to compel Mexico to the payment of her debts to other nations; and from 1861 to the fall of Maximilian and the reembarkment of the French army to France our diplomatic history is filled with his letters and dispatches containing intimations and declarations that this time-honored doctrine would be enforced.

Even while the civil war was flagrant and the final year-long battle between Grant and Lee was imminent, the House of Representatives of the United States by unanimous voice declared on April 4, 1864:

That the Congress of the United States are unwilling by silence to leave the nations of the world under the impression that they are indifferent spectators of the deplorable events now transpiring in Mexico, and that they think fit to declare that it does not accord with the policy of the United States to acknowledge any monarchical government erected on the ruins of any republican government in America under the auspices of any European power.

With General Grant facts spake. The appearance of an American Army on the Rio Grande under Sheridan was his way of giving notices to quit to those who would seat the monarchies of Europe on American soil.

The Hon. Thomas F. Bayard is known to be a great admirer of the English people and on the most friendly terms with them, but, however much he may honor and respect them, as to this doctrine of Monroe he is just as flat-footed and goes just as far as any American goes. In 1887, as Secretary of State, he communicated to President Cleveland a full history of the case of Pelletier, who many years before had been arrested in Haiti on the charge of attempted enslavement of Haitian citizens.

It would not be worth while to go into the details of that question further than to say that Pelletier's conduct was deemed reprehensible, and that the Cleveland Administration refused to press the claim against Haiti, and Mr. Bayard, stating the consideration which actuated our Government, said:

The United States has proclaimed herself the protector of this western world, in which she is by far the stronger power, from the intrusion of European sovereignties. She can point with proud satisfaction to the fact that over and over again has she declared effectively that serious indeed would be the consequences if European hostile foot should, without just cause, tread those States in the New World which have emancipated themselves from European control. She has announced that she would cherish as it becomes her the territorial rights of the feeblest of those States, regarding them not merely as in the eye of the law equal to even the greatest of nationalities, but, in view of her distinctive policy, as entitled to be regarded by her as the objects of a peculiarly gracious care. I feel bound to say that if we should sanction by reprisals in Haiti the ruthless invasion of her territory and insult to her sovereignty which the facts now before us disclose, if we approve by solemn Executive action and Congressional assent that invasion, it will be difficult for us hereafter to assert that in the New World, of whose rights we are the peculiar guardians, these rights have never been invaded by ourselves.

We are told, Mr. President, that the time is past for the preaching of the Monroe doctrine, and that in the present condition of things it is inapplicable. The United States are no longer some sweet Arcadia, dreaming the happy hours away in the solitudes of pastoral life, and, in my humble judgment, every revolving sun since 1823 has strengthened the necessity for the application of this doctrine and for its firm, outspoken, bold, and intrepid maintenance by the American people, for we are not ready to be circumvented and bottled up by British empires all around us, on land and by sea, and cut off from free and unmenaced access to the highways of the world's commerce.

The colonial empire of Great Britain comprises forty-two distinct and independent governments, with many scattered dependencies and protectorates under the Queen which have no regularly formed administrations. It embraces also large territories controlled by the British North Borneo Company, the Imperial British East Africa Company, and the Royal Niger Company.

The first reaching out for colonial settlements by Great Britain dates as far back as 1583, but beyond the American continents, which finally developed into the United States, the close of the seventeenth century found Great Britain with no great acquisitions to her colonial possessions. She had at that time St. Helena, two slave-trading stations in Africa, the Bermudas, Jamaica, Barbados, and several minor West Indian islands, and New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, north of us.

As we learn from the British colonial office list, the peace of 1815, secured by the downfall of Napoleon, left Great Britain—with most of the West Indies, South Africa, and a free hand in India, North America, and the Pacific.

The reign of Queen Victoria has been the period marked by the aggressive colonial policy of Great Britain all over the world. During that time she has occupied Natal, British Bechuanaland, Basutoland, and the Transkei, Zululand, British Columbia, the northwestern territories of the Canadian Dominion, Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, New Guinea, and North Borneo, and she has acquired by cession Labuan, Lagos, the greater portion of the Gold Coast, Fiji, the Island of Cyprus, and the basin of the Niger, besides countless small possessions and nearly all the isolated rocks and islands of the ocean.

In 1890 numerous additions were made to the Empire in Africa by arrangements with Germany, France, and Portugal for the delimitation of their respective possessions and spheres of influence in that continent; and Great Britain claims now the indisputable right to acquire nearly 2,500,000 square miles of a total of 11,700,000 square miles included in that continent. Including India, the Empire now extends over eleven millions of square miles, or ninety-one times the area of the mother country. The area of the colonial empire alone is seventy-seven times that of the United Kingdom.

The British Empire has great power in both hemispheres and in all the continents of the earth, and in America it embraces the Bermudas, the Dominion of Canada, British Guiana, British Honduras, Newfoundland, and Labrador, and in the West Indies the Bahamas, Barbados, Jamaica, the Leeward Islands, Trinidad, which is immediately north of the mouth of the Orinoco River, and the Windward Islands, which are between Martinique and Trinidad.

In Australasia and Oceanica the Empire embraces Fiji, or the Fiji Islands, New Guinea, New South Wales, New Zealand, Queensland, South Australia, Tasmania, Victoria, Western Australia, and many small islands, groups, islets, and reefs lying along Australia and New Zealand and which may be regarded as parts of those colonies.

In Asia it holds the volcanic peninsula of Aden, on the Arabian coast, and the Island of Perim, at the entrance to the Red Sea; the Somali coast, which is a British protectorate of an area of 75,000 square miles. The islands of Socotra, off the coast of Africa, and Kuria Muria, off the coast of Arabia, are attached to Aden, which is a coaling station.

The Bahrein Islands, in the Persian Gulf; North Borneo, which is part of the Island of Borneo, midway between Hongkong and Port Darwin, in Australia; Brunei and Sarawak, on the northwest coast of Borneo; the Island of Ceylon, Cyprus, Hongkong, and the great dependency of British India, where about a million square miles of territory and 221,000,000 of people are under British control. Less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the present population is of the Aryo-European stock, the British born amounting to about 100,000.

Feudatory to India are Baluchistan and Sikkim, Andaman and Nicobar, and Laccadive Islands.

In Africa, Basutoland, Bechuanaland, and the Cape of Good Hope, British Central Africa, East Africa, the Western African colonies of Gambia, the Gold Coast, and Lagos, Matabeleland and Mauritius, Natal, the Niger coast, and the Niger territories, British South Africa, or British Zambezia, Zanzibar, and Zululand.

At Gibraltar Great Britain guards the entrance into the Mediterranean with about 4,000 soldiers. At Malta, some 58 miles from Sicily, she holds the Mediterranean with about 10,000 troops. She controls the Suez Canal, which is about 87 miles long and which connects the Mediterranean with the Red Sea. Through that canal in 1893 nearly 8,000,000 of gross tonnage passed under the British flag, while not a million passed under the flag of any other nation, and only 6,528 under the flag of the United States.

With the immense navies upon the sea, which intercommunicate between those widespread possessions all over the earth, Great Britain is evidently a power not to be despised by any nation; but it is not for us to sit idle and see her surround us on this continent with new settlements and extensions, and enmesh us with her fortifications on land and on the islands of the sea.

I am indebted, Mr. President, and the country is indebted, to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who pointed out in an address which he made in this body a year ago how Great Britain has belted the globe with her fortifications, with her coaling stations, and with her great guns, and his able contributions to the learning and literature of this subject have done no little to enlighten public sentiment and show the necessity of a firm and alert American policy on the subject. I will detract nothing from what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] said so eloquently yesterday of the British people. While I may concur with him as to the greatness and glory of the land of which our country is a scion, and come from a State whose people are one of the purest, if not the purest, strain of the Anglo-Saxon blood in the New World, I make bold to say that we, too, have "names to conjure with" that are just as bright and just as full of patriotic inspiration as any that British history discloses.

If Great Britain has had her Burke and her Chatham, we have had our Otis and Henry, our Webster and Clay. If she has had her Drake, Hawkins, and Nelson, have we not had our John Paul Jones, our Bainbridge, Decatur, Hull, Perry, Reed, Barron, Farragut, and Semmes? If she has had her Wellington, Havelock, and Wolseley, have we not had our Washington, Warren, Starke, Putnam, and Greene, our Morgan, Clark, and Campbell, and Light-Horse

Harry, our Old Hickory Jackson, our Grant, our Lee, and Stonewall Jackson? We admire and honor the great heroic figures of Old England; but our home heroes are those from whom we should catch the flame of American patriotism, policy, and duty. As to fighting qualities, let it be remembered that more men have fallen in the one county of Spottsylvania, in Virginia, than have fallen in the British army in a hundred years.

This pending question is inherited from the American Revolution of 1776, and is but the sequence of history which has flowed in a continuous and connected stream from its source; it is the aftermath of 1776 and 1812. From our Revolution France caught her inspiration and rose up against the accumulated burdens of centuries. Napoleon, the imperial democrat of Europe, was the child of that revolution, and the free movements that stirred the Continent before and after his fall led to the conspiracy of despots, to which our Monroe doctrine was as necessary a response as the declaration of 1776 was to the British statutes and to the obduracy of George III.

The instinct which led Great Britain to hold aloof from the machinations of the alliance was the conjoint product of her commercial sagacity, her independent spirit, and her inborn love for personal freedom. Deep answered unto deep when she called to America for cooperation and when America so promptly responded. The strain now placed upon the relations of the two countries, brought about by the present collision between her colonial policy and our natural primacy in the Western world, is but momentary and must be relieved by common sense; yea, by that saving common sense which is the true solvent of difficulty and is as salt to the sea, which preserves its freshness.

The Englishman has that fine quality which Emerson describes as "animated moderation." He will not tear a passion to tatters for an empty notion. He will check up before he jumps over a precipice. Let him display that wisdom now. He has "a free hand" on all the oceans. He preserves the balance of power in Europe. He has in Asia, Africa, and Oceanica a full and fertile field for all his jingo propensities. He has already vast possessions on this continent and strongholds in the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Caribbean Sea. Let him leave alone the ewe lambs of the great Western Republic, which knows its own sphere of influence and will brook no intrusion thereupon.

The sweet singer whose voice, alas, is now silent, said of Queen Victoria, his august sovereign, whose laureate he was:

> Statesmen at her counsel sate
> Who knew the seasons when to take > Occasion by the hand and make
> The bounds of freedom wider yet.

The season for such statesmen is now full and shines in the light of the harvest moon.

The Administration and those who believe its course has been wise and just are fully aware of the heavy responsibility assumed, but are not to be deterred from pursuing a policy impressed upon our history by the pens of sages, and now more necessary than ever to our tranquillity by gusts of criticism or crimination from within or from without.

With us are the law and the prophets, and behind us are the intelligent, patient, and patriotic masses of a great people, whose instincts have guided them to appreciate the situation and whose approval of the American principles that have been uttered is unmistakable. I fully agree with those who caution us against inflammatory and irritating speeches.

If speeches had not been made against the position which our country has already taken by the action of its Chief Magistrate, speeches which can only tend to divide counsels which should be united and stimulate expectations abroad which would be doomed to disappointment, for my part, I would have awaited the event of negotiations without a word. I still agree that all aggravating utterances on both sides are out of place and that the public and the vehicles of public opinion should alike await developments in confidence that justice has a power of its own that will attract men to its standard, and in the further confidence that whoever may represent the honor and interests of the American people will not allow them to suffer.

While the sharp joinder of issue in verbal colloquy has excited apprehensions of war and the war spirit has been stirred in some breasts, neither Great Britain nor the United States has any desire to fight the other. They hearken to the great poet's saying:

> War's a game which were their subjects wise
> Kings would not play at.

As said by John Randolph of Roanoke, one of my distinguished predecessors in this Chamber, these two great nations can do each other more harm and more good than any other two nations of the earth. They mutually recognize that fact, and the atmospheric pressure of public opinion is for peace in both nations; the clergy, the metropolitan press, the boards of commerce, and thoughtful men of all classes—all declaring against the folly and the crime of war.

It can not be doubted under such circumstances that the way can and will be made clear for peace with honor to all concerned.

But common sense looks at facts as they are, and it is a fact so plain that he who runs may read that this nation will not recede from the Monroe doctrine, or from the position taken by the President, that it applies to this controversy. All critics, all dissenters, all friends of peace should recognize this fact and govern themselves accordingly. And it is not to be expected of us who have time-honored principles to vindicate, an obvious and wise policy to subserve, and a noble, aspiring nation to uphold in its dignity as the great and paramount power of the Western Hemisphere, to speak in whispers, to startle at shadows, or to mope in pusillanimous silence when the corridors of the Capitol are ringing with denunciations of our course and with ill-conceived belittlements of our fixed faith.

I am one of those who regard the doctrine we avouch as the subjects of the great White Czar regard the legendary will of Peter the Great, and as the Germans regard the Watch Upon the Rhine. And the time has passed—it has long been overpast—when the foot of foreign intrusion could be set upon American soil either to assail us in our homes or to seize and appropriate the territory of our neighbors to their uses under any kind of pretext, or to envelop us with armaments of war without arousing the universal resentment and resistance on the part of our people. This our traditional creed rests in the very nature of things which Canning discerned when he asked Minister Rush that memorable leading question:

> Are the great political and commercial interests of the New World to be canvassed and adjusted in Europe without the cooperation or even the knowledge of the United States?

Since that question was asked in 1823 to 1896—during a period of over three-score years and ten—the United States have had but one answer.

That answer it made then, and if those who advise or sympathize with Great Britain in this generation have the discernment and prescience of that British minister, George Canning, who boasted as to South America that he had "called the New World into existence to redress the balance of the Old," they must know that this Republic will not permit those balances to be disturbed by the weight of an iron hand, nor that New World to be made the prey of European adventurers; they must know that that answer was final and forever; they must know that were all Europe to form itself again into a new conspiracy of kings to make spoil of any portion of the American Continents, under any kind of cloak or pretext, and were to lay hands of violence for that purpose upon any, even the weakest, of our neighbors, the United States would rise and face embattled Europe as one man—American sailors would scourge the seas from pole to pole, and six millions of American soldiers would spring to their guns.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire a brief executive session.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask unanimous consent before the Senator makes that motion.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that there may be a vote had on the regular order, the pending bill, with all amendments, on Thursday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. What is the precise proposition?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas will state the proposition.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote may be had on the regular order, the pending bill, together with all amendments, on Thursday of next week.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator had better ask unanimous consent to-morrow morning when the Senate is full.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twelve minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 24, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 23, 1896.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 23, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before that question is submitted I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the Friday night session provided by the rule. I understood that the chairman on Invalid Pensions desired that we should have a Friday night session this week.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was told that there was no objection to the adjournment over until Monday; but, of course, if they desire to have a Friday night session, I withhold the motion.

Mr. PICKLER. If the adjournment is had on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, can not it be so arranged as not to interfere with the Friday night session?

Mr. HENDERSON. If the adjournment is had on the motion, that will be the result.

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent to hold the session on Friday night in the event that the House should agree to the motion to adjourn over.

Mr. PICKLER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Friday night session may be had, notwithstanding the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Chair will submit a request for unanimous consent, I will withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask unanimous consent, then, that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, with the understanding that the Friday night session will be had under the rule; that is to say, that the House will meet at 8 o'clock on Friday night and adjourn, in pursuance of the rule, thereafter until Monday. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

THE RULES.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, when we had the subject of the rules up for consideration at an earlier date in the session Rule XV was temporarily laid aside.

There seems to be some confusion or misapprehension in the minds of members as to the status of the rules. It will be remembered that we adopted the rules of the Fifty-first Congress early in the session, and the report that the Committee on Rules made was simply a report as to certain amendments to these rules previously adopted at the beginning of the session. The Committee on Rules have had a session and have taken up Rule XV, which was laid aside, and recommend a substitute for it, and also two other verbal corrections which are embraced in the report which I send to the desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following amendments to the rules:

In section 1 of Rule X amend paragraph 8 by inserting after the word "on" the words "Interstate and Foreign"; so that the paragraph as amended will read, "on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—to consist of thirteen members."

In section 2, Rule XIII, strike out the words "clause 51 of Rule XI," and insert "clause 57 of Rule XI."

Amend Rule XV, paragraph 4, as follows:

"4. Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the House shall adjourn, there shall be a call of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent members, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be considered as ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name may vote on the pending question, and, after the roll call is completed, each member arrested shall be brought by the Sergeant-at-Arms before the House, whereupon he shall be noted as present, discharged from arrest, and given an opportunity to vote and his vote shall be recorded. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted, and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear. And thereupon further proceedings under the call shall be considered as dispensed with.

"At any time after the roll call has been completed, the Speaker may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Speaker; and if the House adjourns, all proceedings under this section shall be vacated. But this section of the rule shall not apply to the sessions of Friday night, until further order of the House."

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment is the amendment to Rule X, and I will state to the House the effect of it. In the Fifty-first Congress this committee referred to therein was known as the Committee on Commerce, but in the Fifty-second Congress it was known as the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. This is to adopt the name "Interstate and Foreign Commerce," and I assume that there will be no objection to the change. I ask a vote upon it.

The question being taken on the first amendment submitted by the Committee on Rules, it was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON. The next amendment grows out of the fact that in Rule XI we increased the number of committees, and this amendment simply changes the figures so as to refer to clause 57 instead of to clause 51 of Rule XI. It in no way changes the rule.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In section 2 of Rule XIII, strike out the words "clause 51 of Rule XI" and insert "clause 57 of Rule XI."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, that brings us to the substitute for Rule XV.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment as it will stand if adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before it is read I will simply state that this is a substitute for amendment 4 contained in the report of the committee, the one that was laid aside for the time being.

The Clerk again read the amendment as above.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this substitute differs in only three particulars from the amendment which was formerly reported by the committee. First, it exempts Friday night sessions from the operation of this clause. Second, it provides for an adjournment. One motion to adjourn may be entertained, so that if a majority desire to adjourn they will have the power to do so. Third, inasmuch as there might be doubts as to what the effect of such an adjournment would be, it is expressly provided in the substitute here presented that the effect of an adjournment will be to dispense with all proceedings then pending, including an order for the yeas and nays. This brings us to the only question which seems to have troubled some members of the House, the question whether a majority of those voting, a constitutional quorum being present, can transact business. I would remind the House that the Constitution of the United States puts no restriction upon us in this particular. It treats of the subject, and, so far as restricting the House in this particular is concerned, it is silent. The provision of the Constitution is:

A majority shall constitute a quorum to do business.

This rule provides for securing a quorum—a majority of the House. It establishes a by-law providing how that business shall be transacted, and there is nothing in the Constitution which clashes with the provision contained in this rule.

To-day, with the present total membership of the House, 179 members are required to make a constitutional quorum. We will suppose that when the 179 are present, 100 members vote on a proposition and the remainder of the quorum remain silent. Those not voting are present. The Journal will show their presence. A lawful constitutional quorum is in the House. The contention in favor of the rule is that 100 members having voted for the proposition, if no more than that number vote against it the business will be transacted.

This rule has another great purpose which must not be lost sight of. In times of great excitement and of partisan conflicts, the minority, in order to prevent legislation, will often leave the Chamber, so that they can not be counted, leaving the House without a quorum to do business. This rule lays down a well-defined method by which a lawful constitutional quorum can be brought into this House and held here until the business before the House is disposed of.

A lengthy argument was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin] against the Sergeant-at-Arms going forth and laying hands upon members without a special order of this body. He seemed to think that that would be a hardship to the members. Mr. Speaker, can it be less severe on the members of this House to have a special order made on a special occasion to bring them into the House than to have a general law laid down by the vote of the majority of this House apprising each and every member thereof that he must be here to transact business, and that if his action prevents the presence of a quorum, so that business can not be done, the officer of this House shall go forth and bring him into this body? I see no hardship to any member in this proposed rule. If this amendment is adopted it will be a standing rule of this House, warning each member that he must be here to help make a lawful quorum for the transaction of business.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I have heretofore made some observations on the merits of this subject, I intend to reserve the remainder of my time until I hear from those who contend for the opposing doctrine that only a majority of those voting can transact the business of this House; reminding them, however, that this proposition first came from the distinguished John Randolph Tucker, at one time chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this House, and recognized by all who know him as an able lawyer. In the Forty-sixth Congress he first brought this proposed rule forward. In the Fifty-second Congress, Mr. Reed, then a member of the House, again brought it forward. He had been a member of the Judiciary Committee; and has been, I believe, recognized generally as a high authority in parliamentary law.

With these suggestions, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time until I hear from those who are opposed to this rule.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand, there is no provision whatever made in this rule for securing the attendance of a quorum at Friday evening sessions?

Mr. HENDERSON. No; the rule does not apply to Friday evening sessions.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, under this rule, if 180 members are present and if two members should vote for a proposition and one against it, the proposition will be considered as carried.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is exactly the operation of the proposed rule.

Mr. De Armond addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson] yield the floor?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, sir; I reserve the residue of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Crisp], a member of the Committee on Rules, if he desires to occupy any time.

Mr. CRISP. Let the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. De Armond] go on.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, there is one feature of the pending proposition to which I desire to address myself. It is one which was discussed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Henderson] this morning and discussed some days ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bailey] and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Catchings]. It is the question of the constitutional power of this House, by a rule such as that suggested, to provide that, a quorum being present, a number less than a majority of that quorum or of a quorum voting in the affirmative, and being a majority of those voting, shall be sufficient to carry a proposition. The contention of the gentleman from Texas, who is an exceedingly good lawyer and who presented his view in a most clear and able manner, is that a quorum being present, it is necessary in order to carry a proposition that a majority of that quorum, whatever its size, shall vote in the affirmative. The gentleman from Mississippi, equally clear and happy in the statement of his position, took the ground that a quorum being present, without reference to the size of that quorum—whether the exact constitutional quorum or a number in excess of the smallest number that can constitute a quorum—there must be at least a majority of the constitutional quorum voting for a proposition in order to carry it.

Now, then, the question presented by these conflicting and varying views, as well as the question raised by the amendment to the rules now pending before the House, is, first, as to whether anything less than a majority of a constitutional quorum, voting in favor of a proposition, can under the Constitution be sufficient to carry that proposition; next, whether—a quorum being present—anything less than a majority of that quorum voting for the proposition will suffice to carry it; and third, whether—a quorum being present—a majority of those voting shall be sufficient to carry the proposition.

For a long time, as we all know, it was accepted as parliamentary law that when a yea-and-nay vote was taken in either House of Congress the presence of a quorum was to be ascertained solely and exclusively by the responses of the members when thus called. Afterwards, by a rule of this House, sustained by the Supreme Court, it was determined that the presence of a quorum could be ascertained and established by means other than or additional to the responses of the several members to their names as called upon a yea-and-nay vote. The question, I think, remains open yet as a constitutional question whether—the presence of a quorum being authoritatively ascertained by whatever method may be adopted for that purpose and sanctioned by the Constitution—a majority of those voting may or may not suffice to pass a bill or other measure.

Now, it has been the general doctrine, I think, of the law in some jurisdictions that the majority of a quorum must vote for a proposition, no matter how many are present constituting the quorum—whether more than a sufficient number or not; and in other jurisdictions it has been held that a majority of those constituting that particular quorum, if in excess of the smallest number that will make a quorum, must vote for a proposition in order to carry it.

If we proceed now upon the theory that the only way of ascertaining the presence of a quorum is by the responses of the members upon a yea-and-nay vote, I believe it would follow logically that a proposition could not be carried except by a majority of those thus responding, and of course that would be the majority of that particular quorum as well as a majority of the absolute constitutional quorum.

But it having been clearly established, and I think rightfully, too, that the presence of a quorum may be ascertained in some other way, in part, than by exclusive dependence upon the simple responses of the members upon a yea-and-nay vote, may not those voting, the quorum of course being present, decide the question voted upon? In this House of 357 members, where the smallest constitutional quorum is 179, must at least 90 members, a majority of such quorum, vote for a bill in order to pass it? Or, if the actual quorum present when the vote is taken exceeds in numbers the constitutional quorum, must a majority of the quorum present vote for a measure in order to carry it?

Now, Mr. Speaker, this, it seems to me, is a nice question for gentlemen who have given any consideration to the question involved or to the current of discussion as to the methods of ascertaining the presence of a quorum. I can easily see how gentlemen maintain the position taken by the gentleman from Mississippi—and no one in this House is better able to sustain his position than that gentleman, who is exceedingly clear and felicitous always in the expression of his ideas as well as clear in those ideas—I can see how he can well sustain that position by authorities, for decisions do sustain it. I see, too, how the very able gentleman from Texas, who is also always strikingly clear in thought and in the presentation of his views, can maintain himself in his position by respectable authority. The question, however, recurs, notwithstanding all that, whether it be not true, in view of the fact established by the decision of the Supreme Court that the presence of a quorum may be ascertained otherwise than by the exclusive method of determining it by the responses of members upon a yea-and-nay vote—whether or not, that being true, it is not also within the constitutional power of the House to provide by rule that a majority of those voting, a quorum being present, shall determine the result upon the pending proposition.

Without very much examination into the question so far as authorities go, but conceding that there are authorities sustaining the position of the gentleman from Mississippi and the position of the gentleman from Texas, I am yet inclined to the belief (and the more I reflect upon it the more that belief becomes strengthened) that it is within the constitutional power of the House to provide by rule that, the presence of a quorum having been ascertained, a majority of those voting shall decide the matter submitted to vote.

It seems to me, as between the other two positions, if choice were to be taken between them, that the better reasoning is to be found upon principle in favor of the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bailey]. First, there must be a quorum, or no business can be done. Waiving the question of how its presence shall be ascertained, there must be a quorum. The decision, however you ascertain it, or whatever may be competent or constitutional in that way, must be a decision of that particular quorum, not a decision of 179 members of this House, if upon the particular question there be, say, 200 present, but a decision of that quorum, consisting then of 200. According to the contention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] 101 affirmative votes would be required.

According to the other contention, it would be sufficient for 90 men to vote aye if less than that number vote nay. If this view be correct, 200 members might be present, their presence ascertained, and the 200 listed and computed in making up the quorum; 90 voting for a measure, 89 voting against it, and 21 not voting at all, and yet the measure would be carried. Now, how could that be, as a matter of correct reasoning? Let me say that instead of 89, 88 or 87 or 85 vote nay, and 90 vote yea, less than a quorum voting. Now, according to the contention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], as I understand it, in that case, a quorum not having voted, there must be a placing in some way—in order to have a quorum to transact business—of a portion of those present constituting the quorum, but not expressing by direct vote their judgment upon the pending proposition. Why a portion and not all of the quorum actually present and shown to be present?

One of the two distinguished gentlemen to whom I have alluded would say, "You must take the entire quorum present into account; you must have a majority of all of those present and constituting that quorum, noted and counted in constituting it, voting aye in order to pass anything." The other would say, "Having a quorum present, having taken cognizance of the presence of a certain definite number, say 200, if you have the votes of 90 of those in favor of the proposition and a lesser number than 90 against it, it is only necessary at that particular moment, when ascertaining the result upon that particular proposition, to include with those voting enough to make up the necessary 179, being utterly indifferent as to the other members present and constituting a part of the actual quorum present." Now, there must be some sort of presumption, it seems to me, indulged in as to how those gentlemen who did not vote shall be counted or rated. It will not do to say that a man not voting is present merely for use in determining whether you have a quorum; he is here because without him you would not have a quorum, but that which he thinks, where he stands, is a matter of absolute and utter indifference.

If members are present, authoritatively, constitutionally, ascertained to be present and to constitute part of the then present quorum, it will not do, it seems to me, so long as you are determining the very matter that that quorum is constituted to determine, to ignore any member included in that quorum. Since you can not at one and the same moment count or estimate and ignore a member or any number of members included in the quorum and not voting, where shall they be placed? Where are they? Are they with the majority or are they with the minority?

I believe, Mr. Speaker, it would be entirely competent by a rule, in so many words, to say that those present, not disqualified or excused from voting, constituting a part of the quorum, taken into account in the make-up of the quorum, who, if they have not answered, are listed and present and constituting a part of the quorum, shall be counted as voting with the prevailing side. I do not see why that would not be constitutional and within the power of this House, Of course I understand how there may be present in the House, we will say, 250 members. One hundred and seventy-nine only are needed to make a quorum. I can see how, upon a vote, less than 179 respond to their names, and how, in order to constitute a quorum, to declare definitely and authoritatively upon the Journal that a quorum is present, and to say what individuals compose it, you might not list and make mention of the entire 250; but say the presence of 200 several individuals of them would be shown by the Journal, but as to the other 50 actually present there would be no record and no showing.

As to that particular fifty, those not making manifest their own presence by responding to a call of their names, not noted as present in any authoritative way, practically and actually, as to that journal, they would be treated as not present; they would not be taken into account; they simply would be left out. I can see that those silent, unnoted fifty should not be considered in determining the result of a yea-and-nay vote. But if you have counted, listed them, and ascertained by an existing and authorized rule, in an authoritative way, that there are 200 present, and show by the journal who the 200 are, then it seems to me logical that one of two conclusions must follow. Either that a majority of the 200 shall be necessary to carry a proposition, or that those of the 200 not voting shall be taken as concurring in the decision of the majority of those voting. If not in effect joining the majority, they could and would readily express their dissent and reverse the decision.

Is not this view clearly in harmony with the course of legislation of this House and in this Congress and in legislative bodies all over the country this year and in all the years since the formation of our Government?

Mr. MILES. I want to ask you if it is not the rule of nearly every legislative body in nearly all the States of this country that there shall be a majority of a quorum in order to pass a bill?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think so, but by their respective constitutions; and a very good rule, I think, too. There is such a constitutional provision in my own State, and a good one. There, and in many other States, it is provided in the constitution that no bill can pass without receiving the votes of a majority of all the members in each house, taken by yeas and nays. But I am talking about the Federal Constitution, which contains no such provision. I am talking about whether or not it is within the constitutional power of this House to provide that, a quorum being present, a majority of those voting may determine the fate of that upon which they vote. I am addressing myself to that constitutional question. I believe it would be well, well indeed, if the Federal Constitution contained such a provision as is to be found in many of the State constitutions requiring in all cases a yea-and-nay vote and a majority of each house voting for a bill in order to pass it. But we must take the Constitution as we find it.

What would the result be if a bill were on its passage in this House and the Speaker, having said, "The ayes appear to have it," some gentleman in the House should demand a division? The House divides, the Speaker counting the ayes and noes. He announces the result of the count, "The ayes are 40, the noes are 30 (let us suppose); the ayes have it; the bill is passed." There are 70 members voting, yet it is presumed that this occurs in a constitutional House. Everyone familiar with legislative bodies knows this has been the procedure here and in all legislative bodies except where, in the constitution, there is such a provision as that referred to by the gentleman from Maryland, requiring a majority of all elected to the body to vote in favor of a bill in order to pass it.

Now, then, unless it will be presumed, unless it must be presumed, that in the case I have supposed—and a most familiar one it is—those not voting in fact do vote in effect with the majority of those formally voting, not only would that bill, with 40 votes for it and 50 against it, fail to pass, but three-fourths, four-fifths, and nine-tenths of the bills passed in Congress or in the State legislatures (except where the constitutional provisions require a definite number of votes) would be absolutely destroyed. But a small fraction of what people and courts regard as law would have the least particle of law in it. Is it, then, within the power of the House to provide by rule for the occurrence of precisely that which does occur almost daily, often many times a day? If this power is lacking, then for years and years, more than a hundred years, in both branches of Congress, in State legistures, nine-tenths of all the legislation of all those bodies is and has been all along absolutely void if called in question; is and has been law only on account of the forbearance of those who do not question it.

Mr. HALL. I wish to ask my colleague if he has examined the question as to whether or not the courts, the Supreme Court and the courts of all the States, have not decided in express terms that whenever a bill is signed by the Speaker, by the presiding officer of the Senate, and by the President or the governor, as the case may be, and filed with the Secretary of State, that the question of the method of passing that law can not be inquired into; and I would ask him if that is not conclusive of the whole matter?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Why, I think not. I am not aware of such a line of decisions at all.

I take it that the presumption lies in favor of that which is offered as a law, with these evidences of its authentication and of its being a law. Does the gentleman contend that it would not be competent to show by the very Journal itself, by the RECORD, which contains in detail the proceedings had in all the stages of the enactment of the so-called law, that there was no quorum present to pass it, and that no quorum did pass it? If, to suppose an impossible case, the Speaker of this House were to affix his name to something which never had been acted upon by this House as to a law duly passed, and if the presiding officer at the other end of the Capitol were to affix his name to it as to a bill passed by the other branch of Congress, though not passed by it, if the President of the United States were to sign it, and if then this extraordinary and utterly void measure. this thing purporting to be a law and having all the marks of a law upon it, were lodged with the Secretary of State, would it be pretended that the presiding officers of the two Houses of Congress and the President had actually made a law, and that you could not get rid of that which had been, in the way I have suggested, foisted into the archives of this Government as a law?

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will say I think that the court has decided that question, and has declared that the very presumption which the gentleman from Missouri uses by way of illustration can not be indulged. But he will permit me to say, further, that the court has never decided, and, I apprehend, will never decide, that it can not examine the Journals of the House which the Constitution requires to be kept to ascertain whether a majority voted for or against a measure.

Mr. DE ARMOND. I think that is correct. The Journals, I think, are always open to be resorted to, not merely for the naked purpose of determining whether a majority voted for or against a measure, but also for the purpose of examining all the other recitals of the Journals, kept in the ordinary course and within the constitutional provision, to ascertain who was present and whether there was actually a House present at all, as well as other facts rightfully recorded there. The Journal can properly be resorted to for authentic information on all the points upon which it does speak and ought to speak.

But, Mr. Speaker, recurring to what I suggested a moment ago, if upon a division being taken in this House it is shown that 40 members vote for a bill and 30 against it, and that bill passes the other branch of Congress by, say, 20 votes for it and 15 against it, less than a quorum voting for it, and it is signed by the President, then if you can not absolutely overthrow that measure which purports to be a law, it must be only because it is conclusively presumed or satisfactorily shown that a quorum was present in each body when the vote was taken, and, further, because the presumption natural among reasonable men must be indulged and is indulged that those who were present and did not individually say "aye" or "no" agreed with the prevailing side and ratified in a less formal manner, but so as to actually do what they did who said "aye" when called upon to vote or when rising from their seats they were counted in favor of the bill.

If that be true, and I believe it is incontestable, the only question that would seem to remain on this point is as to the policy—whether it would be better to require by our rules that a majority of a quorum or a majority of the quorum present should vote for a proposition in order to pass it, or that the method should be adopted which is provided for in this rule. That is a question of judgment, of expediency, not a question of constitutionality. I believe that cases might arise when it would be better to have a rule requiring the votes of a majority of the quorum present to pass a measure. I believe such a rule would be safer and better than that proposed; but, as I have already said, it is purely a question of method, of expediency, and not at all a question of power. There certainly is no occasion in the present House to adopt this rule, and the gentlemen on the other side are hardly tempted by any consideration of the relative strength of parties here to make the rule as they propose to make it upon this point.

The question whether less than a majority of a quorum voting for a bill can pass it could not arise under the yea-and-nay method of ascertaining the presence of a quorum. In such case it is absolutely ascertained that a quorum has voted; and, of course, nobody ever contends that any proposition is carried except by a majority of those who do vote.

There is now presented, it seems to me, a new question of parliamentary law, and the authorities cited by gentlemen have reference to another condition of things. The authorities relied upon to sustain the contention that it is only constitutional upon a yea-and-nay vote to declare a measure carried when a majority of a quorum has voted for it, or the other contention that a measure is only constitutionally carried when a majority of the actual quorum present at the time has voted affirmatively—supported it—I say the authorities relied upon to sustain those positions are largely authorities with reference to proceedings of minor bodies—school boards, town trustees, and the managing boards of corporations.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. Has not the Supreme Court of the United States decided in terms that in the case of those private corporations and minor legislative bodies of which the gentleman speaks the principle is the same as in this case? Has not the court so decided?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I do not know that it has. I was coming to that question.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow me a further interruption?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Very well.

Mr. MILES. The Supreme Court of the United States in deciding the Ballin case used these words:

It is true that most of the decisions touching this question have been in respect to the action of trustees and directors of a private corporation or of minor legislative bodies which represent and act for cities and other municipal corporations. But the principle is the same.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Very well. I was coming right to that question. I lay down another proposition. In the organization of a corporation it is competent to provide that any definite number may constitute a quorum, and that the vote of any portion of that quorum in favor of a measure (a quorum itself being constituted) shall be sufficient to carry it. Then bear in mind that for years and years the presence of a quorum of this House was ascertained solely by and through the responses of members upon a yea-and-nay vote. The practice was for those present to vote yea or nay; and so until comparatively recent years the question of whether others present as members of the body, but not actually voting, should be or could be computed in the make-up of a quorum did not arise. That is a question of comparatively modern origin. I venture to say that in the early days of the Republic the presence of persons as members of this body, or of the one at the other end of the Capitol, who were not excused from voting, and not under disability, and who failed to vote, was rare.

Now, that being true—and I think it is true—I think history will bear me out in the statement that in the early days of the Republic when a roll call took place those present voted yea or nay. If that is true, then the question whether there could be a decision of a pending question in such a way as suggested by this rule did not really arise.

It is another fact, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the provision of the Constitution (I have it not at hand and will not undertake to quote it literally) as to the entering of the yeas and nays upon the Journal does not necessarily imply that the only way of determining the presence of a quorum shall be through the responses of the members. It seems to mean, more than anything else, that the actual position of those who do vote shall be made manifest by a permanent record of their votes. That method of voting seems to be primarily designed to disclose for all time how A, B, and C voted, and not to change or to make rules as to the passing or the defeating of a pending bill.

Now, I have said that it is competent to provide in the organization of a corporation that something less than a majority of its members shall constitute a quorum to do business. Such a provision is not unconstitutional unless there be a clause in the constitution to the contrary. And it is competent to provide that any definite vote of those constituting a quorum of that body shall be sufficient to pass a measure. For instance, it is competent as a matter of constitutional law, there being no inhibition in the constitution, to provide that the quorum of a corporate body, whether governing a municipal corporation or a private corporation, consisting, we will say, of 18 members, shall be regarded as constituted if 6 of them be present. It is equally competent to provide that of those 6 members present, only 3 of them voting, the votes of 2 shall carry against the vote of 1. There is no constitutional law invaded in that kind of legislation or in that sort of a provision.

Now, then, we come back to the original proposition. Unless the Constitution clearly contemplates and means, with reference to this yea-and-nay vote, that the yea-and-nay vote shall determine the presence of a quorum as well as determine the vote on the pending proposition, it appears to me there is nothing in the contention that, having gone beyond that, beyond that yea-and-nay vote, to ascertain the presence of your quorum—to make your quorum, without which you can do nothing—having gone beyond that for that purpose, you can not go beyond it for any other purpose.

If I am part and parcel of a quorum on a particular occasion, I am here charged with all the duty and all the responsibility of a member of this House, however my presence here may be ascertained or whatever I may do or choose not to do. I can not be ignored by a body which in constituting itself takes me in. If I am essential to the make-up of the quorum, or if in declaring what constitutes the quorum I am enumerated as part and parcel of the body, I am here for all purposes so far as the pending proposition is concerned. It will not do to say that I am here simply to make—to constitute—a part of a quorum, and that I can be and must be put in one place against a bill upon its passage, though I say nothing, and that I can not be put, as members are placed every day, in favor of it when I do not vote against it.

What, after all, constitutes a quorum? It consists of the individual members. They have their names on the records of this House. Now, some members vote, some do not, some say "yea," and some say "nay." What right have you to say that the man who does not vote at all is with those voting "nay" in case the nays are a minority, or "yea" if the yeas are not sufficient to pass a measure? You assume to count those who are silent as voting with the weaker party. Is it not more in accordance with common sense, more in accordance with the common judgment of mankind, is it not absolutely without a break, in fact, in legislative bodies, when not restrained by constitutional provision, and the unbroken history of the country for over a hundred years, to count the man who does not vote, viva voce or in a division of the House, as being in sentiment, in spirit, in everything but the mere verbal declaration of his intention with the prevailing side rather than with the minority, whether that larger number vote "aye" or "nay"? The proposed amendment is to extend this practice, so universal, to the yea-and-nay vote, and I think the Constitution does not forbid it.

I thank the House for its courtesy. [Applause.]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I objected to this rule when it was first under consideration, because it permits a question to be decided by a majority of those voting, although a majority of those voting might not constitute a majority of those present or even a majority of a quorum. I contended that it is not competent for the House to establish such a rule, and asserted that no bill can legally pass this body unless a majority of the members present, or at least a majority of a quorum, has voted for its passage.

The best and the safest doctrine requires a majority of those present voting affirmatively to decide a question, and I think that the Supreme Court has clearly sanctioned that doctrine in the case of The United States vs. Ballin. I shall not now review that decision, or attempt to point out the distinction between "a quorum" and "the quorum," which, it seems to me, the court clearly intended to make. I dwelt briefly upon that several days ago, and I assume that the gentlemen who heard me then will remember what I said, if indeed anything I say is worth remembering. In any event, I feel that I can best employ my time on this occasion in presenting to the House what has been said by great authors and by great judges when this subject was directly under consideration. Perhaps it is not accurate to say "when it was directly under consideration," because it is true, as my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] has said, that the decisions reported have generally been rendered in cases involving the validity of the acts of private and municipal corporations. But, as my friend from Maryland has properly suggested, the principle of law is the same, and that it is the same has been expressly declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, which in the Ballin case says:

It is true that most of the decisions touching this question have been in respect to the action of trustees and directors of a private corporation, or of the minor legislative bodies which represent and act for cities and other municipal corporations—but the principle is the same.

The court here affirms that the law which governs Congress in this respect is the same as the law which governs municipal and private corporations; and, therefore, if I can show that all of the great text-books and all of the courts—except only the supreme court of Minnesota—have held either that it requires a majority of those present or a majority of a quorum to decide a municipal or corporate question, then I feel confident that the House will be convinced that this rule ought to be amended.

In the beginning we must fix in our mind the difference in the law as applicable to indefinite and to definite bodies. As to indefinite bodies, the rule is that a majority of those who appear may act, and a majority of those who vote may decide; while as to definite bodies, the rule is that a majority of all who compose the body must be present, and a majority of those present, or at least a majority of a quorum, may decide. This is the doctrine announced by all of the great authorities in this country, from Kent's Commentaries down to the latest work upon the subject. Chancellor Kent lays down the rule in these words:

The same principle prevails in these incorporated societies as in the community at large, and the acts of a majority, in cases within the charter, bind the whole. The majority here means the major part of those who are present at a regular corporate meeting. There is a distinction to be taken between a corporate act to be done by a select and definite body, as by a board of directors, and one to be performed by constituent members. In the latter case—that is, when it is to be performed by the constituent members—a majority of those who appear may act, but in the former case—that is, when it is to be determined by a select and definite body—a majority of the definite body must be present, and then a majority of the quorum may decide. This is the general rule on the subject, and if any corporation has a different modification of the expression of the binding will of the corporation, it arises from the special provisions of the act or charter of any corporation.

The doctrine, then, as announced by Chancellor Kent, is that except where there is a special provision in the charter of a corporation—which corresponds to the Constitution under which we proceed—it requires a quorum to act and a majority of a quorum to decide. Not only is that the doctrine of the greatest of American commentators, but Judge Cooley, in his great work on Constitutional Limitations considers that doctrine so well settled that he does not deem it necessary to discuss it at length, and in his chapter on the enactment of laws dismisses the subject with this comment:

For the vote required in the passage of any particular law the reader is referred to the constitution of his State. A simple majority of a quorum is sufficient unless the constitution establishes some other rule, and where by the constitution two-thirds or three-fourths is made essential to the passage of a particular class of bills, two-thirds or three-fourths of a quorum will be understood.

I have here the most excellent work on the law of private corporations that has ever been written; certainly the best ever written up to the time it was published, and the best now, unless it is excelled by the work, not yet completed, of Mr. Thompson. Judge Dillon, the author of this work, was for years a member of the supreme court of Iowa, and I take it that my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] will attach great weight to his opinion. Judge Dillon first and properly distinguishes between definite and indefinite bodies and declares that in an indefinite body a majority of those who appear may act, but where the action is to be taken by a definite body it takes a quorum to act and a majority of the quorum to decide. His language is this:

The common-law rules as to quorums and majorities, established with reference to corporate bodies consisting of a definite number of corporators, have also in general been applied to the common council, or select governing body of our municipal corporations, where the matter is not specially regulated by the charter or statute. Thus, to use Mr. Dane's illustration, if the body consists of 12 common councilmen, 7 is the least number that can constitute a valid meeting, though 4 of the 7 (the 7 being duly assembled and present) may act.

In section 279, Judge Dillon says:

So, if a board of village trustees, consisting of 5 members, and all, or 4, are present, 2 can do no valid act, even though the others are disqualified by interest from voting, and therefore omit or decline to vote; their assenting to the measure voted for by 2 will not make it valid.

Mr. DALZELL. May I interrupt my friend?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Is that Judge Dillon's proposition, or is there a case cited?

Mr. BAILEY. That is Judge Dillon's proposition, for which he cites authority.

Mr. DALZELL. Has my friend examined authorities in support of the proposition?

Mr. BAILEY. I have.

Mr. MILES. The case of Cole vs. Williamsburg, reported in 10th Wendall (New York), is an identical case.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is not this a case where the quorum is not present because some members of the body are disqualified to act on account of interest?

Mr. BAILEY. No. The opinion in one of the cases cited to support the text was delivered by Judge Dillon himself, and holds that the presence of a man interested in the result does not disqualify him from being counted to constitute a quorum.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; but is it not a fact that these did not vote because disqualified?

Mr. BAILEY. In this particular case that is true, but it is immaterial in this connection, for I am replying now to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri that a quorum was not present.

Mr. DALZELL. That is to say, the proposition is that a body may be constituted lawfully, or may be constituted a legal body to act, made up by parties disqualified from acting.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly. I think I can find a decision from the gentleman's own State which holds that while members may be disqualified by interest from voting, they can still be counted for the purpose of creating a quorum.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to see it.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman does not really doubt that?

Mr. DALZELL. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I know the gentleman is a good lawyer, but I also know that "even great Homer sometimes nods."

In section 282 Dillon says:

In the absence of special provision the major part of those present at a meeting of a select body must concur in order to do any valid act.

And he italicizes the words "the major part of those present" and the words "must concur."

Again, in section 283, Judge Dillon says:

And, as a general rule, it may be stated that not only where the corporate power resides in a select body, as a city council, but where it has been delegated to a committee or to agents, then, in the absence of special provisions otherwise, a minority of the select body, or of the committee or agents, are powerless to bind the majority or do any valid act. If all the members of the select body or committee, or if all the agents are assembled, or if all have been duly notified, and the minority refuse or neglect to meet with the others, a majority of those present may act, provided those present constitute a majority of the whole number. In other words, in such case, a major part of the whole is necessary to constitute a quorum, and a majority of the quorum may act. If the major part withdraw so as to leave no quorum, the power of the minority to act is, in general, considered to cease.

Mr. MILES. Right there I desire to interrupt the gentleman, to say that this quotation that you have made from Dillon is precisely cited in the Ballin case.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not only approvingly cited in the Ballin case, but also in the case of Brown vs. The District of Columbia, reported in 127 United States.

In section 292 Judge Dillon declares—

[that acts done when less than a legal quorum is present, or which were not concurred in by the requisite number, are void.

In the very latest work upon this subject—the work of Judge Thompson, which I believe is to comprise six volumes, and is still incomplete—the doctrine announced by Chancellor Kent and Judge Dillon is unreservedly approved. In paragraph 728 he combats the position that a majority of those voting can decide, and says:

Authority is found for the proposition that where the meeting is duly convened and a quorum is present a majority of those who actually vote is suf ficient to a valid choice; but it is apprehended that this can be affirmed only in the cases of municipal corporations or any other cases where the elective body is indefinite and where a quorum consists of those who actually assemble at the proper place and time in pursuance of a valid notice.

In other words, Judge Thompson teaches that a majority of those who actually vote can only decide the action of indefinite bodies.

And now, Mr. Speaker, proceeding one step farther, I assert that, with the single exception of the Minnesota case—which was not reasoned at all and which, as I remember, did not even cite an authority—the only cases which can be found to contradict my assertion that a majority of all those present are required are cases which affirm my alternative proposition, that at least a majority of a quorum must vote affirmatively to decide. One of the best considered cases in the books is that of Green vs. The State in the Ohio Reports. It was there held that a majority of a quorum could elect the clerk of a city council; but even in that case the learned judge who delivered the opinion recognized that the cases had distinguished between the election of an officer, which they permitted by a bare majority of a quorum, and the transaction of more important business, which required a majority of those present. Judge Johnson, referring to an English case, said:

In all the opinions in that justly celebrated case the doctrine announced by Lord Mansfield was approved when limited to election; but it was held that if the question was the levying of a tax or the transaction of a corporate business a majority of those present must vote for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the gentleman whether that is the case where there were 18 voting—9 voting for and 9 against the proposition?

Mr. BAILEY. It is the case where 9 voted for and 9 refused to vote at all. Of the 18, 10 was a quorum, and the 9 who voted constituted a large majority of a quorum.

Mr. HENDERSON. But there were only 9 voting for and 9 against, so that there was no majority.

Mr. BAILEY. But a quorum was present and a majority of a quorum voted affirmatively. It is precisely on all fours with the New Hampshire case, where there were 3 voting and 3 silent, and the court declared that 4 was a quorum of the body, and 3 being a majority of a quorum, the clerk was lawfully chosen.

In the case of the Rushville Gas Company vs. City of Rushville the court says:

It is not a majority of the whole number present that is required. All that is requisite is a majority of the number of members required to constitute a quorum.

In that decision the court to sustain its position that a majority of all those present was not required, but that a majority of a quorum sufficed, undertook to combat the contention of counsel who had cited the quotation from Judge Dillon. The learned court declared that the counsel had misapprehended the meaning of Judge Dillon, and that he did not intend to assert that it required a majority of all those present to decide a question. When Judge Dillon published the fourth edition of his excellent work he had read that opinion, and he adds a note in which he calls attention to it and concludes his note with a query, whether the decision does not contravene the rule as to the majority required to decide in bodies of a definite number.

Mr. Speaker, I have no disposition to detain the House on this question, nor have I any inclination to charge that my friends here who hold a different view from myself are influenced by their pride of opinion. I am willing to believe that they judge this rule to be within the law, but I confess my inability to understand how lawyers of their attainments and capacity in the face of these authorities can entertain that view.

POWER OF HOUSE TO MAKE RULES.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question for information to remove a difficulty that is on my mind? The gentleman has stated his proposition very clearly, and now I want to ask this question: As I understand it, the Constitution of the United States gives the House the right to make rules to govern its own proceedings. As I understand the rule here proposed by the Committee on Rules, it provides a method of proceeding for ascertaining or securing the attendance of a quorum in this House, and provides that those members not voting either in the affirmative or in the negative shall be considered simply as acquiescing in what a majority of those voting do. Now, I ask the gentleman whether he thinks that is a part of the constitutional power given to the House to make rules for its own proceedings? Suppose that a corporation had in its charter a provision that a majority should be empowered to do business, and another provision that the corporation or its stockholders should have the right to make rules to regulate the proceedings of the board, does the gentleman think that the power thus given would include the power to say how those not voting should be counted, as I understand this rule does provide with reference to the proceedings of this House?

Mr. BAILEY. I have made no objection to that part of the rule which provides for ascertaining the presence of a quorum or to its method of taking the vote. My objection is that when a quorum is ascertained, and the vote is taken, the question may be decided by less than a majority of a quorum. I do not think that this can be done, because, there being no constitutional provision on the subject, the power of the House is limited by the common law. In one of the earlier cases decided by the supreme court of South Carolina it was distinctly stated that as neither the constitution of that State nor the Constitution of the United States contained any special provision touching this matter, the common law prevailed, and it required a majority of the body to act and a majority of a quorum to decide. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the Ballin case, lays down the same doctrine in so many words, and as the language is so plain and leaves so little room for doubt as to its meaning, I will venture to read it in full.

The other branch of the question is, whether a quorum being present, the bill received a sufficient number of votes; and here the general rule of all parliamentary bodies is that, when a quorum is present, the act of a majority of a quorum is the act of the body. This has been the rule for all time, except so far as in any given case the terms of the organic act under which the body is assembled have prescribed specific limitations. As, for instance, in those States where the constitution provides that a majority of all the members elected to either house shall be necessary to the passage of any bill. No such limitation is found in the Federal Constitution, and therefore the general law of such bodies obtains.

What can be plainer than this? The court declares that it requires a majority of a quorum to act—except in so far as in any given case the terms of the organic act under which the body is assembled have prescribed specific limitations.

And then expressly declares that—no such limitation is found in the Federal Constitution, and therefore the general law of such bodies obtains.

The court does not say that the general rule prevails unless a different one is established by the House, but expressly says that the general law obtains unless the "organic act" prescribes a different one. It will not do to say that this question was not before the court, and that consequently their language can not be construed with reference to it. It is true that this precise question—the power of a minority of a quorum to decide—was not presented, but it was necessarily involved in the question which was presented. In other words, the validity of the law was assailed upon the ground that it had not received a sufficient number of votes. The court decided that as it had received the votes of a majority of those present it had regularly passed the House; and it was in passing upon this very branch of the case that the court declared that, except where the Constitution ordained otherwise, that a majority of a quorum only was required by the common law. I submit to the candor of gentlemen on the other side that when the court declared that in the absence of a special provision in the Constitution no more than a majority of a quorum could be required to decide, it follows as a corollary that no less than a quorum can be permitted to decide, for it is a poor rule that will not work both ways. If this House can change the general law by its rule, the Supreme Court, in the passage which I have quoted, was inexcusably unfortunate in its choice of words; and as it is not the habit of that great tribunal to speak loosely and inaccurately, I am unwilling to believe that it did so in this case. They had considered the question well in all its phases, and we are safe in believing that their language expresses their opinion as to the law.

Not only does the Ballin case seem to settle the question upon authority, but it is supported by the best of reasons. The question of my friend from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] practically admits that what I have said is now the law, but implies that it is within the power of the House, by a simple rule, to change that law. To my mind this is a startling proposition. Does he mean to assert that either House of Congress can change the law of the land by its rule? I hazard nothing in saying that there is not a gentleman on this floor who will insist that this House can repeal or amend a statute of the United States by its mere rule; and yet, sir, I defy the ingenuity of the most skillful debater to show any substantial difference in this respect between statutory and common law. The common law is as valid and as binding upon the consciences of courts and legislators as the statutes are, and a power admitted over the one can not be successfully denied over the other. If the House can change the common law in this particular by a rule, no part of that splendid system of justice is exempt from its impatience or its caprice; and it can, by its single will, destroy what Lord Coke has aptly described as "the perfection of reason."

Upon what, sir, is this extraordinary power predicated? Upon the simple and necessary power of the House to "determine its own rules of proceeding."

This rule involves much more than a method of proceeding. It involves what, according to the Supreme Court, has been for all time the law of the land. I do not doubt the power of the House to adopt any reasonable rule for ascertaining its will, but that does not free us from this difficulty, for with that power conceded we are still confronted with the question as to what is its will. To be sure, the will of the House is the will of the majority. But of what majority? A majority of those present, or a majority of a quorum, or a majority of those voting? The courts all hold that within the meaning of the law the action of the majority is the action of the body itself, but just as it requires a majority of the body to act for the body, so it requires a majority of that majority to act for the majority. If the House can permit the decision of a question by a minority of those present, it can go further and permit it to be decided by a minority of those voting. If the authority to determine the rules of its own proceeding confers upon the House the unlimited power for which gentlemen contend, then it would be permissible for the House to adopt a rule providing that every bill which had received 100 votes should become a law, notwithstanding the fact that 200 votes might be recorded against it. This must be true, unless, indeed, the courts would hold such a rule void as a violation of fundamental right, but this would be fleeing from one danger to another, for if the rules of this House are within its own discretion, then that discretion ought not to be controlled by the courts.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say frankly that I have had some difficulty in disposing of the members who are present and who for any reason refuse to vote. I once thought with my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] that they ought to be counted on the prevailing side. "If a majority want it done," he says, "the silent members ought to be counted with them; if a majority do not want it done, the silent members ought to be counted with them." I know that there are many timeserving politicians who are extremely anxious to be always on the winning side, but this is carrying it a little too far. [Laughter.] We ought to assume that the gentlemen who decline to vote do so for a sufficient reason. The earlier cases, under the sanction of the great name of Lord Mansfield, declared that silent members ought to be considered as consenting, but the later cases have rejected that doctrine. A distinguished judge who for years adorned the bench of Pennsylvania, and a greater than whom never illustrated the jurisprudence of that or any other State, has declared that the legal intendment is that the silent member votes neither one way nor the other.

Mr. DALZELL. But my friend will admit that Judge Sharswood based his decision in that case upon the precise language of the statute governing it.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true. The case was this: There were 112 members of a certain school board. The man whose election had been certified to the proper authorities received 56 of those votes; the other candidate received 55 votes, and one member refused to vote. But Judge Sharswood said that the legal intendment was that he voted for neither the one nor the other.

Mr. DALZELL. But the statute in that case required that a person to be elected must receive a majority of the votes of all the members of the body.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand that perfectly well, and I am not citing this case as authority on that particular point. I am merely citing the declaration of Judge Sharswood that the silent member should not be counted either way.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is citing the case as if Judge Sharswood had laid down a general proposition on this subject, whereas in point of fact he undertook to decide nothing except what was involved in that particular case, and he put the decision upon the very ground I have stated.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman's familiarity with the case misleads him as to the purpose of my citation. I did not cite the remark to show that the court decided that it required a majority of all present. If I had done so, I would have used the citation in another branch of my argument. I simply referred to Judge Sharswood's opinion in that case in answer to the declaration of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] that the members present and not voting should be counted as acquiescing in the result.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, not only I do think it a matter of doubtful wisdom to count the whole number of silent members as consenting, but the mature judgment of your constituents is that it is unwise. For thirty years all of the new States which have adopted constitutions and all of the old States which have adopted new constitutions have, with rare exceptions, expressly written in their fundamental law the provision that no question shall be decided except upon the affirmative vote of a majority of all the men elected to the legislature.

Shall Congress, in the face of this well-defined policy on the part of the various States, proceed contrariwise? Shall we provide that fewer men may make laws, while the States are requiring more men to do so? The adoption of this rule proclaims to the world that the House of Representatives can decide questions deeply affecting the honor, the welfare, and even the liberties of this Republic under circumstances which would disable the directors of a private corporation from deciding a question of profit. Sir, it is not lawful for us to do so, even if it were wise; and it would not be wise for us to do so, even if it were lawful.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, the change proposed by the Committee on Rules, now under consideration, is but one more step in that evolution of parliamentary law that was so successfully set afloat in the Fifty-first Congress by the present eminent Speaker of this House.

The practical question of law we are called upon to determine is to be answered by an examination of those provisions of the Federal Constitution that govern the action of this body. It is provided, in one clause of the Constitution, that the House of Representatives shall be competent to do business when a majority of its members are present. In other words, the language of the Constitution is that the majority of the House shall constitute a quorum; and the instrument goes a step farther and declares the purpose for which the quorum is constituted, namely, to do business.

Now, furthermore, the Constitution has left us in the dark as to how the quorum is to be ascertained and as to the manner in which the House will do business. But in another paragraph of that instrument it is provided that the House of Representatives may frame rules and regulations for its government and procedure. I do not undertake to quote the exact language of that instrument, but only give the substance of it. Now, we are to take these provisions of the Constitution and read them together in order to obtain a clear interpretation of the purposes of the framers of that instrument. It is a familiar principle of law, that applies not only to the organic law but to the statutory law as well, that provisions in pari materia relating to the same subject-matter are to be construed together in order to ascertain the exact scope and meaning of each. These two provisions of the Constitution, therefore, are to be considered together. First, we must have 179 members present in the Hall of the House before we can do business. Then the Constitution says that this House shall have the power to provide, by rules, how it shall proceed to transact business; and that is precisely what the Committee on Rules attempts to do in this report—that is, to exercise that power given to the House by the provisions of the Federal Constitution—to make rules and regulations as to how, when, and the manner in which that business which the quorum is qualified to do may be performed.

Now, sir, we are not to resort to the text-books, as my friend from Texas has done, and examine decisions relating to the government of private corporations to find a light on the subject of these rules. We are to resort to the provisions of the Constitution itself, and having found what they are, apply them in a common sense way to the problem before us, in order to carry out the purposes of the founders of the Government. What was the object of the framers of the Constitution in providing that a majority of the House should be present before it assumed to do business? What was the purpose and spirit that actuated the incorporation of that language into that instrument? Why, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in analogy to the law in all other branches it means that a majority of the House shall be present, not necessarily for the purpose of acting, but for the primary purpose of deliberating. The object in having a quorum present is that a stated number, to wit, a majority of the House, shall be present to deliberate upon pending matters of legislation. I repeat this proposition, because I think it goes to the very root of this question, that the sole object and purpose of requiring a majority of the House to be present when matters of legislation are taken up is that there shall be a majority here who can deliberate. In other words, deliberation is the sole purpose and aim that actuated the framers of the Constitution in requiring the presence of a majority of the members in the House. They purposely left the language general.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. If he will read the debates, he will find it was not for the sake of deliberation, but it was expressly upon the ground that the people ought not to be bound by a law passed by less than a majority.

Mr. POWERS. I have always noticed, Mr. Speaker, that when gentlemen are troubled with the plain, common-sense explanation of the meaning of the Constitution they always go behind it and quote Elliott's Debates, or some of the debates of the constitutional convention which framed the instrument, to obtain light as to the meaning of its text. I agree that in proper cases that is a proper method of ascertaining its meaning; but my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is too good a lawyer not to know that all this matter of debate that took place in the Federal convention was crystallized and ended in the text of the instrument itself. He might just as well quote the debates in this House upon the passage of a law that we enact, and say that you can get from his speech or from mine, or from the speech of somebody else, some light as to the meaning of that law. But did he ever hear of a court going back of the text of a law to inquire what the gentlemen who participated in framing it understood it to mean, or what they said about it in the legislature when it was enacted?

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Vermont will permit me, I will say to him that I can find many cases where the Supreme Court of the United States have gone to Elliott's Debates to discover the purpose with which that convention adopted a particular provision of the Constitution.

Mr. POWERS. My friend is no doubt correct in his statement. I myself said that in proper cases that was a proper method of ascertaining the meaning of the Constitution.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought you said the courts did not do that.

Mr. POWERS. I say the courts do not do it when it comes to the consideration of statutory law. If we pass an act of Congress here the courts never come in and take up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and read what you and I said about it. They take the text of the law itself, and make that carry its own meaning on the face of it, and that is the only sensible way in which they could treat the subject.

Now, I have said, Mr. Speaker, that the purpose and object of requiring a quorum to be present is that a fixed number, to wit, a majority of the House, shall participate in the deliberations that go on here, and it is left to the other power that is given in the Constitution to ascertain how the will of that majority shall find its expression. As a matter of common practice we all know that hardly any bill passes this body, unless the yeas and nays are called, upon which 20 men vote; but the other 160 men who sit here, by expressing no dissent to the action of those who do vote, practically accede to it, and they have participated in the deliberations. Now, when you come to the question of acting, they do as they please about it. They can sit still and allow those who have louder voices or better lungs to respond to the demands of the Chair, or they can give their votes if they please; but if they sit silent in their seats they practically accede to what is done by those who do act, and this is in accord with the analogies of the law, too. Why, every lawyer knows perfectly well that if any man makes a statement in the presence of another that concerns his interest and he makes no reply to it, if he does not dispute it or qualify it, he is bound by it on the ground of an estoppel. He is bound by the statement that is made concerning his interest, unless he sees fit to make objection. So here. Every member who deliberates participates in the deliberations of the House. When the question is put to a vote and he fails to respond one way or the other, but the others respond for him, he accedes to what they say the action of the majority shall be. He is estopped from saying that he voted against that bill, because by sitting silent when he is called upon to act he allows others to act for him, to assume to represent him, and impliedly he gives them the authority to represent him.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, I was saying that this practice has grown up here, and this construction of the language of the Constitution is in strict accord with all the analogies of law. We have in my State a statute which requires the grand jury to be composed of 23 men, and that a bill of indictment or presentment must be agreed to by 12, which, as you observe, is a majority. In many States the grand jury is lawfully constituted with 18 men, but 12 must concur. The question arose a few years ago in respect to the validity of a presentment that was made by the grand jury where it was made to appear that only 20 grand jurors were present when the case was under investigation; and the court said that that indictment was bad, because the requirement that there should be 23 members of the grand jury was a requirement that called for the deliberation of 23 men; and unless 23 men had actually participated in the deliberation, although 12 concurred in the indictment, it was invalid.

Now, the same principle applies in the election of our minor officers. In my State that is undoubtedly true; in all States it is provided that town representatives, representatives of the municipality, shall be elected by a majority of votes. We go to our several voting places and nine-tenths, perhaps, of the legal voters in that municipality sit on their seats and do not act, and 10 men go forward and deposit their ballots and elect the representative to the State legislature. Has any man ever questioned the propriety of that action?

Mr. BAILEY. And I do not. That is an indefinite constituency, and that action is entirely valid. I do not question it.

Mr. POWERS. Many of these provisions, Mr. Speaker, result, as I agree, in the action of the minority. The whole theory of our Government is that our laws shall be enacted by a majority. That is true, but oftentimes, possibly in a majority of instances, our laws are passed by a very small minority; but if a majority is present, participating in the deliberations of the legislative body, the requirements of the Constitution that a quorum shall be present has been answered.

Now, then, this rule, as I have insisted, simply provides a way of ascertaining the voice of the majority. They must be here. There must be 179 gentlemen present. The next step in the procedure is to ascertain the voice and the act in the vote of that 179 members. I think it is perfectly competent to pass a rule that unless a majority of the 179 members expressly dissent from the proceeding or the act it shall be valid. It is perfectly competent for the House to say that a majority of voices that the Speaker shall hear, when they are called upon to act, shall govern the decision of the body, although that is a minority.

Mr. BAILEY. If it would not interrupt the gentleman, the suggestion the gentleman makes as to the power of the House to adopt rules is only one of the difficulties that I discover. I desire to submit this view, and to have his answer. I think that power of adopting rules means, perhaps, the parliamentary procedure. If it means more than that, and authorizes the House to reverse the doctrine that it takes a majority to pass a bill, then would it not follow that the House can absolutely declare that a minority can pass a bill, however foolish it may be to suppose that the House would do that—the House would have that power unless there is a restriction of its power to adopt a rule?

Mr. POWERS. I would not insist, Mr. Speaker, that the House by a minority vote in the affirmative could pass a law.

Mr. BAILEY. If it had a rule to that effect, why not?

Mr. POWERS. Why, the gentleman can suppose a case that makes anything absurd, but the proposition that we should adopt a rule that the vote of a minority should enact legislation is giving it a pretty wide range.

Mr. TOWNE. Let me make this suggestion: Is it not in effect only a proposition to enact a rule of procedure which shall enable the quorum to ascertain what the will of the majority is?

Mr. POWERS. Precisely that.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit that it is not the will of the majority of those present; and if it is competent to say that a minority of those present can decide a question, then it is competent to go a step further, and say a minority of those voting may decide.

Mr. TOWNE. I do not see that at all.

Mr. POWERS. I think, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had given attention to the suggestions I have made, there would be no particular trouble with the argument I was undertaking to offer. I insist, first, that the House must have a quorum present to do business; second, that it is entirely competent for the House to prescribe the manner in which that quorum shall act. Now, that quorum is a majority, not a minority, of the House, and the House prescribes a rule for ascertaining what the pleasure of that majority is.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. I would like to ask my friend, either at this point or before he concludes, to give us his view as to the wisdom of adopting such a rule, waiving the question of the constitutional power of the House to do it.

Mr. POWERS. Well, Mr. Speaker, the wisdom of adopting the rule is founded in the way that we are made up as men. We know perfectly well—and it is characteristic not only of this body, but of all legislative bodies—that generally three-fourths of the members do not actively participate in the business of the House. When a vote is called for, perhaps 20 men will respond and 120 will remain silent. Now, you can not change the nature of those men and compel them to say yea or nay. They sit here silent, and the usage which has grown up has made it the law of the House that the will of those who speak shall bind the majority, unless they choose to express their dissent.

Mr. BLACK of Georgia. If this rule shall be adopted and there is a very small minority vote in favor of a given proposition, will it be competent to call the attention of the House to that fact and to ask for an expression of the will of the majority?

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman from Georgia is very well aware that if only half a dozen respond to the call for a vote, and he, being one of the silent members, desires a fuller vote, he can ask for a division or for the yeas and nays. He is not precluded by anything in this rule from interposing an objection to this mode of procedure.

Mr. SWANSON. But this rule, as I understand, does not apply except in cases where there is a call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. POWERS. This rule provides the manner in which the presence of a quorum may be ascertained if anybody disputes it.

Mr. HENDERSON. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] I will say that the rule provides that absent members shall be brought before the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms and shall then be discharged from arrest and given an opportunity to vote. Before that is done the roll will be called twice, as it is now, and then members will be brought in, discharged from arrest, and given an opportunity to vote, so that there is nothing in this rule to interfere with the fullest expression of their will that members can desire.

Mr. POWERS. The rule, as I understand it, is framed for the government of practical men engaged in the transaction of practical business, and we have to deal with those men as they are, not as if all of them were always ready to answer yea or nay upon any particular proposition. The condition of things which this rule contemplates is not peculiar to this body. It runs through all the legislative bodies in the Union; it runs through all our municipal bodies at our homes. When any proposition is submitted to a large body of voters, a few respond and the rest keep silent. Now, I hold that the silent man here who, having a duty to perform, sees fit to remain silent, thereby impliedly authorizes those who do speak to represent his choice, and he is estopped from denying this on the ground that, having a duty to perform himself, and somebody else assuming to perform it in his presence without objection on his part, he can not question the result.

Mr. MCCULLOCH. Does the gentleman think that the doctrine of estoppel applies in legislative matters?

Mr. POWERS. I think it applies to the individual member. I say that he can not dispute the action of the majority who have undertaken to act. Whether the result would stand the test of the court upon a question as to the validity of the action taken is quite another question. The point I make is that if I vote, and you, being present, do not dissent, I represent you as well as myself in giving that vote.

Supposing this question were brought before the court on a test case, I ask my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], who has evidently given much study to this problem, whether he thinks that, the Speaker of this House having affixed his signature to an enactment certifying that it had passed the House on a certain day, and the President of the Senate having affixed his signature attesting the fact that it had passed the Senate on a certain day, and the enactment thus certified being sent to the President of the United States—I ask my friend whether he thinks that the President of the United States could say that the measure had not been properly presented to him for his signature? Is not the certification of the very officers who have been appointed to do that work a certification by a public officer which admits of no contradiction? Most clearly so; and I think the gentleman from Texas himself concedes that if a law is properly certified by all the officials through whose hands it must pass, you can not go back of that certification and look at the Journal or prove by a majority of the members that they did not vote for it.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman is quite right in saying that you can not prove by the members that they did not vote for it, and it has been held that you could not go to the Journal to prove that the measure had passed in a different form from that in which it was signed and sent to the President; but the court expressly declined to say that you could not go to the Journal to ascertain whether the bill had passed on a yea-and-nay vote, and in the Ballin case the court intimate that you can go to the Journal, and in fact in that case they did go to it.

Mr. POWERS. I think the gentleman's statement supports my proposition that you can not go to the Journal, because he says the court did not decide that you could go there.

Mr. BAILEY. In one case; but in the Ballin case the court did go to the Journal.

Mr. POWERS. In what State did that case arise.

Mr. BAILEY. That was a case involving the question of the constitutionality of what is known as the McKinley Act. In that case the court did go to the Journal, the court being the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POWERS. There are some State constitutions which provide that legislative acts to be valid must be passed by a majority of all the members of the legislative body.

The State of Missouri, I am told, has such a provision in its constitution, and that majority must be ascertained by a yea-and-nay vote. Now, under such a restriction, where the constitution prescribes a rule for the passage of a bill, it is very evident that it must be followed. But the Federal Constitution is entirely silent on that question; it does not touch the question of what number is necessary to pass a bill. It simply provides that a majority shall be present to do business. The method of doing that business is left to be regulated by the House itself. If a majority of the House are here for the purposes of deliberation, the requirement of the Constitution is answered. If a majority of this House chooses to adopt a rule, for instance, that the will of a majority of those voting or the majority of those whose voices the Speaker hears shall be taken as the action of the majority, that is the end of it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I simply want, in a very brief manner, to enter my protest against this proposed rule, as being an improper and unwise method of procedure for this House. I have listened to the gentleman from Texas and the gentlemen on the other side. It seems to me that there might be authority for this House to adopt this as a rule of procedure. The Constitution gives the House authority to make its own rules. I think possibly the Constitution gives the House of Representatives ample authority to ascertain whether those voting or not voting shall be counted in the affirmative or negative. This rule says they shall not be counted either way, but shall be regarded as acquiescing in what the majority of those voting may do. Now, this House may have authority under the Constitution for establishing such a rule. But that does not diminish the importance of the question which we are to consider, whether this is a wise rule for the control of legislation in this body. It is upon that view of the question that I desire to submit a few remarks for the consideration of this House.

I believe that no rule established at this session—none at least that I can conceive of—would be more unwise and result in more pernicious effects than to say that legislation should be passed by the method proposed in this rule. As appears by the answer of the acting chairman of the Committee on Rules [Mr. HENDERSON], if 180 members are present, 2 of whom vote for a proposition and 1 against it, that proposition under this rule would be enacted into law. Now, I say, in a great body like Congress, with great jobs seeking legislative sanction, with great claims clamoring to get through this House, it is unwise to adopt a rule to facilitate legislation so far as this will do.

We have adopted at this session a rule which says that every member shall vote unless excused. We thus make it imperative upon a member to vote on every proposition propounded here. Yet here we have presented to-day a proposed rule which enables members to "trim," enables them to sit silent and vote neither for nor against a proposition, thus enabling legislation to be enacted by the few who may vote. Now, every man who has had any experience in Congress knows how often a member is approached by another member who says, "if you can not vote for my proposition don't vote at all, or be absent." Now, I say we should not have a rule that will enable members to "trim" more than they can do at present, which will enable them, by being absent, or by sitting silent in their seats, to aid in the enactment of pernicious legislation.

I know that gentlemen who favor this rule say that members who are present and do not like the proposition presented have an opportunity to defeat it by participating in the action of the House upon it. Now, I take this ground: Legislation changes present conditions, and present conditions should not be changed except by the acquiescence of a majority. I say it is bad policy for any party to inaugurate a system which will enable 177 members to sit silent, letting 2 members vote for a proposition and 1 against it, and then have that proposition enacted into law. I might go further. Under this proposition 179 men may sit silent in their seats or answer present and be counted to make a quorum, and then when it comes to a vote on the proposition a single member may vote for it, and if there be no vote against it that proposition can be enacted into law.

In view of the temptation for the enactment of different kinds of jobs, in view of the personal favors which are exchanged between member and member, in view of the personal popularity of members who may be anxious to do something for their districts, anxious to get through private bills, anxious to get through something beneficial to themselves and their special sections, it is poor policy to facilitate the enactment of such legislation by the adoption of such a rule as this. I say no measure should be placed upon the statute book unless a majority of those present who are deliberating upon it agree that it is necessary and beneficial to the country. This proposed rule reverses that policy. As has been well said in this discussion, there is scarcely a State legislature in the Union, whether Democratic or Republican, which has not a rule providing that those members not voting shall be counted in the negative. Such rules proceed upon the idea that no legislation should be enacted, no change made in present conditions, unless the majority of those who are giving the matter deliberation and consideration think the change is beneficial and will subserve some great public interest.

This occasion marks the first departure from what has hitherto been the wise, conservative, and sensible method of procedure, and it marks the entrance upon a new policy, which this House will surely rue if it adopts it as a method of procedure. I have not heard any member who has advocated this rule give any reasonable, sensible excuse for reversing the policy of one hundred years and allowing a small minority to put legislation upon the statute books.

I will go so far as to say that I would vote for a rule of this House providing that every member who is present and not voting shall be considered as voting in the negative upon the pending proposition. I think the House has ample authority to pass such a rule, and it would be conducive to better legislation, would be conducive to economy, would be conducive to the prevention of all kinds of jobs and schemes which clamor for passage through this body.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the wiser course. Why? Because the experience of every State, the experience of every legislative body, shows that it is much wiser to count those not participating in legislation in that manner rather than to count them in the affirmative, or acquiescing in what was done.

But I simply wish to put myself on record as opposed to the adoption of such a rule, because I believe that its effect will be pernicious, and that this Congress, or any other Congress that will adopt such a rule, will rue it when they see its effects upon legislation in this country.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending rule.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 14 and 15 of section 4, Rule XV, strike out the words "which shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear" and insert in lieu of said words "shall be decided as shall appear by the votes of a majority of a quorum of the House."

Mr. MILES. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire, being a young member of this body in two senses of that word, to occupy much of the time of the House in the discussion of this important constitutional question. I do desire, however, in a very few words to go on record, according to my lights as a lawyer, in favor of the view which was expressed in reference to this matter, when it was up a few days ago, by that distinguished lawyer, General CATCHINGS, of Mississippi. I do not entertain the view which I think has been very plausibly put before the House by the distinguished lawyer from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. I do not entertain the view, sir, that it was ever contemplated by the framers of the Constitution or that it was ever contemplated by the Supreme Court of the United States in the decision which it rendered in Ballin's case that there should be a majority of those present, or, to use the language of the distinguished gentleman, a majority of the quorum. What I apprehend the Supreme Court in Ballin's case meant by the term "the quorum" was a constitutional quorum. It meant to recognize the fact that in this matter there was a constitutional limitation upon Congress, and, as a lawyer, according to the lights I have and the decisions which have been so numerously cited by the gentleman from Texas, agreeing to the conclusions which have been reached by every English lawyer from the time of Lord Mansfield to the present time, I assert that it has never been determined that any body similar to this can pass a law by a less vote than a majority of the quorum of the whole body. But the words "a quorum" and "the quorum," I apprehend, mean exactly the same thing.

When my friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] in his very interesting remarks made the point seriously (and I know that he is a lawyer and an able one and must have read the decision in the Ballin case) that all the decisions on this point had been rendered with reference to private corporations and minor municipal bodies, I humbly called his attention, and I beg here to call the attention of this House again to the fact that the distinguished jurist of the Supreme Court of the United States, in rendering his decision in this case, starts that very able opinion with this important language:

It is true that most of the decisions touching this question have been in respect to the action of trustees and directors of a private corporation, or of the minor legislative bodies which represent and act for cities and other municipal corporations—but the principle is the same.

This is, Mr. Speaker, the gist and very kernel of the decision, and I want to say here, sir, that I have entertained no view contrary to that expressed in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon this subject. I have always believed that it was within the power of Congress to pass a rule requiring the members of this body to be present to perform their acts and duties. I have always believed in the policy and wisdom of the rule passed upon in the Ballin case, and I think it is a monument to the distinguished ability of the present Speaker of this House that he was the author of the rule determined by the Supreme Court in its decision in that case to be a sound one. I have never differed with that rule, but it seems to me that the Supreme Court in passing upon it passed upon the question now before the House.

After stating that the principle is the same in a case of this kind as in the case of private corporations and minor municipal bodies, the court goes on to cite approvingly these various cases which lay down the rule invariably that the majority of a quorum, and only the majority of a quorum, shall pass a bill. Every decision which the court quotes is a decision based upon a case of a private corporation or of a minor municipal body. So that it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this very question which my friend [Mr. DE ARMOND] raised has been passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States.

My friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] quoted from Judge Dillon, and the decision before me in the very outset ratifies and approves what Judge Dillon says by quoting it verbatim et literatim as it has already been quoted by my friend from Texas.

It also quotes the case of State against Green, the Ohio case, approvingly, which my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] also quoted.

It quotes from Chancellor Kent and it also quotes from 1 McCoid, which is a celebrated case, and I desire especially to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side to that case. I will not consume the time of this House, Mr. Speaker, in any effort to make a constitutional argument. My sphere as a lawyer has been an humble one, but being a lawyer, I take it, sir, that it is my duty to go according to my lights as a professional man as well as my lights on any question of fact before this House. I can not conscientiously vote for this rule, because, as it seems to me, it is in direct conflict not only with the spirit but with the letter of the Ballin case.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, every bill which shall have passed the House and the Senate must, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President. How must it be passed? That is the whole question. Passed under such rules as the House and Senate may determine for their proceedings. Those proceedings are controlled by three conditions in the Constitution, and there are no others.

First, if the President disapproves a bill and returns it to either House, two-thirds of the House on a yea-and-nay vote must vote for it or it fails to become a law. And in impeachment trials in the Senate, in order to secure conviction two-thirds of those present must vote for it.

One other provision in relation to how the proceedings of either House shall be conducted. One-fifth of those present can have the yeas and nays recorded on any question. Where is there any provision in the Constitution limiting or controlling the discretionary powers given to each House to determine its rules of procedure? The fixed rule of the Supreme Court, that I do not think is ever departed from, is that where there is a grant of discretionary power to anything or anybody in the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States will not sit in judgment on the exercise of that discretion, no matter what it is. It was upon that doctrine that the constitutionality of the legal-tender quality of the United States notes was sustained in the first decision by the court. The Constitution gave to Congress the power to declare war, and the Supreme Court held the power to declare war carried with it, in the discretion of Congress, the doing of anything that the war-making power might think necessary to bring the war to a successful close.

In the making of rules to conduct the proceedings of the House there is one other condition fixed by the Constitution. I have referred to those that relate to voting. There is only one other. There must be a majority of the members chosen to constitute a quorum to do business. What is a quorum was raised in this Hall on the 4th of July, 1861. The then occupant of the chair decided that a quorum consisted of a majority of the members chosen from the Congressional districts. What is the evidence of a quorum, if that quesiton had been raised, the then occupant of the chair would have decided that the evidence of the choosing is the number of members who take the oath of office. That Congress might have been blocked in its proceedings if the strict construction that I hear gentlemen placing upon the constitutional power of the House to make its rules had prevailed.

The quorum consists of a majority chosen. The choosing is not completed or determined except by the oath of office taken by those who are chosen. A Congressional district is not obliged to send a member, and there is no power to compel it to. No State in the Union is obliged to send a Senator to the United States Senate, and there is no power to compel it to do so. If a Congressional district had elected a member, and instead of coming and discharging his duty and taking the oath of office, he had done as a good many did in 1861, had gone into another Congress, how could a constitutional quorum be determined except by the oath of office of the members chosen, for that is necessary to complete the choosing, for the House could not send for any others and bring them in to make a quorum. A quorum being present, the House determines the rules of its proceedings, subject only to the conditions in the Constitution to which I have referred. What nonsense to make a rule which will allow the minority to obstruct all business!

The majority makes rules to facilitate business, and so long as its rules do not contravene conditions of the Constitution, they can make just such rules as they please. Suppose the record of the House should go to the Supreme Court on a question whether a law was passed in due form. The Supreme Court, looking over that Journal, would see whether the President had vetoed a bill and it was attempted to be made a law by less than two-thirds of the votes of the two Houses on a yea-and-nay vote. If the record showed that, the law would be a nullity. In the other case, that of impeachment in the Senate. It must show that two-thirds of those present in the Senate voted for conviction. If two-thirds did vote for conviction, the conviction would be held good.

Now, where in the Constitution is there any other condition that they are going to examine in restraint of either House determining the rules of its proceedings? There is nothing fixing how the House shall vote, nothing about majorities, and nothing about yeas and nays besides the cases referred to, except one-fifth of those present may have the yeas and nays entered on the Journal on any question. With the exceptions referred to, the House can make what rules it pleases to facilitate the transaction of business. Take an extreme case. Make the rule as proposed, that a majority of those voting, a quorum being present, will pass any bill in the House, no matter what the others do—say there were but two voting. What would the court do in examining, to see first whether there was a quorum present? How could they determine that? They take the record of the House and find 357 men have taken the oath of office. A quorum is a majority of that number. The House has passed a rule that if members sit in their seats they are to be counted as present with those who vote whether they vote or not. Has the House the power to do that? The court has already declared they have. A quorum being present for business—the positive requirement of the Constitution—and the House having determined in its rules how a bill shall be passed, what could there be for the Supreme Court to inquire into if the record showed the bill passed as required by the rules of the House?

The power to make the rules is conferred absolutely upon the House, to be exercised in their own discretion. How is the Supreme Court, under their own rule of construction, to limit that discretion? The rules of the House as passed provide that every member, when his name is called, shall vote, except in certain specified cases. He refuses to do it. There is no power that can compel him to vote if he resolutely refuses. It is a plain violation of the rules of the House, and prevents the transaction of its business. Can it be possible that the Supreme Court of the United States would hold that the discretionary power conferred on the House to determine its rules of proceedings would not have the power to neutralize this violation of its rules by providing that those members who comply with such rules shall not carry on the business of the House? The rule as proposed neutralizes the refusal of a member to comply with the rules determined by the House for its proceedings. The rule neutralizes his refusal to do what the rules require by saying he is to be counted in constituting a quorum. Then, whoever votes on the question, if the rule so provides, concludes him and the whole House. Where is there anything in the Constitution that says a bill shall pass the two Houses in any particular way unless it is returned from the President without his approval? There is nothing about a majority in the Constitution; nothing about how many votes shall be required to pass a bill, except in case of a veto. It simply says that a bill which shall have passed the House and the Senate, before it becomes a law, shall, so and so, be submitted to the President.

Now, the House determines its own rules of procedure, and like any other discretionary power granted by the Constitution is to be exercised in its own discretion, not subject to review by any court as to the wisdom of the exercise of that discretion. I need not take the time of the House except for one instance——

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Will you permit me to ask you a question?

Mr. GROW. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. While I expect to vote for this rule, I would like the ex-Speaker, who ruled in 1861, to be logical in his statement. Can you explain why there would be any prejudice to legislation by counting a portion of a quorum silent against a bill and having that same number of silent men counted against it the same as if they had voted no?

Mr. GROW. You undertake to grant the same power to a member who refuses to obey our rules as to one who does.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I ask the question, if there were, for instance, 50 men on the floor who declined to vote, but who are counted for the purpose of making a quorum, wherein is the legislative effect more disastrous by their refusing to vote than if they had actually voted no?

Mr. GROW. The House undoubtedly has the power to make such a rule, but why should the negative side of the question be strengthened by all refusing to vote any more than the affirmative? I should oppose the adoption of any rule that required the recording of any member for or against any question except by himself. My own conscience and judgment must make that record, and nobody else has the right to make it for me. But the House can neutralize my refusal to vote, so far as practical legislative results are concerned.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. I am not certain that I have made my question clear to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As I understand him, his proposition is that a majority of those who vote——

Mr. GROW. A quorum being present.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Yes; that a majority of those who vote, a quorum being present, shall have power to enact a law. Now, why should there not be a majority of the quorum voting when a portion of those present are silent any more than if that portion voted "no"?

Mr. GROW. I do not require a majority of the quorum.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. No; but if those who remain silent had voted "no," then it would have taken a majority of the quorum to pass the measure. Now, if they do not vote, how can there be any prejudice to them by counting them as voting "no"?

Mr. GROW. Because in that case you put me on record, to be read in the future, as having voted for or against a measure that I might be unwilling to be responsible for to the public opinion of the world. You undertake to put my convictions on that question on the records of the House. But if I sit silent, withholding my vote, the House can nullify my refusal to vote, so far as legislation is concerned, and that is all they would have a right to do.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Do you, as one of the ablest and oldest members here, think it would be policy for the Congress of the United States to enact laws by less than half of a quorum of this body?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Nine-tenths of the measures passed are passed in that way.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Speaker, it is just as good policy and just as wise for one man to vote on a bill in this House with 356 sitting silent as it is for 200 to vote and the balance sit silent. If those who are present sit silent and refuse to vote, that, under this rule, would not prevent one man or any number of men from representing the House by their action. If members desire to defeat a measure, they must put themselves on record in opposition to it, and not, by a mere failure to comply with their duty under the law, nullify the action of those who do their duty. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] spoke about members being enabled, under this rule, to skulk and avoid proper responsibility.

Why, sir, any member can dodge to-day or any other time if he wants to, and this rule only provides that dodgers shall not accomplish any practical results, so that they might as well vote. It is a rule against dodgers. The dodger is the man who will not vote, and you have no power to compel him to vote; above all, you have no right to put him on record in favor of a measure that he is opposed to in conscience, or to put him on record except in his own way. You have no right to do that whether he is silent or not; but you have a right to neutralize his violation of the rules in attempts to defeat legislation, and you do that by making a rule that those who do discharge their duty under the rules of the House shall, by their action, bind those who refuse to by remaining silent, just as the voters who go to the polls and cast their votes, even though they be an infinitesimal portion of the voters of the election precinct, can by their action bind those who stay away. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to occupy so much of the time of the House, and I would not have done so but for the questions that have been put to me.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], if he is about to proceed now, permit me to call his attention to a question which I should like him to consider? I wish to bring it to his attention now because I shall not have an opportunity to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] is recognized.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, this is one of the greatest questions that can possibly call forth the ability, wisdom, and patriotism of this House; and I believe it is a question that is now being discussed for the last time in this generation, and that when this House shall have adopted the pending rule it will have clinched the proper construction of the Constitution of the United States on this matter and will have made the rule of the Fifty-first Congress on the quorum question an absolute finality. Referring to the court decisions that have been cited against this rule, I will say that it is one of the easiest things in the world for a man who is skilled in the practice of the law to go into the digests and find decisions of the courts that will support almost any contention. I remember that when I was at the law school at Albany, and a question was presented by one of the professors of the moot court, a student, in giving a judicial opinion in the case, as he was required by the rules to do, having examined every authority that he could find pro and con in the various digests, discovered that there were forty-five decisions on one side of the question and forty-three on the other, and thereupon gave his opinion on the side of the majority. [Laughter.]

There is no trouble in finding court decisions upon any side of a controverted question, just as there is no trouble in finding Bible texts to support almost any denominational vagary. We are told that even the devil himself can cite Scripture for his purpose.

There is one strange thing that must have attracted the attention of every patriot, and that is that the Constitution of the United States is constantly invoked to defeat the will of the American people, to obstruct the progress of legislation, and even to overthrow the country itself; but it is very seldom invoked in order to effectuate the will of the people, or in order to perpetuate liberty, or in order to carry out the spirit of patriotism that some men fail to discover within the Constitution. "The letter killeth, but the spirit maketh alive."

Now, then, what are both the letter and the spirit of the Constitution on this subject? The Constitution says:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States; * * * and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business.

Now, what is this thing called "the House"? This being denominated the House is the assembly under the Constitution of those members who have been chosen; and so, during the war of the rebellion, it was decided that a quorum was constituted of a majority of the members chosen in the loyal States; and, as to those States that were entitled to membership but did not choose members, their membership was not to be counted in constituting a quorum. So, then, a quorum is a majority of the members chosen. Now, how is that majority to be ascertained? How is the Speaker to ascertain whether a majority is present or not? The only way we can perceive a physical fact is by the senses—ordinarily by the sight or by the hearing.

Let us look at this thing from a common-sense standpoint—not from any standpoint of hypercriticism, not from any standpoint of a purpose "how not to do it," but from a standpoint of common reason and common sense, aided by a broad patriotism. How does the Speaker ascertain whether a majority is here present or not? By the sight or by the sound. Now, is it any better test of a man's presence to hear his voice than it is to see his person? We are told that "hearing is knowing, but seeing is the very truth." So the Speaker can ascertain whether a quorum is present or not either by sight or by sound, or by both concurring, if there be a concurrence.

Further, Mr. Speaker, the Constitution says that "a smaller number" than a quorum may "compel the attendance of absent members." Suppose every member chosen in this House is present and yet only one member votes, and the question of quorum or no quorum is raised. In the case I am supposing there are no absent members whose attendance is to be compelled; all the members are here in their seats. It is said that there ought to be a rule compelling men to vote, and that under the rule now proposed a few men may pass a law. Why, sir, it is the experience of every man who has ever served in a deliberative assembly, who has ever been a member of a State legislature, or who has served in this body during even the present session, that a very large proportion of all the bills and resolutions passed are passed by a comparatively few votes. And since I have been here at this session of Congress there have been no less than two resolutions passed without a solitary human being voting either one way or the other. That is common experience.

A majority of those voting is sufficient to pass any measure, if a quorum is actually present, even though a majority of the quorum do not vote. Those who are present are presumed to acquiesce in what is done. "Silence gives consent." That is a maxim as old as the English language, and it has its counterpart in the language of every civilized nation under the sun. It expresses the common and universal judgment of mankind. It is a maxim practiced upon every day in the courts that when a man keeps silent when it is his duty to speak he shall not be allowed to speak when it is his duty to keep silent. That is known as the doctrine of estoppel, and members here who fail to vote on a given measure when a quorum is actually present are estopped in law from contending that that measure has not received the approbation of a constitutional majority, when, in fact, it has received a majority of those actually voting. In such a case the majority of those voting is all sufficient.

Mr. Speaker, constitutions grow. I know that there was an old construction of the Constitution and an old construction of parliamentary law under which it was held that a member of this House was to be regarded as absent if he did not vote, even when he was present in fact. But "old things have passed away and all things have become new." The Constitution which was established for 6,000,000 people is not the Constitution for 70,000,000 people. The Constitution which was invoked by George Washington to put down a rebellion in a part of a State is not the Constitution which was invoked by Abraham Lincoln to put down a rebellion in eleven whole States and in parts of three other States. Constitutions are evolved; they expand; they grow to suit the times. Whenever we have a Constitution that becomes as cast iron and will not expand to suit the expansiveness of our national growth and the development of our jurisprudence, then there will come a time when it will be necessary either to reorganize our form of government or to break the Constitution itself.

The American people have now got to the time when the presence of a member in his seat is to be noted and he is to be deemed as constituting one of the quorum to do business in the American House of Representatives. And the other branch of the Congress of the United States will be compelled by the American people to subordinate their views to this doctrine. So that it may be laid down as a part of the permanent policy of the American Congress, in both of its branches, that the Speaker can use both his sight and his hearing in determining whether a quorum is present or not.

If "those voting on the question, and those who are present and decline to vote, shall, together, make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted." That is the language of the proposed rule. The only objection I have to it is the use of the word "constituted." He should declare that a quorum of the House is present. When a man is in his seat he is here, and, as has been well said by the venerable Representative from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW], there is no power under heaven to compel a man to vote. There ought not to be any such power; but a man who sits silent in his seat is deemed by all the experience of the past and by common consent of mankind as agreeing to what is being done. He does not dissent; therefore he gives his acquiescence. Those who were silent when they should have objected shall not be allowed to object when the act of which they complain is brought in question.

So I am of opinion that this rule is not only in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution itself, but that this construction of the Constitution by the Fifty-first Congress has been indorsed by the American people themselves.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, the pending proposition has received such very elaborate debate and consideration during the time it has been before the House that I have no inclination or desire to detain this body at any great length.

Prior to the Fifty-first Congress there were three potent methods of filibustering in this body. The first was by dilatory motions, the second was by a silent or nonvoting quorum, and the third was by what has been called the "vanishing" quorum. In the Fiftieth Congress—those gentlemen present who were members of that body will no doubt recall the fact and will sustain me in my recollection—we spent some seven or eight days, without an adjournment, as a result of repeated dilatory motions, such as the motion to take a recess, to adjourn to a certain day, to adjourn, and other motions of that character that were then admissible under the rule. That practice was made an end to in the Fifty-first Congress by the adoption of a rule which prevented the Speaker from entertaining dilatory motions, and the adoption of that rule has practically done away with that species of filibustering from that time to the present.

With respect to the second method of filibustering, where gentlemen sat in their seats and refused to be recorded, that practice has been abolished by the method introduced by the Speaker of this House, who was also the Speaker of that House, of counting a quorum; a method that has been sustained by the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States. But there still remains a method of filibustering unprovided for, that is to say, by members again retiring from the hall after having been brought in on a call of the House and answering to their names, so that when a quorum has been had and further proceedings under the call of the House been dispensed with, a quorum is again wanting. To illustrate, a proposition is pending on which the yeas and nays are being taken. It is ascertained that no quorum is present. A call of the House is ordered. The Sergeant-at-Arms brings in members from time to time who answer to their names, and it is then ascertained by the report of the Clerk that a quorum is present. A motion is then made to dispense with further proceedings under the call, and the House returns to the consideration of the business that it had in hand when the call was ordered, which was the calling of the yeas and nays. It then again appears that no quorum is present. Those gentlemen who were brought in, but who are unfavorable to the legislation pending, have exercised their privilege and have again gone from the House.

The purpose of the pending rule is to meet that emergency. Under the pending rule when there is a call of the House there is also a yea-and-nay vote pending, and as members are brought in and recorded as present they are offered an opportunity to vote, with the result that all present are recorded, and when those members who voted and those members who refused to vote are counted, legal action is had upon the pending measure, and the Journal shows that that action has been had in a legally constituted House, a quorum being present.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to this circumstance in connection with the proposed rule. There is no necessity, so far as this side of the Chamber is concerned, to insist upon the adoption of this rule, because our large majority renders it almost impossible that any contingency should arise when the rule would become necessary. It is because of that very fact, and because under the circumstances our motives could not be impugned, that the Committee on Rules thought that it was desirable now to introduce into the body of rules a rule which would round out the system, and would do away for all time with the possibility of filibustering in this House and with the wasting in this manner of the public time.

Now, against the adoption of this rule it is claimed that the law is that a voting majority of a quorum is necessary to pass a law, and that this rule therefore infringes the law, because it proposes that a majority merely of those voting shall pass a bill. Now, if I should concede—as I do not—that the question as to existing law upon the subject of a voting majority of a quorum had anything at all to do with the question now before the House, I should still say that, so far as there are any decisions at all, they are against the propositions asserted by our friends upon the other side. I call attention particularly to two cases. The first is a case reported in 34 Minnesota, the case of the State of Minnesota ex rel.

John Martin and others vs. Samuel H. Chute and others, in which this proposition is laid down by the court:

At a valid stockholders' meeting, the charter and by-laws being silent on the subject, a majority of the votes cast, though but a minority of the stock represented, prevails. Those having an opportunity to vote and not voting are held to acquiesce in the votes actually cast.

The court, in its opinion, says:

At a valid meeting of stockholders, if no contrary rule is established by the charter or by-laws, a majority of those voting prevails. Those who have an opportunity to vote and refrain, though they have a majority of the stock, must be held to acquiesce in the result of the votes actually cast. A stockholder not voting can not get relief from the courts if he voluntarily refrained from voting if he had an opportunity and his claim of right to vote was not excluded.

This is one positive decision upon a proposition, corresponding exactly with and in all respects analogous to the proposition now before the House.

Conceding, as I do not, that the question before the House is as to existing law with respect to counting the majority of a quorum, the other case to which I desire to call attention is a case that was cited by my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] and which he will pardon me for saying does not seem to me to sustain his contention. That is the case of the State ex rel. William M. Shinnich, jr., vs. John A. Green, reported in 37 Ohio State Reports. The gentleman, if he had examined that case carefully, would have found that it only decided that a majority of those present is not necessary. It does not decide that a majority of a quorum should vote.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will examine the case he will find that 10 was a quorum, and that the clerk received a majority of that number.

Mr. DALZELL. I will read from the case what my friend did not read. In the opinion of the court I find the following:

The body was duly constituted to hold an election of clerk; only one candidate was before it for the votes of members; no question entitled to precedence was before the body; the election was being held, and those declining to vote must be deemed to acquiesce in the choice of those who do, though protesting against the mode of voting, the decision of the mayor being that there was a quorum and that the relator was elected. This is the settled rule of the common law as to elections in corporate bodies. Willcock on Corporations, section 546, says: "After an election has been properly proposed whoever has a majority of those who vote, the assembly being sufficient, is elected, although a majority of the entire assembly altogether abstain from voting, because their presence suffices to constitute the elective body, and if they neglect to vote it is their own fault and shall not invalidate the act of the others, but be construed an assent to the determination of the majority of those who do vote. And such an election is valid, though the majority of those whose presence is necessary to the assembly protest against any election at that time or even the election of the individual who has the majority of votes."

I contend, therefore ——

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not intend to intimate that I intended to mislead the House?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly not.

Mr. BAILEY. In that case 10 was a quorum and the clerk received 9 votes, which was a clear majority of a quorum.

Mr. DALZELL. I understand; but the point I make is that the report of the case does not show how many voted.

Mr. BAILEY. It does.

Mr. DALZELL. I have not so found it. But we will pass that. So far, then, as the decisions are concerned, it certainly can not be contended that the law has been decided to be that there must be a majority of a quorum voting in favor of a measure to make that measure law.

But I submit to the House that the question as to what the law is with respect to the number that is necessary to pass the measure is not the question that is now before this House at all.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, on the point between us a moment ago. I have examined the case in 37 Ohio, and it does show the number present and the number voting.

Mr. DALZELL. I will look at the case further, but I believe, from my examination of it, that my statement is correct; and as I read it the case decides that a majority of those present is not necessary, but it does not show that a majority of a quorum did vote.

Now, leaving all that I come back to the proposition that I advanced a moment ago. The question before this House is not what is the existing law in respect to the vote necessary to pass a law, but the question is with respect to the power of this House to pass this rule—to make a law for itself; and the only question involved, the question involved here, is precisely the same question that was involved in the Ballin case, which was passed upon by the Supreme Court, and with which we are all familiar.

The Constitution of the United States says:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business.

But the Constitution of the United States also says, in the same section:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members, etc.

There is, then, this constitutional provision with respect to the existence of the kind of a House competent to do business. Now, then, there is a constitutional provision that clothes this House with power, that clothes it with exclusive and unlimited power to make rules for the conduct of its proceedings, and so the Supreme Court of the United States substantially settled in its decision in the Ballin case.

Now, let me call your attention to that case. The question involved there, as you will recollect, was the validity of a rule that authorized the Speaker to count present and nonvoting members, and record them as present upon the Journal. The Supreme Court of the United States, in passing upon that question, said this:

The action was taken in direct compliance with this rule. The question, therefore, is as to the validity of this rule, and not what methods the Speaker may of his own motion resort to for determining the presence of a quorum, nor what matters the Speaker or Clerk may of their own volition place upon the Journal. Neither do the advantages or disadvantages, the wisdom or folly of such a rule present any matters for judicial consideration. With the courts the question is only one of power. The Constitution empowers each House to determine its rules of proceedings. It may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints or violate fundamental rights, and there should be a reasonable relation between the mode or method of proceeding established by the rule and the result which is sought to be attained.

The House will observe that the result sought to be attained by the pending rule is precisely the result sought to be attained in the rule that was in question in the case cited.

But within these limitations all matters of method are open to the determination of the House, and it is no impeachment of the rule to say that some other way would be better, more accurate, or even more just. It is no objection to the validity of a rule that a different one has been prescribed and in force for a length of time. The power to make rules is not one which once exercised is exhausted. It is a continuous power, always subject to be exercised by the House and within the limitations suggested, absolute and beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal.

If, then, it be true that all that is demanded of this House by the Constitution in order to pass a valid law is that there shall be a quorum present, and if beyond that there is no limit to the power of the House, except that no constitutional provision shall be violated, to make rules for its own proceedings, there is in this decision not only nothing to stand in the way of making this rule, but a judicial sanction of the power to make it. It matters not how many cases my friend may cite holding that a majority of a quorum is sufficient to pass a law. There is no necessity for resorting to judicial decisions to support that proposition. The question to which he should have directed his attention is whether there is any authority which holds that less than a quorum under the conditions proposed is not sufficient to pass a law.

Now, let us recur again to this Ballin case. The method of filibustering prior to the institution of the rule to count a quorum was for a sufficient number of gentlemen in this House to remain silent in order to break a quorum. It is now proposed, because that is the logical result of the doctrine of my friends on the other side—it is now proposed to provide a method to continue the system of filibustering by the very easy device of having a sufficient number of members remain silent not only to break a quorum, but also to prevent a majority vote of a quorum upon any pending measure. Therefore, if that proposition be correct, it must be affirmed that it is not in the power of this House to adopt a rule that shall compel members to act in accordance with their duty, in accordance with what must be held to be their duty, according to the decision in that case.

Now, what did that case decide? It decided that what the Constitution required was a present and not a voting quorum. It decided further that the presence of that quorum might be ascertained in any way that the House might fix by rule. But I want you to observe that it went further than that, it decided impliedly that it was not possible to prevent legislation by nonaction, because the real question involved in that case, although on the surface it was a question of the validity of a rule and of a method of count—the real question, the underlying question, involved was whether it was possible by nonaction to prevent legislation, and the court evidently had that in mind when it used the language which I shall now read to the House. In its opinion in the Ballin case the Supreme Court cites the case of Attorney-General vs. Shepherd, 62 New Hampshire, 383:

There the question was whether an amendment to a city charter had been properly adopted by the board of aldermen. All the members of the board were present but one. The ordinance was duly read and put to a vote and declared by the chair to be passed. The yeas and nays were then called. Three voted in the affirmative, three refused to vote, and the chair declared the ordinance passed. The court held, Chief Justice Doe delivering the opinion, that the amendment to the charter was legally adopted by the board of aldermen. He said—

And this is what I desire to call special attention to—

The exercise of the lawmaking power is not stopped by the mere silence and inaction of some of the lawmakers who are present. An arbitrary, technical, and exclusive method of ascertaining whether a quorum is present, operating to prevent the performance of official duty and obstruct the business of government, is no part of our common law.

Mr. BAILEY. Has the gentleman read that case himself—the New Hampshire case?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the gentleman will remember that the court expressly says that 4 is a quorum of the body and that 3 is a majority of that quorum.

Mr. DALZELL. I am not addressing myself to that question now. I am addressing myself to the proposition that there was impliedly decided in this case—necessarily so because of its facts—the proposition that nonaction in a legislative body is ineffectual to prevent that body from performing its lawful functions, and that it is within the power of the body to make a rule to render such inaction fruitless.

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to say further to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he misjudges my object. He remarked a moment ago that we on this side were proposing to continue filibustering. I am not. I will vote for the rule if it is amended as I have suggested.

Mr. DALZELL. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I impute no such motive to the gentleman. I was simply trying to point out the logical consequences of the position taken by him. I acquit my friend from Texas of that imputation, and of everything but a desire to do his duty, as I believe he does, according to his conscience, to the fullest extent on all occasions in this House.

Now, one word more by way of summing up, and I conclude. The only questions before the House are two: First, as to the power of the House to make this rule, and second, as to the expediency of making the rule. As to the first question, I think I have demonstrated that there is an absolute and unqualified power in the House to adopt the rule. As to the question of expediency, I can only appeal, and I think I can appeal with confidence, to gentlemen who were members of this House in the days when filibustering prevailed, before the introduction of the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, which rules were adopted in order that the House might do business in preference to the rules of preceding Congresses, which at times had the effect, whether adopted for that purpose or not, of preventing the House from doing business. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I will now ask for the previous question on the pending amendment reported from the committee, and the amendment to it which has been offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question upon the section and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. MILES. Before the question is put, Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the word "a" in my amendment stricken out and the word "the" substituted, so that it will read "the quorum."

Mr. BAILEY. If that is adopted I will not offer my amendment, because the one offered by the gentleman from Maryland seems to cover the ground.

The amendment proposed by Mr. MILES in the amendment offered by him was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MILES as amended, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MILES. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 120; so the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the adoption of the pending clause.

The question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer——

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman will allow me a moment. The impression seems to have obtained among some gentlemen that all these amendments would have to be gone over again. In my view the action taken the last time when these rules were up and the action to-day disposes of all these amendments. As I stated in my opening remarks, the rules of the Fifty-first Congress were adopted early in the session; and there was no further action needed except upon the amendments—that is, upon new matter which might be brought up.

Mr. CRISP. I suppose not, after the vote on the substitute. I propose merely to offer as a substitute for these rules the rules of the Fifty-third Congress. Without reading them, I move to substitute the rules of the Fifty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves that the rules of the Fifty-third Congress be substituted for the rules agreed to by this House.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Before that motion is admitted, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] will withdraw his proposition for a moment, I would like to offer an amendment to Rule XXXII, which I believe is not included in the report of the Committee on Rules. I ask to have the proposed amendment read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts offers as an amendment to the rules the proposition which will be read.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Before the amendment is read I wish to say that this proposition becomes necessary because of the prejudice that exists in the mind of the present Speaker [Mr. REED], and which also existed in the mind of the Speaker who preceded him [Mr. CRISP]—a prejudice which prevents the appointment of new members as chairmen of committees. In view of this practice, which has always been followed from the beginning, of appointing old members to such positions, it seems to me there should be a little change in the rule as to the choosing of seats.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of Rule XXXII and insert the following:

"DRAWING OF SEATS.

"1. At the commencement of each Congress, immediately after the Members and Delegates are sworn in, the Clerk shall number the names on the roll of the House in order. He shall divide the names on the roll into classes, according to the number of times each person has been elected to the House. Each class shall include all the names of those who have been elected the same number of times. The drawing of numbers and the choosing of seats shall be by classes. The class composed of those persons who have been elected the largest number of times shall first choose their seats. The class composed of those who have been elected for the next highest number of times shall then choose their seats, and so on until all the remaining classes of members have chosen seats in the order of length of service in the House. The Clerk shall place in a box, prepared for that purpose, a number of small balls of marble or other material equal to the number of Members and Delegates in that class that is then to choose seats, which balls shall have on them the numbers corresponding to the numbers on the roll opposite the names of the persons who make up that class. The balls shall be thoroughly intermingled, and at such hour as shall be fixed by the House for that purpose, by the hands of a page, said balls shall be drawn one by one from the box. The Clerk shall announce the number as it is drawn, upon which announcement the Member or Delegate whose name on the numbered alphabetical list shall correspond with the number on the ball shall advance and choose his seat for the term for which he is elected.

"2. Before said drawing shall commence each seat shall be vacated and so remain until selected under this rule, and any seat having been selected shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll is finished, and whenever the seats of Members and Delegates shall have been drawn, no proposition for a second drawing shall be in order during that Congress."

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the effect of this proposed rule is obvious to the House. Of course our present Speaker is the most unprejudiced and fair-minded man that was ever chosen to the position he occupies, unless I except the preceding Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia, who occupied the chair in the last Congress. [Laughter.] And for the purposes of this case, as the lawyers say, I would be willing to say that these two gentlemen are the most unprejudiced, fair-minded men who have ever been elected by the House to the Speaker's chair. Yet both these gentlemen have failed to see that members elected here to supplant old members must be far superior to those old members; else they would not have been chosen in place of them, in spite of all the advantages which the sitting member has for retaining his position. Yet these prejudices are so keen and all pervading in the minds of Speakers of the House that new members have great difficulty in securing chairmanships of committees.

The practice of appointing old members to such positions having become so embedded in the customs of the House, it becomes necessary that these older members should have the preference in choosing their seats, in order that the business of the House may be properly conducted; that the discharge of their duties may be facilitated by the conspicuous places which they will thus be enabled to occupy on the floor; that all the members of the House may have knowledge of what is going on. It seems a little singular, for instance, that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], or the gentleman from New York [Mr. DANIELS], who are in charge of some of the most important business of the House and whose voices seem to be in inverse ratio to their information and ability, which is not the case with all of us, as gentlemen well know [laughter], should have drawn seats on the extreme wings of the House, positions from which we could not hear them. The Speaker needs the assistance of such gentlemen in conducting properly and expeditiously the business of the House; and it is important that they should occupy on the floor places from which we can all hear them.

Now, this proposed rule simply divides the members into classes. Those members who have been reelected the greatest number of times will have the first choice; then those who rank next as to the number of times they have been elected will make their selections, and so on. I would not suggest for a moment that we who may be here in the next Congress will then be old members and that those who may then come in for the first time will be new members and not fare as well. I so fully appreciate the fairness of this House that I would not for a moment ask it to adopt any such rule for any selfish motive; I have too much respect for those who will be the incoming members in the next Congress. This proposed rule does not affect the present Congress. It is proposed wholly because of the prejudice existing in the minds of that class of gentlemen who are always elected to the office of Speaker and who insist upon selecting as chairmen of committees members who have served here many years. For this reason I think we need a change in the rule for seating members; and I feel confident that no member present will vote against this proposition, although it may seem to be in favor of us who will be old members in the next Congress if we succeed in getting back and may seem, and it is only in the seeming, to operate to the prejudice of the newer members.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not make it apply to this session?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No; I do not think any such proposition as that would be unanimously agreed to.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and especially on the grounds of self-interest. I am, as you all know, a new member, and in drawing seats it happened that the gentleman from Massachusetts himself drew a seat immediately opposite to mine, in what is known as the "Cherokee Strip." Now, I do not want him to get any advantage of me and have a seat over on this side of the House, because by so doing I would miss those continual rehearsals of speeches on banking and currency and thus lose much valuable information. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, would an amendment to the amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to move to amend the amendment by providing that in arranging these classes the gentleman from Massachusetts be included in neither one of them. [Laughter.] We all know he is entirely sui generis, and I would not have him classed, by the mere accident of election, with the other members. With that amendment, I have no objection to his proposition. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move a substitute for the proposition; and that is, in selecting the seats, that the members be called in their alphabetical order. [Laughter.]

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I second that motion.

Mr. MILLER of Kansas. That is a favor I would extend to the gentleman from Massachusetts, a special favor. [Laughter.]

I would also retain the "Cherokee Strip." I think that should not be abolished; so that we can keep him perpetually there. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer, as a substitute for the rules adopted, the rules of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Georgia means the rules of the Fifty-third Congress as originally adopted or the rules of that Congress after they had substituted the rules of the Fifty-first Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I have been faithfully present, as I always try to be when constitutional debate is on in this body. I always like these constitutional discussions. It is a great luxury, to those of us who are not recognized as "constitutional authorities," to hear distinguished representatives of that branch of jurisprudence certify to one another's skill and judgment as doctors of the law. [Laughter.] But as a very humble survivor of the Democratic riots of 1890 on this floor [laughter], I have felt it would not be entirely out of place to avail myself of the opportunity to utter a word of congratulation, not especially directed to my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], but a word of congratulation to all sides of the House, that after the prejudices of a political and constitutional character of six years have passed away we have finally come to the orderly reign of common sense in the management of this House. [Laughter.]

If anybody had predicted six years ago that, by general consent, in 1896, the despised and rejected principles embodied in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress would be offered for indorsement here on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, he would have been discredited as the author of a most improbable fiction. [Laughter and applause.] And yet to-day not only by what has been done, but by what has been said, that very thing came to pass before our eyes; and in my judgment it presents a situation of more than transitory interest, for it shows that even the Democratic party can recognize a good thing when it sees it for a sufficient length of time. [Laughter and applause.]

While the virtues that grow out of necessity are not very high in the scale of moral beauty, they are nevertheless virtues, and are entitled to be recognized as such, and to command respect to that extent. The present attitude of my friend from Georgia and his colleagues on this floor make their conduct in the Fifty-first Congress appear like the noise of bedlam; and the noise of bedlam it veritably was. [Laughter.] For bedlam itself was outdone in that notorious madhouse of 1890, when the whole Democratic party were railing against our benign and amiable "Czar," now everywhere accepted as the reformer of old, absurd, and worthless parliamentary usages. [Applause.] We on this side have never expected the Democratic party to make any apology, either to us or to the American people, for their behavior in the early winter of 1890. In fact, no apology was adequate for the offenses that were committed against the offices and dignities of this House. The only possible apology has been made. And while it comes to us whimpering and complaining, under the lash of necessity, nevertheless we ought to accept it at its true value.

The reform has come up slowly, through great trials and tribulations. Its progress has seen the invention of more morbid species of parliamentary law than were ever before witnessed outside of a village debating society. In the last Congress we saw the exaltation of the Committee on Rules, to which my friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] adverted the other day, an exaltation that actually beat the Clerk out of his right to read the Journal of this House, that refused to entertain an appeal from the judgment of the Chair, that declined to hear a point of order, that silenced a question of privilege involving the dignity and the rights of the House itself, and, in my judgment, if the political exigency had arisen, would have driven the Chaplain of this House from his sacred office and substituted a report of that committee for the daily invocation of the Divine mercy, never so much needed in this country as during that Congress. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Nevertheless, all that was said and all that was done was not enough to save the Fifty-third Congress from the derision of mankind. I think I intrepret the feelings of both sides of this House, taking into consideration what has been said here, and what the Democratic managers are about to vote for now, when I say that these proceedings will be recalled in the future by the student and the antiquarian only as interesting reminiscences of the memorable session of 1890, when this and all kindred questions were settled by new precedents, for all time to come, by the historic leadership of THOMAS B. REED. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I had been content, in view of the majority of 150 on that side, to permit these rules to be adopted without any special resistance here, because resistance was useless, the determination on that side was fixed and we felt that we could as well enter our protest by simply voting against the rules. But my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], always anxious to score a point, as he thinks, against the Democratic party, has submitted remarks which have been applauded on that side of the House, and which remarks are wholly and entirely unjustified by anything that has gone before. Under these circumstances a few words are necessary.

There is great misconception, even in the minds of some members of the House, it seems, as to what were the rules of the Fifty-first Congress and what has taken place since in respect thereto. The body of the rules which have just been adopted have been the rules of this House, Mr. Speaker, for more than fifty years. The radical changes made in the Fifty-first Congress were two in number; first, the ascertainment of a quorum outside of the responses to the roll call, and second, the incorporation in the rules of a provision that the Speaker should not recognize a dilatory motion. Now, the great controversy and contest to which my friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] refers did not arise upon the rules of the House. It arose upon what we then considered, and what I may be pardoned for saying I still consider, a usurpation of power on the part of the Speaker of the House. There was no rule authorizing the Speaker of the House to count a quorum.

There has never been any authority of any court that has justified the action of that Speaker of the House in counting a quorum. This great difficulty, or contest, or struggle to which my friend from Iowa refers occurred in this wise: That Congress met on the first Monday in December, and proceeded without any rules until the 29th day of January. At that time there was presented for the consideration of the House a contested-election case. When it was called up I had the honor myself to raise upon it the question of consideration; that is, Shall the House now proceed to consider the case? The yeas and nays were ordered. A vote was taken. It appeared from the responses of the members that no quorum had responded to their names when called by the Clerk. Whereupon the Speaker, without any authority from the House, without any authority from parliamentary law, without any authority from any source, except his own arbitrary desire and purpose so to do, noted gentlemen who were present in the House, and announced from the chair that he noted so many members as present, who, in addition to those who had answered to the roll call, made a quorum, whereupon I respectfully entered an appeal from that decision, and that matter was debated for three days.

Upon the consideration of that question it was shown that disguished men of the country, for years and years prior to that time, had discussed this question in the House. The Speaker himself had been one the distinguished men who had participated in that discussion, and it was shown that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], at a time when he was not Speaker, from his place upon the floor of the House, protested against a construction which afterwards, as Speaker, with no authority from the House, he put upon the rules. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Thus were overturned the practices of the House of Representatives by action which we then characterized as revolutionary, and which I now characterize as revolutionary. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will my friend permit me?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand him to say this occurred before the rules were adopted?

Mr. CRISP. It did.

Mr. DOLLIVER. How does my friend account for the fact that the entire Democratic party fled from this Chamber in September following, when the contested-election case of Miller vs. Elliott was under debate, long after those rules and methods of conducting business had been established?

Mr. CRISP. Oh, Mr. Speaker, we are discussing now a rule of the House, and not the action of any members of it.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I alluded to the violation of the rule of the House by the whole Democratic party.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, well, that does not at all affect the question. The gentleman from Iowa arose here when we were proceeding as peaceably and calmly as on a summer sea, and stated that this side of the House was now accepting without protest a rule which in the Fifty-first Congress we condemned or fought vigorously, and I am simply explaining to him that he has taken counsel rather of his partisanship than of his fairness and justice, that he is commenting upon a condition of affairs that does not exist.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the radical changes that were made in the Fifty-first Congress were as I have said. After the Speaker had made this ruling, there was a report from the Committee on Rules, and his ruling was put substantially into the form of one of the rules of the House. Now, it is pretty well known to many of those who were here at the time that that rule of the House never would have been adopted but for the condition in which the occupant of the chair placed his own side of the House by his unauthorized ruling. We on this side learned from the newspapers—they are generally pretty accurate chroniclers of what takes place—we learned from the newspapers that the Republicans had caucuses on the rules; that they were endeavoring to make a rule providing for the counting of a quorum, and yet we know that there was in fact no action by the caucus up to that time. We would see the statement in the newspaper that "Mr. So and So"—I might name them if it were proper to do so—and "Mr. So and So" and "Mr. So and So" were resisting the proposition to provide for counting a quorum outside the roll call when the yeas and nays were ordered. And from day to day that condition existed. Then, when this struggle arose the Speaker made the decision to which I have referred. An appeal was taken from his decision, and that side of the House was put in the position that it must either indorse the action of the Speaker upon what was considered a partisan question or they must vote against him and thus leave him discredited in the house of his friends. That side did as has almost uniformly been done in the House of Representatives—they sustained the Speaker in his ruling, and by so sustaining him they committed themselves to the rule which was afterwards made.

Now, the Fifty-first Congress adopted two new rules—that is, the present method of ascertaining the presence of a quorum, and that the Speaker should not entertain dilatory motions. This side contended that the first proposition was unconstitutional; that it was illegal. The question had never been before the courts. Upon this rule a case was made. It went to the courts, and the decision has been read and referred to to-day. The court held that it was competent for the House to make rules for its own government under the Constitution. The court never held that it was competent for the Speaker to make rules. The court never held that the Speaker had a right to ascertain a quorum outside of the rules which were made for his government by the House. The court never held that the Speaker was the master of the House. But they held that he was simply the organ, the servant, of the House, who executes its will as expressed in its rules. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me, right on that point, inasmuch as this subject has been introduced? The gentleman has stated that the Speaker made a certain ruling in thus counting a quorum before the rules of the House had been adopted. Was it not true that an appeal was taken from that and that the House on that appeal sustained the decision of the Speaker, thus pro tanto from that time making it a rule of the House?

Mr. CRISP. Why, I have just stated, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen on that side of the House, many of them, I have no doubt, were forced against their wills to sustain the decision of the Speaker. [Cries of "Oh, no!" on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. CRISP. I am assuming that gentlemen on that side exercise some will of their own independently of that which may be determined for them.

Mr. BOUTELLE. They generally express it by their votes, which is the reasonable way to express it.

Mr. CRISP. I am not assuming that the gentleman from Maine will be courteous, because I have never known him to be so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That is about as correct as the gentleman's assumptions generally are.

Mr. CRISP. Now, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen may as well be quiet. This proposition was suggested entirely from that side. There was no disposition on this side to recur to this incident, but my friend from Iowa could not resist the opportunity to make a speech. Now, I have no objection to his speeches; they are generally good and sometimes witty, but they ought to be always founded on fact, and when not so I respectfully take the liberty to correct him.

A rule was made and the highest court in the land decided that a quorum might be ascertained in the way provided by the rule of the Fifty-first Congress, as made by the House, not by the Speaker. In the Fifty-second Congress we did not incorporate in our rules any provision with reference to counting a quorum other than the rule which had always prevailed. The Fifty-third Congress met and still we adhered to the old rule. We were met with obstructive tactics. Day after day, on that side of the House, on the most insignificant matters, on the approval of the Journal, on the reference of a bill, and such matters, we encountered those tactics. Day after day the distinguished leader of the minority made the point of "no quorum," so that we could not even approve the Journal of our proceedings, owing to the dilatory tactics of that side of the House, led by the distinguished gentleman from Maine, who had formerly so vigorously denounced filibustering.

Day after day these tactics were resorted to, so that the House could not proceed to dispatch the public business. In that condition of affairs what did this side of the House do? They looked to the decision of the Supreme Court. They recognized that court as the highest tribunal in the land. If that court decided to be constitutional a proposition which we had previously considered unconstitutional; if, in other words, the question of constitutionality was removed, then the question of expediency arose in that particular case. Upon that question we decided—at least a majority of us did, for even to that proposition some members on this side did not agree—we decided that as we could constitutionally ascertain the presence of a quorum, we would incorporate into our rules a provision for so doing; but not the provision in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress.

The rules of that Congress provided that the Clerk or the Speaker—I believe a clerk under the direction of the Speaker—might count a sufficient number of members present and not voting who, added to those voting, would make a quorum, and, Mr. Speaker, very much of the complaint, very much of the discord, very much of the discontent and dissatisfaction that arose from the operation of the rule in the Fifty-first Congress was caused by the manner and method of its execution. Gentlemen were counted as present in this Hall who were really in the cloakroom. There was a question as to when a member's presence should be ascertained, whether it should be when the roll call began or when his name was reached. There were several cases (all of which are referred to in various places in the RECORD) where gentlemen were counted as present although they were down town. I recollect one case where a member was perhaps in Ohio at the time he was entered as present in this Hall.

The great complaint was that that rule was not executed in fairness and justice. In the Fifty-third Congress we decided to make a rule to ascertain a quorum, and in doing it we sought to avoid the difficulties that had arisen under the rule of the Fifty-first Congress, so we provided that where the yeas and nays were ordered the Speaker should appoint a member of the majority and a member of the minority, and they should take their places at the Clerk's desk, and should together note the gentlemen who were present and not voting. Those two members, one representing the majority and the other the minority, had to concur as to the presence of Brown or Jones or Smith before he could be noted as present and not voting. Under that system no man could be counted in Ohio, no man could be counted who was really down Pennsylvania avenue at the time, because the rule required the concurrence of two minds, that of a Republican and that of a Democratic member. That was the rule adopted by the Fifty-third Congress, and therein was the radical difference between that rule and the rule of the Fifty-first Congress.

Why, Mr. Speaker, when we meet here before we have an organization and when the Clerk of the preceding House calls the roll in order that we may proceed to the election of a Speaker, what does he do? Does he appoint a clerk to count? Not at all. He appoints two members, one from the majority and one from the minority, to take their seats at that desk to ascertain the presence of members and report the result. The rule of the Fifty-first Congress left it to a clerk—not the Clerk of the House, mind you, but a subordinate clerk at that desk, who was naturally and necessarily a partisan of the power that put him there—left it to that clerk to decide whether or not I was in my seat when the roll was called. The plan adopted by this side of the House was that no man should be noted as present if he had not voted unless one Democratic and one Republican member concurred in certifying the fact that he was present.

The Fifty-third Congress never adopted that provision of the rule of the Fifty-first Congress relating to dilatory motions. My friend from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has criticised—and I believe that is the only provision in the rules of the Fifty-third Congress he has criticised—the power given to the Committee on Rules in that Congress. And he speaks of their coming in with their reports before the reading of the Journal and at other times when, in his judgment, it was improper to do so. That provision of the rules of the Fifty-third Congress excites his animadversion. Now, Mr. Speaker, it may be a surprise to that gentleman—it will not be to the Speaker, but it will be to my friend from Iowa—to know that that odious, that objectionable, that miserable rule of the Fifty-third Congress to which he has especially referred has been copied, word for word, in the rules just adopted, with the concurrence of the gentleman himself, as the rules of the Fifty-fourth Congress. The Republican majority have copied that rule from the rules of the Fifty-third Congress; and the gentleman from Iowa in his ignorance [laughter] has voted for that rule, and then in his earnestness and eloquence he gets up here and denounces it. [Laughter.] That is merely a suggestion to my friend that before he makes a speech again he ought to know a little more of the subject on which he proposes to talk. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, there are other provisions in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, some of which I approve, some of which I disapprove; but the radical differences I have pointed out. Now, I merely want to say, in conclusion, that this side of the House is not, in my judgment, amenable to criticism, certainly not to the ridicule which my friend from Iowa seeks to heap upon us. We avoid no responsibility; we seek to avoid none. We see, ourselves, a broad and clear distinction between the rules of the Fifty-third Congress and those of the Fifty-first. We believe any man who will examine the two systems of rules will recognize these distinctive differences; and so believing we are entirely content with the record. I was content to let the record be made up without a word of debate on the subject; but inasmuch as my friend had sought to heap some ridicule on this side, and to make some cheap capital for the other side, I thought it well enough to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that this is simply one more of the efforts so numerous now to make political capital on false pretenses. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend when I took the floor a moment ago to say anything that should disturb the serenity of the temper and good will of my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. CRISP]. I think there is nobody on this floor who takes a more philosophical view of the experiences through which we have passed than I do, unless it be my friend from Georgia. I recognize the fact that nearly everything which happened in 1890 happened in an atmosphere hot with political and partisan contention; and I apprehend I ought not to leave the impression that I have sought to rekindle any of the malice that belonged to that year and the succeeding years.

I recognize the fact that both parties have grown out of the size of that controversy. I recognize the fact that both parties are now above the noise of that debate. And it was for the purpose of making a cheerful reference to our experience and our growth that I took the floor a few moments ago. [Laughter.] I rejoice that the leaders of the Democratic party have seen many of the errors of their way, or if not the errors at least the difficulties of their way. I do not dispute the fact that they have made a good fight; and I will say that they have made a fight to which we who are used to political encounters do not at this time of partisan calm and repose make special objection. We all appreciate the fact that these debates about the rules are now quieted by a common agreement; and I am glad for one to testify that the Democratic leaders of this House have, in a spirit of fairness and equity, entered upon the discharge of the solemn responsibilities that are before us. And if I said a word calculated to hurt the feelings of my friend or to stir up evil memories of the blunders of the past, I regret that I should have been led into that line of discussion. I attribute it altogether to the nervous irritation occasioned by spending an afternoon with the Constitution. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House but a moment. I believe there was just one authenticated case in the Fifty-first Congress of a gentleman being recorded as present when he was absent, only one well-authenticated case, and in that instance the mistake was not made by the gentleman who is now the Speaker of the House, but by a member who was called to the chair by the Speaker [Mr. REED]. So that it may be said there is not a single well-authenticated case of an error being made by the Speaker with reference to a roll call in the Fifty-first Congress, when those present and not voting were noted by the Clerk. But in the Fifty-third Congress, over which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] presided, there were at least a dozen errors—errors where a quorum had erroneously been made to appear by counting as present gentlemen who were not present, and by two members of the House as tellers—and that quorum was subsequently made good by gentlemen saying that they had been present and voted, but were not recorded. This is a matter of public knowledge and of record.

Again, the difference between the rules of the Fifty-first Congress and the rules of the Fifty-third was principally in this: That in the Fifty-first Congress a sworn officer of the House, the Clerk, who knew every member of the House, was the officer upon whom was devolved the duty of discovering and revealing the presence of members present and not voting, and entering them on the record; while in the Fifty-third Congress the duty of ascertaining the presence of a quorum was committed to two members, who naturally could not know every member of the House, and whose knowledge of the personality of different members was, in fact, so deficient that these dozen or more errors to which I have alluded occurred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is admitted on all hands that the Supreme Court has decided that the House can make the rules that shall govern it. No man disputes that. The gentleman from Georgia has made the point not only to-day, but on several other occasions, that in the Fifty-first Congress this House was without rules, was not under parliamentary rule or parliamentary law, until February 16, 1890, for two and a half months.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this could not possibly be. This House decided, purposely and deliberately, that the rules of this body should be the rules of every deliberative body which does not have special rules, namely, what is known as general parliamentary law—not a freak, not a whim, but the common law of parliamentary bodies, which is well recognized everywhere, whose rules are as fixed and well established as any law governing man. Why, Mr. Speaker, until statutes are adopted the common law is as clearly defined, is as controlling, and as well understood, and as certainly executed, as the statute law when statutes are enacted, wherever the English-speaking people are to be found, and the House was as clearly, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, under rules and under parliamentary law before we had adopted the House rules drawn up by the members of this body and voted for by them in a formal vote as we were afterwards; just as clearly and distinctly. Therefore, when the assertion is made that the House went forward without rules and not under any law for two and a half months, there is no man familiar with the transaction of business in public assemblies in this land who does not know that to be an entirely mistaken statement.

It is well known that all the great business of this country, involving millions upon millions and billions of dollars, is transacted under the precise law that the House acted under until the 16th day of February, and there is not a shade or shadow of difference, so far as the rules of the House go, between those rules deliberately adopted for the guidance of the House before February 16 and the special rules which were adopted afterwards, as far as that question of being under rules is concerned. That is all I desired to say. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, that the rules of the Fifty-third Congress be substituted for those which the House has just had under consideration, and has agreed to.

The question was taken and the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, the rules have now been adopted by the House.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that for a moment and permit me to offer a resolution in reference to the printing of the Digest.

Mr. HENDERSON. Very well; I will do so.

PRINTING THE DIGEST.

Mr. PERKINS. I offer the resolution I sent to the desk.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Before that, the suggestion has been made that we have omitted to adopt the rules as a whole.

The SPEAKER. That is a mistake. The rules have been adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. All of them.

Mr. PICKLER. When was this last rule adopted?

Mr. HENDERSON. Some time ago, by the vote of the House, thus completing the whole body of the rules.

The SPEAKER. The rules have been adopted as a whole.

The Clerk will report the resolution presented by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,600 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives, for the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Speaker and Clerk of the House, 100 copies thereof to be bound in paper covers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Iowa?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the correction of the reference of the bill (H. R. 2440) for the necessary and better protection of American labor, etc., from the Committee on Labor to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this was referred to the proper committee. Has the committee requested this change?

Mr. TAWNEY. It has been done at the request of the Committee on Labor; at least I was requested by a member of that committee to ask the change.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would require unanimous consent in that form. Is there objection to the change of reference?

There being no objection, the change of reference was made as requested.

ADDITIONAL CLERICAL SERVICE, COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Accounts desire to submit a report at this time for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution of December 23, 1895, introduced by Mr. PICKLER, providing that three assistant clerks be allowed the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the sessions of the Fifty-fourth Congress, at a compensation of $6 each per day, to be paid from December 23, 1895, out of the contingent fund of the House, respectfully report that they have carefully investigated the matter and beg leave to submit and recommend the passage of the following substitute:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ one person who is an experienced typewriter and stenographer and one additional person who is experienced in pension work and competent to examine pension laws, papers, and reports, and intelligently report on the same to the committee, with the compensation of $6 per day each from the date of employment to the close of the session.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the report, I sent to the desk a communication from the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, which I think sufficiently explains the reason for its adoption. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 22, 1896.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to call the attention of your committee to the absolute necessity for more clerical force for the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

There are now before the committee for consideration about 922 bills. During the three sessions of the Fifty-third Congress there were 1,236 bills introduced and referred to same committee. Of this number there were favorable reports in 111 cases and adverse reports in 14 cases, leaving, apparently, 1,085 bills which were not acted upon.

The number of bills considered and acted upon necessarily depends largely upon the amount of clerical force allowed us. Members of Congress are constantly requesting that their cases be considered. It is impossible to give their bills the consideration which they merit without at least two more assistant clerks.

This committee is in immediate need of one clerk who is educated in stenography and typewriting, and another who is experienced in pension work, who is competent to examine pension laws, papers, reports, etc., and who has a general knowledge of public business.

I inclose herewith copy of resolution unanimously adopted by this committee December 23, 1895, and which is the basis upon which I offer the resolution now before your committee for consideration.

Very respectfully,

J. A. PICKLER, Chairman.

THE COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the gentleman if this makes an increase in the force over what it has been in past Congresses?

Mr. TRACEY. I understand it is the same as it has been in past Congresses.

Mr. HENDERSON. With these additions?

Mr. TRACEY. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON. Exactly the same number?

Mr. PICKLER. There is one additional assistant during the session.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why should he be needed now any more than in past Congresses?

Mr. PICKLER. Simply because there is a great deal more work than there has been in the past.

Mr. GIBSON. And the work is going to be done this time.

Mr. PICKLER. This matter has been delayed for some time. The Committee on Accounts appointed a subcommittee to come in and review our work. The subcommittee have reported to the full committee, and this report, which is presented, is the unanimous report of the Committee on Accounts, after a thorough investigation. We can not do that work unless we have the proper facilities.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to have it explained why you need more assistants now than were needed prior to the passage of the act of June 27, 1890. Since that time there has been a great increase in the allowance of claims under general laws.

Mr. PICKLER. My judgment is that we have more cases arising out of the act of June 27, 1890, than out of any other law.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PICKLER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MILES], a member of the committee.

Mr. COX. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MILES. The gentleman from South Dakota has yielded to me.

Mr. COX. Does not this give your committee substantially three clerks?

Mr. MILES. The gentleman has yielded to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Dakota is not entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY], in charge of the resolution, has the floor at present.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman [Mr. TRACEY] yield to me for one moment?

Mr. PICKLER. I yield to my colleague on the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TRACEY] has the floor unless he yields.

Mr. TRACEY. I believe I am entitled to the floor. I desire to say, in corroboration of what has just been said, that being myself a member of the subcommittee which made this examination, this report that is now before the House is in exact accordance to what we have found to be the fact. Now, if it is desirable to introduce these pension bills into the House it certainly must be desirable to have them considered by the committee. The Subcommittee on Accounts which made the investigation became thoroughly convinced after a very careful examination of the matter that it would be impossible for the committee, as it has been impossible for past Committees on Invalid Pensions, without assistance, to give the necessary consideration to all these bills and the reporting of them to the House, and because of the additional fact that we believe the bills sent to the Committee on Invalid Pensions ought to be considered and reported to the House, we have reported in favor of giving this additional clerical force.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TRACEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

FRIDAY EVENING SESSION.

The SPEAKER. While that motion is pending, the Chair desires to announce as Speaker pro tempore at the Friday evening session the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. The Chair desires also to obtain unanimous consent that appropriation bills may be reported to the House on that evening. This is merely a formal action to allow the bills to be printed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. Res. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MAHANY, for five days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. STRONG, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. WELLINGTON, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. CONNOLLY, for ten days from January 26, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MCRAE, for the Friday evening session.

To Mr. PARKER, for two days, on account of illness in his family.

RECESS UNTIL FRIDAY EVENING.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that he should move that the House take a recess until Friday evening at 8 o'clock, in accordance with the understanding heretofore arrived at.

Mr. HENDERSON. I supposed that was covered by the original agreement, but I will make the request, if there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the House will now be in recess until Friday evening at 8 o'clock.

There was no objection.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until Friday evening at 8 o'clock.

[Continuation of proceedings of the legislative day of January 23.]

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order at 8 o'clock p. m., January 24, by Mr. PAYNE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report clause 2 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The House shall on each Friday at 5 o'clock p. m. take a recess until 8 o'clock, at which evening session private pension bills, bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only shall be considered; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, under the special rule.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. TALBERT. I demand a division on that question, so as to see how many are present.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 75, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HEPBURN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills under the special rule as read, of clause 2 of Rule XXVI.

Mr. PICKLER. I ask the Clerk to report the first bill on the Calendar.

JAMES H. OSGOOD.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of James H. Osgood, late a seaman on the U. S. S. Circassian, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. PICKLER. Let the report be read. I will ask that in reading the report the reading of the certificates of the physicians, on page 2, be omitted.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood, have examined the same, and, adopting the accompanying Senate report as their own, respectfully recommend its passage.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood, have examined the same, and report:

This bill has already passed the Senate twice, to wit, in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses, the report in the Fifty-third Congress being as follows:

Claimant was a seaman in the United States Navy, and during the war of the rebellion received a severe injury to his left leg, which resulted in varicose veins and ulcers, for which he is pensioned at the rate of $30 per month. Not only is soldier in such condition from this injury as to incapacitate him from manual labor, but he is also suffering from heart disease and other disabilities, which, it is claimed, are the result of blood poisoning and constitutional debility due to the original injury. The last examination of claimant was made by the pension examining board at Concord, N. H., composed of surgeons of long experience, and they reported as follows:

"Upon examination we find the following objective symptoms: Pulse, 92; respiration, 19; temperature, 99½; skin sallow, conjunctiva jaundiced, tongue furred, abdomen flat and tympanitic over colon; area of hepatic dullness increased; splenic dullness normal; sphincter not relaxed; one indurated pile one-half inch in diameter; area of cardiac dullness increased about one-third; valvular sounds roughened, with action irregular and intermittent. Hopping on one leg across the room raises the pulse to 120, and action of heart is very tumultuous and the valvular sounds can scarcely be made out. Lungs normal. Crepitus in both shoulders and knees, but no enlarged joints; all the muscles are flabby, and he is poorly nourished; has varicose veins of left leg from top of foot, completely surrounding the ankle and leg, running up inside of thigh, and the pudendal veins are all varicosed, some of the bunches at this point being an inch in diameter. From the ankle up, for a distance of 8 inches, the leg is a mass of cicatricial tissue, the result of varicose ulcers. The leg is useless so far as the performance of manual labor is concerned, but is of some use to him in standing or walking, though for these purposes an artificial limb would be much better. The foot is œdematous and the ankle almost anchylosed."

As a result of the above examination, the pension examining board recommended a rate of $36 per month for the disability caused by injury to leg, and a third-grade rating ($24 per month) for that caused by rheumatism and resulting heart disease, making a total of $60 per month. The Pension Office declined to increase the rating for the injured leg above $30 per month, there being no intermediate rating between $30 and $72, and rejected the rating for rheumatism and resulting heart disease.

Your committee respectfully submit that a board of distinguished surgeons who personally examined the injured limb must necessarily know the extent of the disability, while it is a generally recognized fact among medical men that such an injury as this soldier sustained, with open sores covering the limb, and the veins being diseased and broken down, can not do otherwise than result in blood poisoning and a consequent undermining of the entire system, culminating necessarily in diseases precisely such as claimant is to-day suffering from.

Medical affidavits are herewith appended showing the present deplorable condition of the claimant.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ANNIE M. GREENE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Annie M. Greene, dependent and invalid daughter of Jeremiah Greene, late a private in Company A, First Regiment New Hampshire Artillery Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there a demand for the reading of the report?

Mr. TALBERT. I would like to have the report read, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene, have examined the same, and, adopting the accompanying Senate report as their own, respectfully recommend its passage.

[Senate Report No. 3, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene, have examined the same, and report:

A bill in behalf of this claimant passed the Senate during the Fifty-second Congress at the rate of $15 per month. In the last Congress the rate was reduced to $10. The bill passed both Houses, but so near the close of the Congress as to remain unacted upon by the Executive. The present bill proposes to grant a pension at the rate of $12 per month, which the committee thinks will be a fair rating for claimants of this class. The report in the case was as follows:

Annie M. Greene is the dependent and invalid daughter of Jeremiah Greene, late a private in Company A, First Regiment New Hampshire Artillery Volunteers. The evidence clearly shows that from infancy claimant has suffered from an affection of the eyes, which has resulted in almost total blindness, the sight of one eye being entirely gone and the other being practically of no use. She is in destitute circumstances, unable to labor, and appeals to Congress for relief. Many similar cases have been enacted into law, and this case seems to be specially meritorious. Affidavits are appended showing the condition of the claimant, both physically and financially.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Respectfully represents Annie M. Greene, of Franklin, Merrimac County, N. H., 49 years of age.

That she is a daughter of Jeremiah Greene, late of said Franklin, deceased, who enlisted on the 14th day of July, 1863, and was mustered into the service of the United States as a private in Company A, First Regiment Artillery, New Hampshire Volunteers, on the 18th day of July, 1863, and was honorably discharged for disability at Fort Constitution, Portsmouth, N. H., July 22, 1865.

That she is in need of assistance, and is unable to obtain a suitable living from her own efforts.

That since she was an infant she has been afflicted with the partial loss of her eyesight, being unable to distinguish any objects with the left eye and having but a weak and partial use of the right eye.

That the said Jeremiah Greene was not a pensioner at the time of his death, though entitled from his disabilities to apply for such aid.

That she desires a special appropriation to be made by the United States for her benefit, as she is wholly dependent upon her own resources and is unable to properly support herself.

ANNIE M. GREENE.

[SEAL.] JAMES E. BARNARD, Notary Public.

I, E. Thayer Drake, of Franklin, in the county of Merrimack and State of New Hampshire, on oath depose and say as follows:

That I am a practicing physician and surgeon in said Franklin, and have been acquainted with Annie M. Greene for the past seven years.

That I have made a careful examination of said Annie M. Greene, and find her suffering from the results of a corneitis, which developed during infancy, affecting both eyes; there is no vision in left eye, and that of the right is so slight as to seriously interfere with her work, upon which she depends for a livelihood.

There is no prospect of any improvement in the condition of the eyes.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions a question. Is it not true that if this party were the widow of a soldier of the late war, though she might be in the same condition that this applicant is, she could only receive $8 per month? Is not that correct?

Mr. PICKLER. Under the law of June 27, 1890, she would receive $8 per month, but if her husband died of disabilities contracted in the service, under the general law she would receive $12 a month; but if it was shown that the widow was in a helpless condition, such a condition as this dependent is in, she might receive any sum that this Congress saw fit to grant.

Mr. LOUD. I understand that. Does the fact appear that the father died of a wound received in the service?

Mr. PICKLER. That would not affect the daughter.

Mr. LOUD. I asked that in order to get at the facts. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions is evidently trying to evade answering the question.

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, no.

Mr. LOUD. I will put the question again. If this party were the widow of a soldier in the late war she would only be entitled, under the law, to a pension of $8 per month?

Mr. PICKLER. Under which law does the gentleman mean?

Mr. LOUD. It must be under either the law of 1890 or some preceding law. I asked if the soldier had died of wounds received in the service. The gentleman said it was immaterial. Of course, I am assuming that the case comes under the act of 1890.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know that it makes any difference so far as a dependent daughter is concerned. It is exactly the same in both laws.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman will understand what I am trying to arrive at. Why should we make a special exception in respect to 200,000 or 300,000 widows in this country to-day? That is the question I would like to have carefully considered.

Mr. PICKLER. I understand that is a question open to discussion, but the belief of the committee was that this daughter, being in this condition, was entitled to this pension, and of course the gentleman has well stated the law so far as the widows are concerned. But he understands full well that if a widow were found to be in this helpless condition we could give her whatever we saw proper.

Mr. LOUD. I recognize that fact.

Mr. PICKLER. It is only $12 a month.

Mr. LOUD. I understand. I would like to suggest to the chairman of the committee——

Mr. PICKLER. Let me suggest one further fact that occurs to me. While under the law of June 27, 1890, widows are only allowed $8 a month, I believe the gentleman will bear me out, because I know he is a constant attendant at these Friday night sessions——

Mr. LOUD. No; that is incorrect.

Mr. PICKLER. You are generally here.

Mr. LOUD. Sometimes.

Mr. PICKLER. We never grant a widow less pension than $12 by special act—I do not believe we ever do. When we take up one of these claims of a widow in a special act I believe we always give her at least $12 a month, and on a parity of reasoning along that line the committee granted it in this case.

Mr. LOUD. I do not care to put any serious impediment in the way of this bill, but I think, in the opening night session of this Congress that the gentleman misinterprets the temper of the American people if he believes that our people are crying for increased pensions in special cases.

I do not think the people of this country will uphold the hands of any Congress that picks out a person who is not entitled to a pension under the law, makes an exception of that case, and increases the pension above that which the person would be entitled to if it were granted under the general law. There are too many widows in this country for us to be justified in making an exception of any one case. I simply throw out these suggestions, Mr. Chairman, at this time, because we are about to start out upon pension legislation in this Congress, and as the Committee on Invalid Pensions is now provided with five clerks, I venture to say that we shall have brought before us by that committee a very large volume of this kind of legislation during the present session.

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman from California permit a question?

Mr. LOUD. I will, though I do not think that I can answer anything about this case.

Mr. WANGER. Do you not think that the pension of every dependent widow who was married to a soldier during or prior to his service in the late war of the rebellion ought to be at least $12 per month, and that the country would approve of the action of Congress in fixing it at that rate?

Mr. LOUD. If you ask me that question personally, I say no. I think the people of this country have about all the pensions on their hands that they want at the present time. I believe the American people are willing and ready at all times to do full justice toward those who upheld the flag during the rebellion, or to those who were dependent upon them, but I think that we have already gone, if possible, to the very extreme verge of legislation in that direction.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say that the gentleman from California certainly does not remember the report in this case. The bill passed both Houses in the last Congress, so that there is nothing in the case to justify him in intimating that the present Committee on Invalid Pensions are undertaking to raise pensions at this early stage of the session. I ask the gentleman's attention also to the fact that we are not giving this dependent daughter a dollar more than she would receive if she were able to prove up her case under the general law; but the act of 1890 does not extend to dependent daughters, and we simply seek by the pending bill to bring this case in as if it came under the general law, and we fix the pension at the statutory amount.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, this Annie M. Greene is the only child of an old soldier who served well and fought well during the war of the rebellion. He died because he had been in the service of his country. He left a daughter who was an invalid and poor in eyesight from her birth, and who now can not see at all out of one eye and only dimly out of the other. She has no property whatever, and the question stares us squarely in the face whether she shall have this little pittance of $12 per month or shall go to the poorhouse. This bill passed the Senate at the rate of $15 a month. It was cut down in the House in the last Congress to $10 a month, and failed to become a law only because it did not receive action by the President.

Now, it has again passed the Senate and is before the House. This lady is fully known to all the people in the vicinity where she lives and has the respect and sympathy of all parties and all classes. To my mind there never has been a more meritorious case before this House appealing to our sympathy and our justice than this case of Annie M. Greene. I know of no cause of objection on the part of anyone to the granting of this small pension, and I hope the bill will be passed unanimously.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNIE J. CORBETT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 925) granting a pension to Annie J. Corbett, of Providence, R. I.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act of June 27, 1890, the name of Annie J. Corbett, widow of William Corbett, late of Company K, Second Regiment of Rhode Island Volunteer Infantry. This pension to cease in case it be shown that the soldier is alive.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 925) to pension Annie J. Corbett, have examined the same, and respectfully recommend its passage, with the following report:

The petitioner was married to William Corbett December 21, 1865. He had previously served in Company K, Second Rhode Island Volunteers, from October 16, 1861, until March 6, 1863, when discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability by reason of hypertrophy of the heart, contracted in service. He has never applied for pension, and, if living, is about 55 years old. The petitioner alleges that he disappeared in the spring of 1866 and has never been heard from since; that their relations were pleasant, and she went to live with his mother and sisters, and has lived with them ever since, and they have never heard anything of the soldier to the present time.

Two witnesses testify that the petitioner has not remarried, was never divorced from soldier, and that she is without means of support. The marriage and soldier's service are shown by record evidence.

The claim is rejected by the Pension Bureau, because it is impossible to show clearly the fact of soldier's death.

This bill was favorably reported in the last Congress. Your committee regard the presumption of death as conclusive from the evidence, but it is specifically provided in the bill that the pension shall cease in case it be shown that the soldier is alive.

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to inquire who has charge of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was introduced by the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. BULL.

Mr. ERDMAN. If the gentleman is here, or if some one can speak for him, I should like to hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. POOLE. If the gentleman from Rhode Island is present I would like to have him give the explanation. If he is not, I will speak for him.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Chairman, the report of the committee states this case very clearly, and I do not know that I can say anything in addition to what the committee have there set forth. The evidence as presented to the committee shows that this soldier entered the service in 1861, and was discharged in 1863. At the time of his discharge he was suffering from heart disease. In the spring of 1866 he disappeared and has not been heard of since. The relations between the husband and the wife were always pleasant, and at the present time the widow is living with his family, his mother and sisters. The testimony before the committee shows that the petitioner was never remarried and was never divorced and that she has no means of support. Her application was rejected by the Pension Bureau because it was impossible to show clearly the fact of the soldier's death. A bill for the relief of this lady was reported in the last Congress, but was crowded out at the end of the session owing to the pressure of business. The case is a very meritorious one and I hope the bill will pass. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, what is the rate of pension provided in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill simply provides for placing the applicant "on the pension roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the act of June 27, 1890."

Mr. ERDMAN. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have some further information upon which to act in this case. I should like to know the facts and circumstances of the case, so as to judge whether the presumption of death arises in this case or not. We are presuming here to overrule the Pension Bureau, which has all the facts and circumstances before it——

Mr. HARDY. That is exactly what we propose to do.

Mr. ERDMAN. I suppose so; but I do not think the House proposes to do it without proper consideration. The Pension Bureau has adopted the rule which governs in all the courts of the country, and if we intend here, without a knowledge of facts and circumstances, to overrule the Department and grant pensions indiscriminately, it would be well to have that understood.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Let me ask the gentleman what length of absence should be required, in his opinion, to raise the presumption of death?

Mr. ERDMAN. If the circumstances under which the soldier left his home were such that it was to be presumed he would return if alive, seven years is the length of absence that I would require; that being the common-law rule.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I understand that, and in this case the soldier has been absent thirty years.

Mr. ERDMAN. But we do not know the circumstances under which he left home, and I should like to know more about them.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, I personally have examined all the facts and circumstances in this case. I find that the soldier was discharged for hypertrophy of the heart——

Mr. MILES (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from New York will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I think the point of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that there is nothing in this report to show that the man did not leave home for some reason of a criminal character.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, I think I understand the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The fact that this soldier lived in amicable relations with his wife is established. There is nothing in the testimony to show that they had ever had a quarrel. Since his leaving home in 1866, the widow has been and is now living with his relatives. They have given their testimony in the case and there is nothing in it to show that there was any reason for his leaving home or for not returning. He was simply a sick man, unable to support himself and his family, and he left home undoubtedly to die soon after. He has been gone now thirty years. The testimony shows also that the widow during all this period has been practically a pauper.

She is now 52 years of age and he would be 55 if alive, and I appeal to any old soldier to say whether it is likely that a man who was discharged from the service thirty years ago on account of heart disease is still alive. The circumstances of the case all point to his death, and yet this woman's application was rejected by the Pension Bureau solely because she was unable to prove his death. It is time, Mr. Chairman, that the law of the United States in this respect should be changed and that we should adopt in such cases the common-law rule, which is that seven years' absence raises the presumption of death, provided everything else in the case is right. The testimony in this case is very clear. The service of the soldier is shown, the disease is shown, the poverty is shown, the physical condition of the soldier and all the facts and circumstances point to the conclusion that he undoubtedly died many years ago. I believe the committee have been thoroughly conscientious in examining the case and in reporting the bill granting this widow the small amount of $8 a month, and I trust that it will meet the approval of this Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOCKERY. When was the application rejected?

Mr. POOLE. Within two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word before the vote is taken. This is the first time in this session of Congress that we have met to consider pension legislation, and it would be well for us to come to an understanding as to the principle upon which we are to act in cases of this kind, for undoubtedly there are many such before the Pension Committee, and I know I have some myself. This is a case in which, if I were Commissioner of Pensions, I would allow the pension, and I will vote for this bill; but I would like to know what the rule is, and I now appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and ask him what he understands to be the rule of the Pension Office on the question of presumptive evidence of death in cases like this? Has the Bureau adopted a rule by which we can be guided in these cases?

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has asked that question. I will refer him to the rule of the Department, a rule which makes such bills as this necessary. I quote from volume 9, Decisions of the Department of the Interior, in the case of Melinda L. Crider, found on page 462. To save time, I will read only the closing paragraph of the decision:

> In view of these findings, I therefore feel it incumbent upon me to lay down the rule that, independent of absence for any period of time, it must be held in pension cases that the facts attending the absence must show beyond a reasonable doubt that the party is dead.

That is the criminal-law rule. This decision was rendered by Assistant Secretary John M. Reynolds.

A MEMBER. When was the decision rendered?

Mr. PICKLER. It is in volume 7 of Decisions of the Department of the Interior in Appealed Pension and Bounty Land Claims. The date is March 6, 1895.

I desire, for the information of the gentleman, to read further from this decision:

> I am fully convinced—

This gentleman is not satisfied with reliance upon the decisions of the courts, it seems—

> I am fully convinced that more urgent reasons exist for the modification of this rule in the consideration of pension claims than any shown in the decisions of the courts, and I conceive the requirements herein indicated as necessary in this class of cases to be eminently desirable for the protection of the Government as well as the soldier who may be entitled to the bounty.

Mr. HULICK. That is the holding of the Commissioner.

Mr. PICKLER. No; it went up on appeal from the decision of the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Reynolds——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. In the Interior Department?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir. It was the decision of the Assistant Secretary on an appeal.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. What do you mean by an appeal? Do you mean an appeal in the courts or in the Department?

Mr. PICKLER. I referred to an appeal in the Department. Appeals are taken from the decision of the Commissioner of Pensions to the Secretary of the Interior, and that is the law that governs in pension cases. This, however, is the decision of the Secretary of the Interior upon an appeal.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, it is simply impossible to hear anything of the debate on this side of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It is difficult even for the Chair to hear it, and he hopes that there will be order. The Chair will endeavor to maintain order.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The question I asked the gentleman from South Dakota was whether the appeal was an appeal to the courts or from the Commissioner of Pensions to another man in the Interior Department. In other words, then, as I understood his answer, this is a ruling upon a ruling in the Interior Department.

Mr. PICKLER. That is right.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is, that every presumption of law and fact is to be against the soldier, and still more in that Department than in any court of justice in the land.

Mr. MAHON. Do they not presume everything against the soldier up there?

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I do not like to say exactly that. The gentleman from Pennsylvania heard the testimony, and he has heard part of the decision that I started to read. For myself, I know of no rule that a lawyer can cite in any court of justice in this country in a civil case where you must prove a fact beyond a reasonable doubt, or where the presumption of death does not exist after the party has been absent for a reasonable length of time. If there is such a rule I do not know it.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think it is the intention of Congress and the lawmaking power generally that the construction shall be in favor of the soldier in every case. If that is not the rule it certainly ought to be, because it was the intention of the lawmaking power. It has been the case in every instance where these laws have been enacted, and in all special legislation on this subject Congress has indicated very clearly its intention. The more or less taxation required to meet these expenditures amounts to nothing in the view of our people in comparison with doing justice to the soldiers and their widows, and ninety-nine men out of a hundred would desire that to be the intention.

Mr. HICKS. The hundredth man is against it; that is the only difference.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, further replying to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HULICK], the committee thinks that the common-law presumption to which reference has been made ought to apply in all such cases as this. Of course he understands the rule of the common law better than I do, and it is not necessary for me to cite it in this connection. But when a soldier is absent for the time fixed in the law, the presumption is of his death, and especially in a case like this, where he never applied for a pension himself.

Mr. PITNEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Dakota a question.

Mr. PICKLER. I have not the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. HULICK. I yielded to the gentleman from South Dakota to ask a question, and now wish to claim the floor in my own right.

Mr. Chairman, this is a practical issue which we must now meet, on the very threshold of this session, and I raised the question at this time in order to obtain an expression of sentiment on the part of the House. We are going to do justice to the soldiers and their widows and children; but we must have some guide, and we want to act in unison with the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Now, on this question of presumption, if it is a question that the House is to act upon—that is, the legal presumption after seven years of the death of the party—if that is to be the rule, then we ought to understand it, and if it is to be the rule, why not have the Committee on Invalid Pensions report a bill fixing by express statute that rule of presumption in favor of the death of the soldier in the absence of any contrary proof? That is to say, an absence of seven years without proof to the contrary to be presumptive evidence of his death.

Now, I understand the theory of the Department is that it must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the man is dead or that he will never return to claim his pension. If that is the ruling of the Department I respectfully dissent from it.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HULICK. Certainly.

Mr. MILES. I hope the gentleman will bear in mind that the House has two sides to it, and that the committee has a part of its membership on this side.

Mr. HULICK. If that suggestion is because the gentleman can not hear me, I will divide my time, and if necessary to convince that side of the House as to the justice of the position I take, I will myself pay my respects to it, so that there can be no question of hearing me.

Mr. MILES. I wish to remind the gentleman that I am a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I am interested in his very instructive remarks.

Mr. HULICK. I thank the gentleman. I want to know on what basis the committee is to report bills of this character, so that hereafter we shall have no controversy, and when a bill of this kind comes up we shall be ready to vote upon it, so that you will not be interrupted by remarks from me or any other gentleman.

I favor the passage of this bill; but I have some bills of the same kind, and I want to know if it is a mere question of fact that I have got to prove to the committee. I now address myself to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions and other members of that committee, and I ask, if we present a case of this kind, shall we be required to introduce evidence to satisfy the committee of facts sufficient to sustain the common-law presumption of death after an absence for seven years, or shall we have to introduce evidence to prove the death beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. This committee takes up questions as they come before it. If a case shall appear where the circumstances show a presumption that the soldier is not dead, if he has been heard from, or something of that kind, then I do not suppose the committee would report favorably; and it would be impossible for me to say to the gentleman from Ohio in advance what we should do in a particular case until we know the facts of that case. It is the province of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to do justice to these soldiers and their widows and dependent children, and we shall endeavor to do justice in each case as it comes up. We can not decide a case until it comes before us.

Mr. HULICK. I thank the gentleman for his expression. I have no doubt the committee will do that, and I think from what the gentleman has said we can reach an understanding.

Mr. ERDMAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. Does he think that the House or the Committee on Invalid Pensions ought to overrule the Pension Department without any evidence whatever before it?

Mr. HULICK. Not at all; and that is the reason I propounded the question to the chairman of the committee. I wish to know whether, when we present cases of this kind, we shall introduce evidence to establish the facts beyond a reasonable doubt, or whether we shall simply establish facts to raise the common-law presumption of death after an absence of seven years. That is what I wished to find out.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I think we are on the safe side in this matter, at all events. It has been clearly proven that somebody connected with this household is entitled to a pension. The man if living would be entitled to it according to the laws which have been passed by Congress, and if the man is dead the woman is entitled to it. It has been clearly proven that she is an invalid, and in need of this money. Why should we waste so much time over a saving of $96 a year, at the risk of breaking a human heart and sending a woman in distress to the grave. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ANNA KELLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1605) granting a pension to Anna Kelley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Anna Kelley, of Manchester, N. H., widow of Charles T. Kelley, alias Charles J. Kelley, who served in Company C, Fourth Regiment New Hampshire Volunteers, and on the U. S. ships Ohio and Macedonia in the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $12 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. SULLOWAY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1605) granting a pension to Anna Kelley, having carefully considered the same, respectfully report:

The claimant was married to Charles T. Kelley, alias Charles J. Kelley, on April 21, 1860. September 18, 1861, her husband enlisted in Company C, Fourth New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry. He was discharged for disability December 1, 1862, at Washington, D. C. On March 4, 1863, he enlisted as ordinary seaman in the United States Navy, and served on the Ohio and Macedonia, from which service he was honorably discharged.

After the war Kelley returned to his home in Manchester, N. H., and lived with his wife, the claimant, until 1871, when he went abroad to seek employment. A short time afterwards Kelley's brother, now deceased, received a letter from him, stating that he was at some point in New Jersey, sick, and in need of relief. That was the last ever heard of the soldier.

In July, 1890, the claimant filed a claim (No. 477579) as widow, under the act of June 27, 1890, which was, in October, 1893, transferred to the Navy files of the Bureau of Pensions and thereafter known as No. 13757. On April 20, 1895, the claim was rejected on the ground that the "sailor's death is not shown nor presumable." This seems to be the only point in the case on which direct evidence is lacking.

We think that, after the lapse of twenty-five years, taken in connection with the fact that when last heard of the soldier was many miles from his home, sick, and in need of relief, the claimant is surely entitled to the benefit of the doubt, and your committee, therefore, respectfully report the bill back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GILMAN WILLIAMS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1020) granting an increase of pension to Gilman Williams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to increase the pension of Gilman Williams (insane), of Company H, Third Ohio Infantry Volunteers, to $72 a month, subject to the limitations of the pension laws; said pension to be in lieu of that which he is now receiving.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended an amendment, in lines 5 and 6, striking out the words "seventy-two" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty."

The report (by Mr. BAKER of Kansas) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1020) granting an increase of pension to Gilman Williams, having carefully considered the same, respectfully report:

The soldier is hopelessly insane and very poor, and dependent upon the support of his sister, who is a woman of small means.

The evidence of service—origin of the disability—is not regarded by the Pension Bureau as sufficient to justify the allowance of the claim under the general law, but there is considerable evidence upon the subject, the case having been examined specially in the field by officers of the Pension Office.

The guardian of the insane soldier is drawing a pension of $12 a month under the act of June 27, 1890, under certificate 613722. The soldier served in Company H, Third Ohio Infantry, from August 23, 1862, to December 19, 1863, when he was discharged on account of fracture of right patella. The Pension Office rejected the claim of the guardian under the general law "on the ground that the alleged insanity did not originate in the service, but was contracted after discharge therefrom, as shown by testimony taken on special examination as well as the record of the inquest upon which he was adjudged insane in 1872."

The records of the War Department show that the soldier was captured at Rome, Ga., May 3, 1863, and was confined at Richmond, Va., May 9, 1863, and was paroled at City Point May 14, 1863, and reported at Camp Parole, Md., May 15, 1863, and sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, May 19, 1863. The records show fracture of right patella from a runaway horse and discharge on that account.

The injury to patella occurred when he was on furlough during his parole.

The evidence is not sufficiently clear to justify the Pension Bureau in allowing a claim based upon insanity, and the action of the Pension Bureau was approved by Secretary Bussey on appeal.

Your committee think that there is considerable evidence to justify the belief that the soldier's insanity is due to his army service. The evidence is very voluminous, and we do not therefore set it out in this report. Special examiners took the testimony of the insane soldier, and this evidence is somewhat relied upon in the appeal as a ground for rejecting the claim. In view of the mental condition of the soldier we do not think that evidence should have been considered against him.

He would be entitled to $72 a month under the general law, and is drawing $12 under the disability act of 1890. We are not prepared to say that the evidence of service origin of his insanity is such as to require the allowance of the claim on that ground. At all events there is considerable evidence justifying the claim that it was of such origin.

It appears that the soldier, who lives in Iowa, was at one time in the State hospital for the insane, but was discharged therefrom because, as stated, he was too unmanageable and too great a charge.

A similar bill, allowing $30, was favorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the last Congress, but it died on the Calendar.

It is a case appealing strongly to the sympathy of Congress, and one in which we think some of the doubts should be resolved in favor of the soldier.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "seventy-two" in lines 5 and 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "thirty," and that as so amended the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "thirty."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I think this House is performing an act of injustice to this worthy soldier. Surely if he is entitled to more than $12 a month he is entitled to $72. I do not see on what ground the Committee on Invalid Pensions can say that his present disability is not traceable to his service, but that they think it is traceable $30 worth. It is either traceable to his service or it is not. If it is traceable to his service to the extent of $30, why it is traceable to his service to the extent of $72. If you are going to do an act of justice in a worthy case, why not give him the pension that he would be entitled to under the general law? Can the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions enlighten us upon that point?

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will offer an amendment if he thinks this is not high enough.

Mr. LOUD. The bill is all right in its original form.

Mr. PICKLER. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BAKER], who made the report in this case.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, your committee, after an investigation of this case, felt that we had a rather peculiar one to deal with. There was some evidence that went to show that this insanity was the result of his service in the Army. There was one witness who testified that he had been a physical wreck ever since he left the Army. There was not enough to fully satisfy your committee in believing that it was wholly owing to the fact that he rendered service in the Army. From the time that he left the Army until the present time he has been an invalid. He has been gradually growing worse since he had the injury which is spoken of here. A sister of his has taken care of him until she is no longer able to provide for his wants. They refuse, as I understand, to continue him longer in the asylum in that State where he now is, and some provision, we felt, should be made for him.

Mr. LOUD. On what ground do they refuse to continue him?

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. It raised a very strong presumption in our minds that his insanity was due to his service in the Army.

Mr. LOUD. You say that the asylum refused to retain him. On what ground?

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] told me because he was so filthy and so incorrigible that they would not continue him.

Mr. LOUD. Is that the way the insane asylums are managed in the State of Iowa?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas has the floor.

Mr. BAKER of Kansas. They claimed also that he was not a citizen of the State of Iowa. He appears to have been removed from the State of Ohio when he was insane. He had been in the State of Iowa for a considerable length of time. He was very hard to control and care for, and they refused to continue to keep him. A sister had taken care of him and had provided for him so far as she was able, until she has exhausted her resources. And we have evidence that she will, in all probability, lose her home, having mortgaged it to enable her to give proper care to this insane brother; and we felt bound, under the laws of humanity, to do something for him, and thought we could not do less than to make some provision by which he could be better cared for in the future than he had been in the past. While we did not feel warranted in grantng an increase to $72, as we thought that proper care could be taken of him for less, we thought it would be right to grant him $30 a month, learning as we did that in a private asylum he could be provided for for that sum. Remember, this is in lieu of $12 a month he is now receiving, so that it is only an increase of $18 a month, which will provide for him and relieve the sister of his care.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the committee, to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "thirty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ANDREW B. KEITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 994) granting an increase of pension to Andrew B. Keith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Andrew B. Keith, late private in Company F, One hundred and twentieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and to pay him $30 per month, the same to be paid him in lieu of the pension now paid him of $12 per month, upon pension certificate No. 222783, the same to be subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force on and after its passage.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 994) granting an increase of pension to Andrew B. Keith, respectfully report:

The soldier is now on the pension roll at $12 per month for chronic diarrhea and resulting piles and rheumatism. In November, 1888, he filed an application for an increase, alleging as the ground therefor disease of the eyes as a result of rheumatism. His application was rejected upon the ground that the form of disease with which his eyes were afflicted was not ordinarily the result of rheumatism or that when the disease resulted from rheumatism it appeared in a different form from that found in this case.

The rejection was based wholly upon the opinion of the medical referee. This decision was carried up on appeal and was affirmed by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and this affirmance rested solely upon the opinion of the medical referee.

There seems to have been no question but that the soldier was afflicted with a disease of the eyes. The whole inquiry was directed to finding its origin, and the decision was based wholly upon the determination of that question.

The evidence of Dr. Irwin, an eye specialist, is very clear as to the cause of the disease. His evidence is not simply expert, but is based upon years of treatment of the soldier for the trouble for which the increase was claimed. This doctor began treating the soldier in 1884 and it has continued with intervals ever since. The doctor's evidence as to his present condition is as follows. After describing the treatment and condition, he says:

"Causing failure of sight and increase of his myopia, and finally cataract of both eyes. His sight is now so bad that he can barely go about without an assistant."

He further testifies that the disease is sclera choroiditis, and was evidently rheumatic.

The evidence of this witness should be given great weight. He was for years the eye expert of the examining board at Mansfield, Ohio, and is a noted specialist in eye diseases.

This evidence is strongly corroborated by the examination of two medical boards and an examination by a medical expert, to whom this case was referred. These examinations are as follows: In March, 1887, a board reported: "Eyeballs prominent and quite tender to the touch; large posterior staphyloma, more extensive in right." In July, 1889, a board reported: "Media cloudy; eyeballs prominent; myopia of high degree; accommodation limited. * * * Balls tender to pressure. * * * Posterior staphyloma of both eyes; the whitish crescentric feature notable; sclerotic; probably rheumatically affected in some degree."

Expert Clark, of Columbus, Ohio, to whom the pension authorities referred the soldier for examination, reported that his condition was not typical of simple myopia or shortsightedness, but probably the result of rheumatism.

These boards and this expert made personal and physical examinations, while the medical referee who rejected the claim only examined their examinations, and for that reason their conclusions should be received as the more satisfactory.

As stated at the beginning, there was but one question—a medical one—and about this the doctors disagreed. The medical referee admits that a disease of this kind results from rheumatism, but when it does, as he affirms, its presence "is anterior instead of posterior."

The other medical evidence says that it appears in both forms, but more frequently in the anterior.

A large number of citations from medical authorities treating upon the subject of diseases of the eye have been examined, and they seem to sustain the theory and evidence of soldier's witnesses and examinations, that his eye disease resulted from rheumatism.

The passage of the bill is therefore recommended with an amendment fixing the rate at $30 per month, as follows:

In line 7 strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty."

During the reading of the report,

Mr. PICKLER said: I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the report be omitted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After apause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I hope some gentleman will explain this bill. I have listened as attentively as I could to the reading of the report. Of course, it is a very funny business; I understand that; but I have listened to the reading of the report as attentively as I could, and have failed to discover one word, from the report, in the testimony of these physicians that indicates that the present disease of this applicant is due to his service. Of course, they all go on and describe his present condition. Now, as the report has not all been read, if some gentleman can explain what these doctors have said and show what reference it had to his service, I would be very glad. Simply because a person is pretty nearly blind to-day, I——

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LOUD. I would rather that you should wait half a minute, until I get through with that sentence; but I will yield to you now.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman from California if he does not get the idea, further, from the reading of the report that there is something pretty serious the matter with this man? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. PAYNE. And the only doubt the gentleman has as regards the case is as to whether it is attributable to his army service?

Mr. LOUD. That is the only cause; and I am addressing myself to the matter in all seriousness.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman a further question. I do not know how much pension it is proposed to give him.

A MEMBER. The bill was introduced at $50.

Mr. LOUD. As amended, $30 a month.

Mr. PAYNE. But, in either case, if the soldier served regularly and had a regular discharge, would he not be entitled to some sort of a pension?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. He is getting $12 a month.

Mr. LOUD. He is getting $12 a month, and that is all he is entitled to under the law.

Mr. HICKS. He is nearly blind.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, when you talk about blindness, I want to say to you that there are at least 10,000 men in this country who served well during the late war who are to-day nearly blind, if not totally blind.

Mr. HARDY. And entitled to $72 a month.

Mr. LOUD. Then pension them under a general law.

Mr. HARDY. This is the place to make the law to pension them.

Mr. LOUD. That is all right; but do not do it by special acts.

Mr. HICKS. We have not time to make a general law.

Mr. BRUMM (to Mr. LOUD). I understand you are opposed to an extension of the pension law?

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILES. This debate is not proceeding in an orderly way. Gentlemen are addressing each other without addressing the Chair and without addressing the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. LOUD. This seems to be regarded by some gentlemen as a very amusing affair, but it seems to me a very serious matter. Now, I am free to say that if the medical testimony in this case goes to show that this man's present disability is the result of his service, no man in this House will go further than I to grant him the pension asked for; yes, and more than what he would be entitled to under the law. But I want to say to members that no series of questions addressed to me, no query about my position upon pension legislation, can deter me from pursuing such a course in this House as I think becoming in a member of it.

I sit pretty near the Democratic side, but I want the brethren to understand that I am not a Democrat. I want them to understand, further, that I have as much sympathy for the soldier as any man on this floor; but if you are going to pick out special cases and go away beyond what the law would allow the applicant if his case came under the general law, I can not go with you to that extent. It is very true that I can not prevent you from passing these bills, but I do not believe that this House ought to pursue the course they are to-night entering upon so precipitately. I think that before this session of Congress is over, gentlemen, you may possibly have cause to regret the hasty action that you have taken to-night in some of these cases.

A MEMBER. That makes no difference.

Mr. LOUD. Well, perhaps it does not make any difference to you, but it does make some difference to me. I am a Republican. I desire to see my party as a party pursue a course of justice toward all the old soldiers, and not to pick out, here and there, the case of some soldier and, simply because he has an able advocate upon this floor, grant to him, or to his widow, an exceptionally large pension. Now, I say to you again, Mr. Chairman, that I failed to hear one word in the report just read which goes to show, even in the remotest degree, that any of these eye experts claim that the disease from which this applicant is now suffering is the result of his service. If it be the fact that it is not the result of his service, then why should we grant him a pension of $30 a month?

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Is it not a fact that the expert doctor whose testimony is presented in this report says that in his opinion, which is based not only on his general skill as a doctor, but upon actual care and treatment of this patient, the disease of the eyes is the result of rheumatism, resulting from the man's army service? I so understand the report.

Mr. LOUD. If the report states that, I did not catch it. If the gentleman did, his hearing is much better than mine.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. That is how I understand it.

Mr. LOUD. I did not hear that part of the report.

Mr. TALBERT. I will say to the gentleman from California that that part of the report was not read.

Mr. LOUD. I am of the opinion that the Clerk did, perhaps, skip a portion of the report. If any gentleman will state that the report does contain evidence that the disability results from the man's service, that of course alters the case.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me to read it now?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. I will read that portion of the report.

Several MEMBERS. Read the whole report. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAYNE. I will read the portion of it to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. If other gentlemen want to read the rest of it they are at liberty to do so. This is the portion to which I ask attention:

Expert Clark, of Columbus, Ohio, to whom the pension authorities referred the soldier for examination, reported that his condition was not typical myopia or shortsightedness, but probably the result of rheumatism. These boards and this expert made personal and physical examinations, while the medical referee who rejected the claim, only examined their examinations, and for that reason their conclusions should be received as the more satisfactory.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, this whole case in a nutshell is that three examining boards and one medical expert found that this man's blindness did result from his rheumatism, and the medical referee at the Bureau said they were in error, and the committee took sides with the three boards and the one medical expert against the medical referee.

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say for my own sake that that portion of the report which the gentleman from New York has just read had not been read to the House before. I simply rose to my feet for the purpose of seeking further information about this case, which I have finally secured.

The amendment of the committee striking out "$50" and inserting "$30" was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. HULL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place upon the pension rolls the name of Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, in the Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion, and that she be paid a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Mary E. Hull, the dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late a member of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment, Illinois, and submit the following report:

The evidence fully establishes the fact that the beneficiary in said bill was the sister of James and John A. Hull; that said James died in the service of his country in the war of the rebellion; that said John A. was a member of Company F, Eighty-first Illinois Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion, and also was in the Mexican war; that said Mary E. is now and always has been a single woman.

That her brother, John A., was a widower when he entered the service of the United States in the war of the rebellion; that she lived with and was keeping house for him at said time; that he then had three young, helpless children, and the said Mary E. took charge of them during his absence, cared for and educated them; that she had no money or property of her own, but devoted her energies and life to her said brother, John A., and his children, both during and after the war; that her brother, John A., remained a widower till his death.

That he died about eight years ago, leaving no property or money, and that said Mary E. has no property or money, is near 63 years of age, from disability is unable to support herself, and is dependent on her friends for support. That said John A. Hull contracted disabilities while in the line of duty in the service of his country in the late rebellion from which he never recovered and of which he died; that he was at the date of his death drawing a pension for such disabilities. That said Mary E. was dependent on her said brother, John A., for support during his life, and since his death on the charity of friends. That from medical evidence furnished your committee she is now, from age and disability, unable to work or labor to support herself.

That she is, and always has been, a lady of good and irreproachable character and reputation, respected by those who know her. That said Mary E., by her devotion to the family of her said brother, John A., caring for and rearing them from childhood to maturity, lost and abandoned the opportunities of young womanhood, and your committee, fully believing that after these years of devotion to this soldier of the Union and his children, she should in her old days be cared for by a generous Government, recommend that said bill do pass, with the following amendment, viz, in line 8 strike out the word "fifty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "twelve."

The amendment recommended in the last paragraph of the report was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. CASE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 147) granting a pension to George W. Case, late private Company B, Twenty-second New York Cavalry.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll of the United States the name of George W. Case, late a private of Company B, Twenty-Second New York Cavalry, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension now received by him under the act of June 27, 1890, the pension hereby granted to date from the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 147) granting an increase of pension to George W. Case, having fully considered the same, together with the evidence submitted, respectfully report:

From the records of the Pension Bureau it appears that George W. Case enlisted December 22, 1863, as a private in Company B, Twenty-second New York Volunteer Cavalry, and was honorably discharged August 1, 1865; that he is now on the pension roll of the United States under the act of June 27, 1890, and in receipt of a pension of $12 per month; that his application for further increase of his pension has been rejected because of failure to produce evidence required by the rules of the Pension Bureau. His present certificate recites as his disability paralysis of both hands and lower limbs, and the report of the examining surgeons upon which his present rating was established shows that his physical condition is such as to require the regular and constant attendance of another person.

The affidavits, photographs, and other evidence submitted to the committee show that Mr. Case is in a most pitiable condition. He is utterly helpless, can not stand upon his feet or move himself, can not feed himself, and has to be lifted onto his bed by a mechanical contrivance constructed for that purpose. He also suffers constant severe pain, sometimes of the most excruciating character. Dr. Jonathan Kneeland, his family physician, testifies:

"He (Case) is now and has been for over four years completely crippled in hands and feet. The nerves of sensation are keenly alive, and the sense of touch and feeling more acute than ever. He suffers from neuralgia very much, and in all changes of the weather, while the nerves of motion are so ailing that he can not even brush off a fly. I have never seen a person suffer more with no power of relief."

It is also shown by abundant testimony that Mr. Case is now in destitute circumstances, his savings have been exhausted, and he has been obliged to sell his modest home to defray the expenses attendant upon his long illness. He is now, and for some time past has been, dependent upon his relatives and friends and the small pension he receives.

The death of the surgeon and assistant surgeon of his regiment seems to have prevented Mr. Case from supplying evidence sufficient to enable him to trace his present disabilities to his army service, so as to bring him within the benefit of the general law relating to pensions. Your committee, while not questioning the justice of the action of the Bureau of Pensions in this case under the existing law and the rules and regulations governing the adjudication of pension claims, are of the opinion, after careful review of all the evidence submitted, that the present condition of Mr. Case is fairly attributable to exposure and injury received by him while in the service and in the line of his duty.

The evidence shows Mr. Case to have been, both while in the Army and since his discharge therefrom, a man of good habits and of excellent character. The evidence as a whole is exceptionally strong and convincing, and the witnesses are men of character and repute.

Your committee think this bill ought to pass, and so unanimously report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

UZZIEL B. CHURCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 711) to increase the pension of Uzziel B. Church.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension rolls Uzziel B. Church, late of Company D, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and late of Company I, Sixteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, at the rate of $20 per month.

The report (by Mr. WOOD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 711) for the relief of Uzziel B. Church, submit the following report:

The evidence in this case shows without controversy that the claimant was a soldier from July 10, 1862, to June 30, 1865, and has an honorable discharge and record. He received a gunshot wound, while in line of his duty, in the left forearm, for which he was pensioned, first at $2 per month, then $4, and in March, 1890, it was increased to $6, which he is now drawing. For this wound he is rated at six-eighteenths. He is now suffering from disease of lungs, for which he is rated twelve-eighteenths. He is confined to his bed and will be very soon a subject of charity.

For this last disability his application for increase was rejected by the Commissioner, whose decision, on appeal, was affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior, on the ground of no ratable disability under act of June 27, 1890, and that disease is not shown to have originated in service.

His first application made mention of no other disability than gunshot wound. April 24, 1890, he alleged that he contracted swamp fever in September, 1864, in Louisiana, which left a cough. The record shows treatment for malarial fever from September to November, 1864, and an attack of erysipelas in the spring of 1865.

Medical examinations of this claimant began in 1880, and confined themselves to wound of arm until 1890, but at the same time giving weight, respiration, and pulse. He was heavier in 1883 than in 1880, and in 1886 heavier than ever before. In 1886 medical certificate states: "No disability other than left forearm exists." In 1888 it closes with: "Lungs and heart normal." In 1890, after application on disability of lungs, his disability for that cause was rated at $4.

The surgeon of his regiment in 1890 makes no statement, because his books and records were turned over, and he can not recollect individual cases.

The testimony of two soldiers in the same company shows that in September, 1864, claimant contracted swamp fever in Louisiana, and was sent to camp hospital; as a result, there was an affection of the lungs and a distressing cough, which afflicted him at his discharge.

This testimony is corroborated by the record. The testimony of five other witnesses shows that from his discharge he has suffered from this disease—has never been in good health; and all this evidence, presumably given by credible witnesses, is now corroborated by the medical examination, showing his rating from disease of the lungs to be twelve-eighteenths.

The only contradiction to this evidence is the circumstance that in the numerous examinations made by examining boards of the injury from the gunshot wound, they made no mention of the lung disease and that claimant first applied only for pension from this wound.

In view of this evidence, and the further fact that the medical examinations disclosed disease of lungs when claimant first alleged it, and that he is now, as shown by the reports of examining boards, suffering from disease of lungs, your committee believe that this disease was contracted in the service and that he is now incapacitated for labor to the extent of two-thirds.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. AVERY. What is the rate, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. PICKLER. Twenty dollars per month.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CAROLINE PARKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2340) granting a pension to Caroline Parker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, at $12 per month, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Caroline Parker, of Waverly, Kans., widow of Asbury M. Parker, alias Asbery Parker, who enlisted in the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry, and was examined by Dr. Chenneworth, surgeon of the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry, was accepted, but was killed, with 16 other men who had enlisted, before they were mustered into the service; said men being killed in camp at Lawrence, Kans., on the 21st day of August, 1863, by Quantrill.

The report (by Mr. KIRKPATRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2340) granting a pension to Caroline Parker, submit the following report:

Caroline Parker is the mother of Asbury Parker, alias Asbery Parker, who enlisted in the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry at Lawrence, Kans., prior to the 21st day of August, 1863. Asbury Parker, with 22 others who had regularly enlisted for the Fourteenth Cavalry in the late war at Lawrence, Kans., had been examined and accepted by the surgeon of said regiment and in camp and under military orders, although not formally mustered in, and while so encamped, and on the 21st day of August, 1863, Quantrill and his command entered the city of Lawrence, killed about 200 of its citizens, including 17 of the recruits before mentioned, the said Asbury Parker being one.

The bill for the relief of the heirs of these 17 recruits was introduced in the Senate in the Forty-ninth Congress and was favorably reported and passed, and was also favorably reported for passage in the House.

Your committee are of the opinion that Asbury Parker lost his life in the service of his country prior to being regularly mustered in, and if the records had been completed there would have been no question but that his mother would be entitled to a pension; but the failure to perfect the papers resulting from an action of war in which this soldier lost his life, gives claim for Congressional action.

Your committee further report that Asbury Parker at the time of his death was a single man, leaving neither wife nor children.

Thomas Parker, father of the deceased, died March 27, 1874. Caroline Parker, the mother of the deceased soldier, is 72 years of age and in destitute circumstances.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the word "widow," in the seventh line, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "dependent mother," and by striking out all after the word "Cavalry," in the eighth line, and that the bill be passed as amended.

The amendments recommended in the last paragraph of the report were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MICHAEL BRICKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1616) to pension Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to inscribe on the pension roll of the United States Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind., late a private in Company D, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $12 per month, to date from the taking effect of this act.

The report (by Mr. KERR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1616) to pension Michael Bricker, submit the following report:

The beneficiary, Michael Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind., was a member of Company D, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and was pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, at the rate of $6 per month. On June 2, 1894, he made application for an increased rating, alleging total incapacity to perform manual labor. On the presentation of this claim for increase it was discovered by the Pension Bureau that the soldier had never been regularly mustered into the service, and he was consequently dropped from the rolls, and has received no pension since. The soldier was sick and at the hospital at the time his company was mustered, and the fact that he was not mustered seems to have been entirely overlooked, and he was regularly discharged by order of General Thomas, bearing date August 24, 1864, and was paid for his services subsequent to his discharge as a private in said company and regiment from August 29, 1863, to the day of his discharge.

Your committee, being satisfied that the soldier is totally incapacitated from the performance of manual labor, which would entitle him to a pension, except that he was not regularly mustered, believe this to be a case for the special intervention of Congress, and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "inscribe" and insert the word "place"; so as to make the language of this bill conform to that of pension bills generally.

The amendment was agreed to.

MRS. JANE DULANY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3698) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulany.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Mrs. Jane Dulany, widow of Col. William Dulany, from $50 to $100 per month.

The report (by Mr. MILES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3698) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulany, having carefully examined the same, respectfully submit the following report:

Jane Dulany is the widow of the late Col. William Dulany, of the United States Marine Corps, who died on the 4th of July, 1868.

This officer entered the service of the Corps June 10, 1817, as second lieutenant. He served continuously on shipboard and at different naval stations to July, 1828, having been promoted in the meantime to first lieutenant, captain by brevet, captain, and commanded the guard of the United States frigate Constitution in December, 1825.

He was the first officer of the Marine Corps to volunteer his services for field duty at the breaking out of the Florida war, and he served with conspicuous gallantry and untiring energy and devotion throughout that war, commanding the Marine and a part of the Army.

He was complimented by Major-General Jesup in General Order 102, and tendered the thanks of the country therein, and Gen. P. F. Smith also testified in the highest terms to the Navy Department his appreciation of Dulany's brilliant services, and in his honor Fort Dulany was named.

During these campaigns he was prostrated by disease, and advised by a surgeon that to remain longer in that malarious climate would endanger his life, but notwithstanding this advice he continued in the field until the close of the war, when he returned in command of his force.

When in command of Fort Pickens, in 1846, he again tendered his services for the Mexican war, and commanded the marines in that war with marked gallantry, and was at the storming and capture of the castle of Chapultepec and the capture of the Belen Gate and the City of Mexico, and in the meantime was promoted and commissioned major by brevet and major; and for gallant and meritorious conduct received, after the capture of the City of Mexico, as a high appreciation of his splendid and noble services, the brevet of lieutenant-colonel.

After the close of the Mexican war he served continuously in command of the Marine Barracks at New York, Boston, and Portsmouth; and, although a native of Virginia, at the firing of the first gun at Fort Sumter he again offered his services to his country for duty in the field, and he was at once commissioned by the lamented President Lincoln colonel and placed in command of the marine battalion at Norfolk, Va., and continued in active service until after the close of the late civil war.

On the 8th of November, 1865, after having served his country faithfully for almost half a century, he was retired under the act of Congress retiring officers of forty-five years' service. He died upon the retired list July 4, 1868, as before stated, leaving no blot upon his name. The physician who attended him in his last sickness certified that he died of congestion of the brain arising from causes produced while in the service of his country and in the line of duty.

A bill granting Mrs. Dulany $50 per month was enacted during the Forty-fourth Congress, and this is the rate of pension which she is now drawing.

Since that time, however, the pensioner has become blind; she is perfectly helpless and requires constant aid and attention.

Your committee, therefore, in view of all the facts, respectfully recommend that in line 6 of said bill the words "one hundred" be stricken out and the words "seventy-two" inserted in lieu thereof, so as to allow the pensioner $72 per month, and that as so amended the same do pass.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman in charge of this bill to make some explanation of it. I think the report is hardly sufficiently explanatory.

Mr. MILES. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from South Carolina that the splendid history which has just been read of this old veteran, whose widow it is proposed to pension by this bill, presents a better explanation of the merits of the proposition than any which I could hope to give to this House.

This bill, sir, was introduced by me by chance. My colleague, Mr. RUSK, filed a petition with our committee in behalf of this old lady, and because of his absence from the House about that time, and in consequence of the extreme old age and condition of this applicant, I felt compelled to bring the case speedily to the attention of the committee; and therefore it was without ever having seen this old woman, without knowing anything of her antecedents, except as I learned them from the reports submitted to the Forty-third, Forty-fourth, and Forty-seventh Congresses of the United States, I filed a bill in her behalf asking an increase of pension from that she is now receiving to $100 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions referred this bill to me as a subcommittee for consideration and report. I made, as my report to that committee, the report which was made to the Forty-seventh Congress of the United States, so that the language of that report in the main is not my own, but it speaks of Chapultepec and of the Belen Gate. It speaks, Mr. Chairman, of a war that this country waged forty years ago. It is all history to me. It comes to us hallowed by the memories of a war in which the guns of Lee and of Grant were fired in unison. It comes to us sanctified by the recollections of a period in our country's history when all the sections of this common country united to defend it against the aggressions of a foreign foe.

This old woman, sir, is 84 years of age, more than an octogenarian. Can it be possible, under these circumstances, that there is any member of this House who will object to this paltry increase in her pension, since the history which has been recited from the desk shows her to be the widow of a soldier who served first in the war of 1812, then in the Florida war, later on in the Mexican war, and finally who served throughout the war for the suppression of the rebellion?

Mr. Chairman, I think that the history of this case, as written in that report, speaks more eloquently and appeals more potently in behalf of this old woman to the members of this committee than any language that I could use. I submit the case, therefore, to the committee for its consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-two," so that the bill will read "$72 per month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. EVA DAVIS COGSWELL.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to the next bill on the Calendar, there is another bill very similar to the one which we have just passed, which should be on the Calendar about at this point, but has been omitted by some error. It has been reported by the committee. I refer to the bill to pension the widow of General Cogswell, late a member of this House; and I ask unanimous consent now that the gentleman from New York [Mr. POOLE] may present that bill, it being very similar, as I have stated, to the one just passed. It should be properly upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, before that is done I ask unanimous consent that the next bill to the one just passed, Calendar No. 23, be passed over without prejudice and retain its place on the Calendar. This bill was introduced by myself. It is a bill to pension Martha Brooks. I ask that it retain its place on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, I now call up the bill to which the gentleman from South Dakota referred, the bill to pension Mrs. Cogswell. I move the passage of Senate bill No. 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair, upon consideration, is inclined to doubt whether it is competent for the committee, under the order by which it meets to-night, to take up and pass that bill. It has not been referred, as the Chair understands, to the Calendar. It has not been reported by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from New York can explain that. It has been reported, however.

Mr. POOLE. This bill has been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, but by a mistake of the Clerk it was not printed in the regular order on the Calendar. It was passed some days ago by the committee, and should have been on the Calendar, occupying a place even above the place where it would appear under this order.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill has been reported?

Mr. POOLE. It has been reported favorably by the committee, and should be on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a different situation. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 1) granting a pension to Mrs. Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the general pension laws, the name of Mrs. Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell, at the rate of $75 per month.

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1) granting a pension to Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell, having carefully considered the same, adopt the accompanying Senate report (No. 5) as their own and respectfully recommend the passage of the bill.

[Senate Report No. 67, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1) granting a pension to Eva Davis Cogswell, have examined the same, and report and refer to the following military record:

It is shown by the official records that William Cogswell was mustered into service as captain of Company C, Second Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, May 25, 1861, to serve three years; was detailed as acting major of the regiment September 25, 1862; was mustered in as lieutenant-colonel February 28, 1863, to date October 23, 1862; as colonel, same regiment, July 11, 1863, to date June 25, 1863. Under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 3, 1884, and the acts amendatory thereof, he has been recognized by this Department as commissioned to the grade of colonel, Second Massachusetts Volunteers, to take effect from June 6, 1863. He was appointed brevet brigadier-general of volunteers to rank from December 12, 1864, and commissioned as such January 12, 1865.

By direction of the President he was assigned to duty as brevet brigadier-general of volunteers January 12, 1865, whereupon he was designated to command the Third Brigade, Third Division, Twentieth Army Corps, January 16, 1865. He assumed command of that brigade on the same day, and continued with the same until June 13, 1865, when the Twentieth Army Corps was discontinued. He was mustered out and honorably discharged the service as colonel, Second Regiment Massachusetts Infantry, and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, July 24, 1865. During the period of his service this officer was almost continuously on active duty in the field with his successive commands.

On May 3, 1863, in the Chancellorsville campaign near United Ford, Va., while lieutenant-colonel of the Second Massachusetts Infantry, he received a severe wound of the left arm, on account of which he was furloughed for thirty days on May 9, 1863.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment. Amend by striking out the words "one hundred" in line 7 and inserting in lieu thereof the words "seventy-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. This is the Senate bill, and it provides for the payment of $75 a month. We desired to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, and, as I understand it, this report is made on the Senate bill. So the question is on the bill itself as passed by the Senate at $75 a month. There is no amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. This is the Senate bill?

Mr. POOLE. We have adopted the Senate report in our report.

Mr. PICKLER. There is no amendment to the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The question is, Shall this bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation? Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUSAN D. WRIGHT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan D. Wright.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Susan D. Wright, former widow of James W. Wells, late a private in Company I, Tenth New York Volunteer Cavalry.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendment:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert in lieu thereof the words "at the rate of $12 per month."

The report (by Mr. POOLE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 952) granting a pension to Susan D. Wright, have duly considered the same, and report as follows:

It appears from the evidence submitted to the committee that Susan D. Wright, prior to her marriage to one Artemus Wright, was the widow of James W. Wells, of Company I, of the Tenth Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, who died April 27, 1864. As such widow she was placed upon the pension roll of the United States and was in receipt of a pension, under certificate No. 44793, from the date of her first husband's death to the 4th day of March, 1872.

On the 9th day of March, 1872, said Susan D. Wright (then Wells) was remarried to Artemus Wright and has since drawn no pension, and her name has been dropped from the pension roll of the United States.

On the 25th day of May, 1894, said Artemus Wright died at Middlebury, in State of Connecticut, and said Susan D. Wright again became and now is the a widow.

Said Susan D. Wright is in indigent circumstances and in poor health, having no means of support except her daily labor. She is now 61 years of age, and by reason of age and feeble health is unable to do hard work.

Having carefully considered the bill, and in view of the foregoing facts, your committee recommend that the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," in lines 5 and 6, be stricken out, and the words "at the rate of $12 per month" be inserted in lieu thereof, and that as so amended the bill do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If I understand this case correctly, this lady became the widow of the soldier, remarried, and is again a widow. I should like to inquire if that is the fact?

Mr. PICKLER. That is as I understand it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I think we have gone quite far enough when we have pensioned soldiers' widows who have not remarried, especially if the marriage to the soldier took place long after his service. I am thoroughly of the opinion that no woman who marries a soldier at this time, thirty years after the soldier's service in the Army, should ever be pensioned. If she takes the man as a husband because she loves him, she does not take him because of his service solely, and there is no reason in my mind why, after this long period has elapsed, she should receive a pension at all. This case goes even beyond that. After this woman became the widow of the soldier, and was entitled to a pension under the statutes of the United States, she saw fit voluntarily to relinquish that pension and to remarry. I am opposed to the granting of pensions under those circumstances, and I do not believe there is a proper justification for them. For one I stand here to oppose such pensions, and shall continue to oppose them whenever they are presented, unless some better reason can be given for their enactment than I believe can possibly be given. I think this woman should stand by her own election, and that this rule should go out before the country as one upon which all must stand. I am opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. POOLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] is mistaken in his premises. I understand him to say that this woman did not marry the soldier until a number of years after the war.

Mr. BAKER of New Hamsphire. Will the gentleman permit me? The gentleman has misunderstood me. I laid that down as a principle, but not as one applicable in this case. I said that this woman was the widow of the soldier, and as such became entitled to a pension, but subsequently by her own option relinquished her right to that pension by remarriage, and that now, as I understand, it is the object of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to pension her after she had voluntarily abandoned all right to a pension under the statutes of the United States.

Mr. POOLE. I misunderstood the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. POOLE. I have not yielded the floor. She married this soldier before the war. She was his wife until he died, during the war. He was killed in battle April 27, 1864, and she received a pension as his widow.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is right.

Mr. POOLE. To that extent we both agree. The point upon which we disagree is this: She did voluntarily give up this pension and marry another man. By so doing she relieved the Government of the payment of the $8 a month that she was receiving, and would have continued to be entitled to receive but for her re-marriage. For the length of time that she was remarried the Government was relieved from the payment of that pension. Her second husband died and she is destitute to-day, an old woman, and she again appeals to us to place her upon the pension roll. I think it is right that under such circumstances, where a woman has voluntarily saved the payment of $8 a month during the time of her remarriage, then, after she has again become a widow, she should again be placed upon the pension roll. I think we ought to place all widows of that class upon the rolls again. I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I just want to answer the gentleman from New Hampshire on the general proposition, and say if there is one class of women or class of widows who ought to be pensioned it is this class. Now, here is a woman who was a widow of a soldier killed in battle. She is his widow to-day. You can not blot that out. I do not mean in a legal sense. But she is the same woman who sent this young man into the war, and he was lost there, as he lost his life. Now, suppose she has remarried; she has saved this Government $1,820. And I wish the Committee on Invalid Pensions would bring in a general bill and make it the law if a woman remarries, that during the continuance of that marriage her pension shall be suspended, but on the death of the second or third husband, if she has one, she shall be again placed on the pension rolls unless the second or third husband shall have left her a competency on which to live. There is no reason or justice in depriving this woman of a pension.

In the case of a woman who lost her husband in the service of his country and was placed upon the pension rolls because he lost his life, I would keep her there as long as she lived, even if she married a dozen men. [Laughter and applause.] What reason or justice is there in this country taking the pension from the widow of a soldier who died in actual battle if she does see proper in after years to take another partner that she may have a companion during the remaining days of her life? That is her pension, and I say she should not be deprived of her pension on that account. I do hope that the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions will bring in a bill providing that these women who remarry shall not lose their pensions, because there are a great many who are getting well advanced in years, but there are still some who are 65 or 70 who do marry other men.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I presume the reason why a pension has ever been granted to a widow is because in the death of the husband she has lost the natural protector of her life and the one to whom she could naturally look for support. When a woman remarries she regains all that.

Mr. MAHON. Not always.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And if she does not regain it, that is her misfortune; and she is no more liable to make a mistake in her maturer years than in her younger years.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I understand you are a bachelor, and therefore it is supposed that you do not sympathize with those who have married.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I plead guilty to one part of the impeachment and not to the other. [Laughter.] I am a bachelor; but I believe that when a woman marries and has a good husband that she ought to be content with that without a pension.

But now, coming back to the case, here is an instance: The woman marries; she becomes a widow, and under the circumstances of her becoming a widow she is entitled under the laws of the United States to a pension. She voluntarily relinquishes that pension for the privilege of marrying again. She has chosen her own option; she has taken it deliberately; and having made the selection, she should be bound by it.

Again, even if that were not so, it would be inappropriate to grant this pension in the way proposed by the committee, because it is not a solitary instance; it is not a lone case. There are unquestionably 50,000 cases just like it, and there is no reason why the time of this House should be taken up here this evening, or any other evening, in considering questions where there is only one of a great class like the present one. If this thing is done it should be done deliberately, by a general act, and under a law which should be made applicable to all. I am opposed to this one to-night, as I should oppose the general enactment, and certainly it is not appropriate that this case should pass. There are those around me who have already stated that they have twenty-five bills that they want to put in if this becomes law, and this Committee on Invalid Pensions will be swamped by these bills, to the utter exclusion of those of greater merit. I therefore oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to detain the committee a moment. If my memory serves me right, and I am quite sure it does, the Committee on Invalid Pensions in the last House reported a general bill for this particular purpose. If we were to agree with the argument of the gentleman from New Hampshire, we would do away with all these bills. His argument is simply because we have no general law that we should not pass a single bill. Now, is that any reason why we should not do justice to single individuals until a general bill is passed? And, Mr. Chairman, it is beyond comprehension that any gentleman can lead himself up to reason that a widow having married a second husband and he dies, she should be cut off from her pension when she again becomes a widow.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Having been the widow of the soldier during the service, having given him to the service, and made the sacrifice necessary when he went into the Army.

Mr. PICKLER. If you are in favor of that why are you not in favor of the soldier, when he remarries, losing his pension?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will tell the gentleman why if he will permit me.

Mr. PICKLER. I can not yield now. The laws of all civilized countries encourage marriage. It begets homes. It is a moral proceeding. It builds up communities. It is believed to redound to the happiness of the people and to their morality and prosperity. Now, why should a woman, if her soldier husband goes down to the grave, and she has twenty-five or thirty years before her and some good man proposes to marry her and care for her and give her a good home in her declining years—why should she lose, on that account, the advantage of the pension in case her second husband dies? The pension is suspended during the second marriage, but why should she not have it again when the husband dies? To say that she should not is simply to discourage marriage. It is simply saying to the widows of soldiers: "You shall not have a comfortable home, even if some good man offers to provide it for you." Moreover, the economical aspect of this question, stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, ought to be considered. While the widow is married the Government is paying her no pension, and I merely wish to add that if gentlemen would consider the age of these old veterans, their diseases, their rheumatism, their pains and aches, and their general disabilities, I think they would be convinced that any woman who lives with one of them now for even a year is entitled to a pension for all the rest of her life. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I am exceedingly sorry that any pension case coming before this House should, under any circumstances, meet with my disapprobation. I am one of those who believe, as I stated on this floor the other day, that the debt of gratitude, and not only of gratitude, but the actual business debt, if you choose to call it so, which this Government owes to the soldier, is one that is incalculable, and no man will charge me with being in any way unfavorable to the idea of pensions, without regard to the amount, within the scope of our ability to pay.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is an element in the pension laws that I think it is our duty to remember and try to be consistent with. We all know that the Pension Bureau, from some source of power that I stated the other day I did not believe originated in the Bureau itself, has established the principle that pensions is a gratuity, that it is a gift, that the man, the woman, or the child who obtains a pension obtains it because we, as the representatives of the people, feel that we owe them some little favor, or that in the goodness of our hearts and in our patriotism we wish to give them something. I for one, with the Republican members generally, and, I believe, with many of our Democratic friends, have stated that that is not the proper basis of the pension system, that a pension is a right, not a gratuity.

Mr. MILES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILES. Does not the idea that it is a gift from the Government ennoble the pension rather than degrade it?

Mr. BRUMM. No, sir.

Mr. MILES. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman.

Mr. BRUMM. Well, you are entitled to your opinion; but my opinion is that a pension is a debt, that the obligation of the Government to grant it is a matter of right, and that the function of the legislative power in the matter is merely to say what the amount shall be and to provide for the system under which the soldier may demand and receive his pension as a right. Now, if the pension is a right, it is a right that is due to the woman, whether she be mother, widow, or daughter of the soldier; not because she is a mother; not because she is a widow; not because she is a daughter, but because her son or her husband or her father did service for the country. In other words, it is because of her relationship to the soldier that we grant her a pension. It is not because the woman happens to be old or poor, but simply because of her relationship to the dead soldier.

Now, if, having been married to a soldier, the woman breaks that relation herself, whether the soldier dies or not, if she chooses to change her relationship to him, which is the condition precedent, which is the very foundation upon which the granting of a pension to her is based, why should she not forfeit that pension? I repeat, her title to a pension is based, not upon the fact that she is old, not upon the fact that she is poor, but upon the fact of her relationship to the soldier. The argument was made here the other day that the woman who was married to a soldier and who has become a widow ought to have a pension, and that the question of poverty should not be raised at all, and we on this side maintained that that was the proper doctrine.

The question of poverty is a mere incident which may exist in any given case, but it is not the basis upon which the pension should be granted. Proverty being an incident in some cases, it may tend to regulate the amount of the pension, but that is all. The essence of the matter is, the principle upon which the widow is entitled to a pension is, that she is the widow of a soldier, and the moment she relinquishes that position her right to the pension dies. It dies upon the very principle that we have argued and maintained on our side of the House ever since I have been in Congress, the principle that the woman's relationship to the soldier is what entitles her to a pension, that her right to a pension rests wholly upon the service of her husband.

A soldier enters the service, leaving a wife at home; he dies in the service, and thereupon his widow becomes entitled to a pension. She has a right to say, "My husband is dead, and by virtue of my relationship to him I have a right to demand a certain amount of pension which is my due." Now, that woman determines to marry again, and when she does, her right to the pension dies. She relinquishes it of her own free will. She has changed her relationship to the dead soldier. No one has changed it for her; she has changed it herself. It is a voluntary act on her part, and having changed that relationship, when she comes and asks for a renewal of the pension we ought to be consistent and say to her: "No matter how poor you may be, no matter how old you may be, you are not entitled to a pension, because we do not give these pensions as gratuities; we give them upon the principle that the applicant is the widow or other surviving dependent relative of the dead soldier."

Mr. MAHON. I will ask my colleague whether all pensions to widows are not based on this principle: That while the Government can not restore what it has taken away, the life of the husband, it will, as far as possible, repair the injury that has been done to the widow by allowing her a certain amount of money in the form of pension. Is not that the principle upon which widows' pensions are based?

Mr. BRUMM. Oh, no.

Mr. MAHON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. No. There is no such thing as compensating in dollars and cents for the blood of the soldiers of the Union. [Applause.] It can not be done.

Mr. MAHON. I speak of the widows.

Mr. BRUMM. Even as to the widows, you can not compensate them in dollars and cents. There is a principle involved that goes beyond dollars and cents, and I stand here in favor of the widows and the orphans and the mothers of our soldiers to assert that principle, because I am in favor of it.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman contend, when the widow of the soldier marries a second time, that she reveres any the less the memory of her dead husband? Has she less respect for his memory because she marries again?

Mr. BRUMM. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I would be sorry to be the keeper of the consciences and the affections of all the widows in this country. I would not undertake anything of that kind. The question of the gentleman has no relevancy to the discussion of this question.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the gentleman can answer yes or no.

Mr. BRUMM. The presumption is that when a widow marries another man it is because she loves him and that she loves none other, and I am not going to answer any further the question than this, for it is not necessary. The soldier's widow has just as good a right to marry as any other widow, and I could only wish that every soldier's widow throughout this broad land could marry and be taken care of by her husband very much better than the Government takes care of them under our present pension system.

But this question of remarriage is a matter of election with her. She marries and takes her chance. If she changes the relationship which she holds toward the Government, she loses her right to demand a pension. That is my view of the case, and gentlemen in dealing with this question should be consistent. You can not say in the one instance this matter of pension is a right, and that they should demand it, and then when that relationship which the party holds toward the Government is changed come in and declare, as gentlemen do on this side of the House occasionally, that the pension is a mere matter of charity. Let it be the one or the other. If it is a matter of right, then that right terminates when she changes her relationship.

But there is another thought to which I shall briefly allude. There is an effort being made all over the country, north as well as south of us—why, we have some in the North not very far from us, Republicans as well as Democrats—few of them, comparatively, perhaps—who are finding fault with the immense amount of money that is being paid out to the soldiers in the way of pensions. They are poisoning the minds of the people because of the amount—the number of dollars and cents involved. This sentiment, Mr. Chairman, is being nursed and fostered among a certain class of people, and it is becoming somewhat dangerous in certain localities, against the pension laws and the pensions to be granted to worthy soldiers as well as to the worthy widows, mothers, and daughters of soldiers.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a motion to rise, and let this bill remain until the next evening? We must rise in a few moments, in order to succeed in passing the bills which have been acted upon by the committee.

Mr. BRUMM. I will close with a few words. I will occupy but a very brief time of the committee. It will save time for me to continue now and conclude what I desire to say upon this subject.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope the gentleman will yield to the motion and let this matter go over, as there is a question I would like to ask him before the debate closes. Let it go over until next week.

Mr. BRUMM. I do not care to occupy further time upon this particular question, and prefer to conclude now.

There is such a thing, Mr. Chairman, as riding a pension and a good thing to death; and if we want to do the right and proper thing for the soldiers of this country, and for their orphans and widows, we must be sure to be consistent as we proceed, and the American people, with argument properly in our favor, will stand with us, and the question of dollars and cents will be but a small item in their estimation.

That is all I desired to say upon this question.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills to the House with the recommendations of the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HEPBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the pension bills on the Private Calendar, had directed him to report sundry bills to the House with various recommendations; and also that the committee had had under consideration House bill No. 952, and had come to no resolution thereon.

BILLS PASSED.

The following bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole, were severally considered, the House bills ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and the Senate bills ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood;

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 24, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Auditor for the State and other Departments, of the 23d instant, submitting additional items of deficiencies in appropriations for expenses of United States courts, and recommending that the same be included in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying statement, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of December 30, 1895, the correspondence and other papers in his possession relating to the First National Bank of Orlando, Fla., and the receiver last appointed, and the transactions connected with the bank under his administration, together with a report of the Comptroller of the Currency; which, on motion of Mr. CALL, was referred to the Select Committee on National Banks, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 13th instant, calling for information as to what amount is necessary to be appropriated for payment of the cost of sites for the purpose of erecting fortifications and coast defenses, a report of W. P. Craighill, brigadier-general, Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on the subject; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, in response to a resolution of December 3, 1895, calling for the number of suits against the United States filed in the Court of Claims and not adjudicated at the commencement of the present term thereof, with certain specified details, stating that the suits against the Government in that court are separated into two distinct classes, the first class including all except suits for Indian depredations, and the second including those for Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Auditor for the War Department, submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for pay of two and three year volunteers' certified claims for the current fiscal year, amounting to $75,000, and recommending that the same be included in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

MARYLAND AND WASHINGTON RAILWAY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of the Baltimore and Catonsville Construction Company, transmitting, in compliance with law, the first annual statement of the receipts and disbursements of the Maryland and Washington Railway Company of the District of Columbia; which, with the accompanying statement, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLEN. I present the petitions of D. C. Zink, of Grand Island, Nebr.; of George C. McKay, of North Platte, Nebr., and of John H. Blacklock, of Baltimore, Md., in favor of the passage of the bill heretofore introduced by me authorizing the creditors of insolvent national banks to elect a permanent receiver. I move that the petitions be referred to the Select Committee on National Banks.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VEST presented resolutions adopted by the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of St. Louis, Mo., indorsing the resolution upon the Armenian question lately offered by Senator Hoar; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM. I present a series of resolutions adopted by the First Congregational Church of Manasquan, N. J., relating to the Armenian question and calling upon Congress to demand of the Turkish Government that it protect our own citizens dwelling or passing through its Empire. As the subject has been reported upon, I ask that the petition lie on the table.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Illinois pardon an interruption? What has become of the resolutions which were reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations relating to the Armenian question?

Mr. CULLOM. The resolutions are upon the table, and I have been waiting for two days since I reported them to call them up. As the Senator may remember, I asked to have them taken up for consideration at once, but it was suggested that they ought to be printed before being considered, and hence they went over. I desired to call them up yesterday.

Mr. PLATT. I understood they were to be taken up the next day after they were laid over.

Mr. CULLOM. They were to have been taken up yesterday, but several Senators were very anxious to address the Senate, and I gave way and gave notice that I would call them up this morning. I hope that immediately after the morning business, as I believe their consideration will take very little time, I may be given the floor for the purpose of calling up those resolutions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition presented by the Senator from Illinois will lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of the Peace Society of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation looking to the restoration of peace in Cuba through arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Peace Society of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation creating a peace fund to consist of 1 per cent of all sums appropriated for war purposes; such fund to be drawn upon by the President for the purpose of settling difficulties by mediation, arbitration, and conciliation; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the speedy passage of the pending tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that appropriations be made for the completion of the general scheme of coast defenses; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 179, to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels engaged in the coasting trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 180, licensing masters and chief mates of sail vessels over 700 tons; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of House bills Nos. 1227 to 1233, inclusive, proposing amendments to the navigation laws; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition in the form of resolutions adopted at the annual meeting of National Council, Order of United American Mechanics, held in Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of House bill No. 884, making it unlawful for any person to print, stamp, or impress any words, figures, or designs upon the flag of the United States, or any representation thereof; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of H. H. Minnick and 29 other citizens of Rock, of H. C. McKinley and 73 other citizens of Meyersdale, of Frank Patterson and 22 other citizens of Fayette County, of H. C. Lewis and 94 other citizens of Cokeville, and of J. A. Warden and 270 other citizens of Allegheny County, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. PEFFER. I present a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the District of Columbia, praying for legislation in relation to Armenian affairs. The petitioners state that they represent a membership and following of not fewer than 1,000 people who believe that the protection of the home is the supreme duty of statesmen, and they earnestly and solemnly beseech Congress to take such action as shall put our home-loving Republic on record as having used its moral and material influence by the expression of its opposition to the Armenian outrages. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Warren, Mass., remonstrating against the atrocities in Armenia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Washington, praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Skagit River in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TURPIE presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that appropriations be made for the completion of the general scheme of coast defenses; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 179 to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels engaged in the coasting trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of House bills 1227 to 1233, inclusive, proposing amendments to the navigation laws; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 180, licensing masters and chief mates of sail vessels of over 700 tons; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of the Federation of Labor of the District of Columbia, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1247, creating a public circulating library for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. THURSTON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Falls City, Nebr., ex-soldiers and ex-sailors of the Union Army and Navy during the war of the rebellion, praying for the enactment of legislation granting a pension of $8 a month to every man who served not less than ninety days in the Army or Navy and was honorably discharged, and also that a pension of not less than $12 a month be granted to the widows of these soldiers or sailors; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of the managing board of the Boston Evangelical Alliance, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to the American missions in Turkey, and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HAWLEY presented a petition of the Board of Trade of New London, Conn., praying Congress to take such action as is necessary to make the Great Salt Pond in Block Island a permanent harbor of refuge; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Me., praying for the further improvement of Portland Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SENATOR FROM DELAWARE.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present the affidavit of William Michael Byrne, of Wilmington, Del., relative to the case of Henry A. Du Pont, claiming to have been elected a Senator from that State. I move that the affidavit be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In this connection I ask for the adoption of the order I send to the desk.

The order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be authorized to sit during the sessions of the Senate, for the purpose of considering the claim of Henry A. Du Pont to a seat in the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BERRY. On the 22d instant the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE], on behalf of a majority of the Committee on Public Lands, reported with amendments the bill (S. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the payment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands." I desire, on behalf of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], and myself, to file the views of the minority, and I ask that they be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority will be received and printed.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 753) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 641) to promote Commodore Louis C. Sartori, now on the retired list of the Navy, to be a rear-admiral on said list, in accordance with his original position on the Navy Register, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 642) for the relief of Commodore Oscar C. Badger, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 716) to correct the naval history of John C. Dull, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 982) to grant medals to survivors and heirs of volunteers of the Port Hudson (La.) forlorn-hope storming column, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CRIPPLE CREEK DISTRICT, COLORADO.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate relating to printing the paper entitled "Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado," to report back the amendment of the House of Representatives and move that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was read and concurred in, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, January 20, 1896.

Resolved, That the foregoing concurrent resolution of the Senate to print a paper entitled "Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado," do pass with the following amendment:

Line 2, strike out all after "That," down to and including line 16, and insert: "There be printed, at the earliest day practicable, 5,000 copies, in separate form, with paper covers, of the paper entitled 'Geology and mining industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado,' constituting pages 1 to 209 of part 2 of the Sixteenth Annual Report of the United States Geological Survey, with the accompanying illustrations, of which 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 copies for distribution by the Geological Survey."

EULOGIES ON DECEASED REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment; and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania; upon the Hon. Marcus C. Lisle, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky; and upon the Hon. George W. Houk, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, be printed as required by law.

DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICIAL RECORDS.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 88) authorizing the distribution of copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in Congressional districts where distribution has not been made, to report it without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to send the undistributed copies of the Official Records of the War of the Rebellion, both of the Union and of the Confederate navies, to such libraries, organizations, and individuals as may be designated before the meeting of the next Congress by the Representatives in the Fifty-fourth Congress of the districts whose Representatives in the Fifty-third Congress failed to designate the distributees of their quota of the Official Records or any part thereof, as authorized by the act of Congress approved July 31, 1894, and the joint resolution approved March 2, 1895, to the extent and in the manner and form provided in that act.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPUBLICAN FORM OF GOVERNMENT IN ALABAMA.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 7th instant providing for a select committee to make inquiry whether there is, and for the last two years and a half has been, a republican form of government in the State of Alabama, reported it back with the recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; which was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to call the attention of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to the bill I am about to report. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill., to report it favorably, without amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senate to put the joint resolution upon its passage.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CULLOM. The joint resolution comes from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has been considered by that committee. It has been passed by the other House. The men employed on that work are laid off and are now simply waiting until this little change in the law shall be made. It does not incur a single cent of additional expense, and delay simply results in idleness on the part of the workmen who have been engaged upon that building for the last year or more. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not object to its present consideration.

Mr. ALLEN. The statement the Senator from Illinois makes is true with reference to every public building. There seems to have been a little ring in the Senate on the question of obtaining public buildings. For instance, Illinois now has under construction in the city of Chicago a building for which an appropriation of about $5,000,000 has been made.

Mr. CULLOM. Only $4,000,000.

Mr. ALLEN. It will cost $8,000,000 before it is completed.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator has no right to make that statement.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Pennsylvania a few days ago got a bill through for the construction of a public building. At the last Congress it was quite a common thing for the Eastern States and the Middle Western States to procure large appropriations for the construction of public buildings. We west of the Missouri River, with the exception of one or two instances, have been unable to get even $25,000 or $30,000 appropriated for the construction of public buildings at places where the Federal court is held at least twice a year.

It occurs to me that the proper thing to do is for the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to take up all such measures that are pending before it and consider them all at the same time, so that every locality in the Union may have an equal opportunity to procure its fair proportion of the public expenditures.

Mr. CULLOM. If this were an original bill providing for the construction of a public building at the city of Bloomington I would not seek to put it upon its immediate passage, but for years the law has been passed providing for the construction of the building and the work has been going on. A point has been reached where it is necessary to change the previous legislation a little so that there may be changes of plans with reference to the construction in order to keep the cost of the building within the amount already appropriated.

Mr. WHITE. Will the Senator from Illinois permit a question?

Mr. CULLOM. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. Is any appropriation whatever involved in the joint resolution?

Mr. CULLOM. Not one penny.

Mr. WHITE. Then there is nothing to be taken out of the Treasury by it?

Mr. CULLOM. Not a penny is asked to be taken out of the Treasury. A specific clause in the joint resolution provides that the change shall not cost a single additional cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Nebraska made a very sweeping remark. I think he is in the habit of doing that. He says that in the last Congress a great many bills were passed for public buildings in the East. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that not one single bill, as I recollect it, passed the last Congress for a public building in any one of the Eastern States. For my own State a bill had passed the Senate, I think twice, providing for a public building, but I could not even get a report from the committee in the last Congress. I think I am correct in saying that the Senator entirely misstates the fact when he says that numerous public-building bills passed the last Congress for States east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I desire to return my thanks to the Senator from New Hampshire for his kindly remark, wherein he says that I am in the habit of being a little bit extravagant in my language. I had no idea at the time I made the remark that the Senator from New Hampshire was any considerable portion of the East, nor do I have an opinion of that kind at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. ALLEN. I was not referring to New England. Therefore I think my remark does not come within the jurisdiction of a Senator from New England.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. I was referring to that portion of this country east of the Mississippi River that has constantly received appropriations amounting to millions of dollars for the construction of public buildings, and has studiously opposed, with here and there a rare and grudging exception, the appropriation of any money for the construction of needed public buildings in the transmississippi States. For instance, in my own State there are two points where a Federal court has been established for years, and where it is necessary for the transaction of public business that a public building shall be constructed. We have asked here from time to time for the mere pittance of $25,000 or $50,000 for the purchase of ground and for the construction of those buildings. Those propositions have been studiously met with resistance by the committee from which this report comes.

I am not unappreciative of the position of the Senator from Illinois, and yet it occurs to me that if this joint resolution is permitted to pass here without any objection and without due debate when taken up from the Calendar in its regular order we shall find the Senator from Illinois a little bit indifferent as to the result of public buildings that may be asked for points a little farther west than the State of Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator allow me to make a remark right there?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Nebraska will never find me opposing any legitimate appropriation that can be shown to be in the public interest, either for Nebraska or any other State in the Union. This is not a new measure, and it does not appropriate any money; it simply proposes to allow the work to go on; it has been suggested by the honored President of the Senate, the Vice-President of the United States, and I appeal to the Senator that he allow the joint resolution to go through so that those men may continue their work.

Mr. ALLEN. It is hard for me to resist the appeal of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CULLOM. I know you can not do it very well.

Mr. ALLEN. In view of the fact that the joint resolution does not involve an appropriation, I will withdraw my objection to its consideration; but I give notice here and now that I shall enter my objection to all such bills hereafter.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Nebraska is unjust to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. He makes the statement that there has been some discrimination in favor of States east of the Mississippi River. It is true that the enumeration of public buildings and the expenditures for their construction show that the appropriations were unequal in some of the States, and that one State in New England particularly had received largely more in the shape of public buildings than any other State in the Union, population considered; but in later years such discrimination has not existed, and it certainly did not exist during the last Congress. As chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds at that time I can safely appeal to the record. It is very well known to all the members of the committee that we resisted the most passionate appeals for appropriations as to new public buildings, and we made appropriations only to complete buildings already commenced and to prevent the decay and deterioration of the material by reason of a postponement.

I think if the Senator will look into the appropriations he will find that Congress for the last five years has been unusually liberal to the Western States. I call his attention to the fact that at the last session almost the only public-building bill we reported—there were several—but the bill of most importance was one giving to four of the new States a public building each; a sort of omnibus bill.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me to interrupt him at this point, I will state that those were twenty-five-thousand-dollar public buildings at the capital of three of the important Western States; but outside of the appropriations for those three States there was not an appropriation of any consequence for the construction of public buildings in the transmissouri country.

Mr. VEST. I only know, I will state in reply to the last utterance of the Senator, that that bill was prepared and agreed upon by the Senators representing those new States, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds simply acceded to their request.

I wish to make one other remark and I am done with the subject. Any committee that undertakes to perform its duty and does not take into consideration the condition of the Treasury of the United States as to appropriations is absolutely derelict, if not criminal. When the present Secretary of the Treasury took charge of his office, and after the financial difficulties occurred, I had an official interview with him, in which he simply made the suggestion that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the two Houses—it is a joint committee—should not recommend appropriations unless they were absolutely necessary, on account of the financial uncertainties that hung over the country. During my administration of the chairmanship of that committee in this present Administration of Mr. Cleveland, I have endeavored to be as economical as possible in regard to these appropriations because we were involved in financial uncertainty, and I think I did my duty.

If the Senator will reflect a moment he will see that it is impossible, speaking for myself, that I could have discriminated against my own section of the country, if I had any sectional views at all. There is a large public building unfinished in the State of Missouri, in the city where I live, and while I was urged and pressed by citizens for an additional appropriation in order that the money might be expended there during the hard times that were prevailing, I steadily refused to countenance any such appropriation, although I was a citizen and interested in the property of that city and a Senator from that State. I think the Senator is mistaken as to his facts, and he does injustice, without, of course, intending it.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I am exceedingly anxious that the Senator from Illinois shall get his joint resolution through, I will make a single observation in reply to the Senator from Nebraska.

If the Senator from Nebraska will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-morrow morning—and I assure him that it will not be changed—he will find that in my former remarks I did not allude to New England, but to States east of the Mississippi River. I so distinctly stated, and hence his disagreeable criticism on that point was very unjust.

The Senator from Nebraska says that a great many public-building bills have been passed in the last Congress for States east of the Mississippi River. I wish the Senator would examine the statutes and tell the Senate at his convenience precisely the number of public-building bills that did pass during the last Congress, either east or west of the Mississippi River. I feel confident that no such bill became a law. The only appropriations made in that Congress were to complete buildings the construction of which was already commenced.

That is all I care to say about the matter. We want to deal justly with all parts of the country, and I feel sure that we do that. If I remember correctly, an appropriation was made during the last Congress for a public building in the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska. I think I am correct in that, and I wish the Senator from Nebraska would note the fact.

Mr. CULLOM. Now I hope the joint resolution will be put on its passage.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MANTLE introduced a bill (S. 1742) for the relief of Thomas Cushing; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. FAULKNER, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the bill for the relief of Robert Thompson in the Fifty-third Congress be withdrawn from the files of the Senate under the rules of the Senate.

PROOF OF LOYALTY IN PENSION CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. PRITCHARD, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 901) amending section 4716 of the Revised Statutes, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. In accordance with the notice given yesterday, I desire, with the consent of the Senate, to call up the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriation for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] wishes to address the Senate this morning. Therefore I ask that the bill (S. 1714) to repeal "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, and "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, introduced yesterday by me, and which had its first reading, may lie over until the next meeting of the Senate. I gave notice that I should ask for its second reading to-day, and that I wish to obtain a vote of the Senate on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am much obliged to the Senator from Texas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will lie over, as requested by the Senator from Texas, in the absence of objection.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from North Dakota if he has any objection to allowing the Calendar of resolutions to be called.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that that order has not yet been reached. The present order of business is "concurrent and other resolutions." The morning business has not yet been concluded.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from North Dakota desires to make a speech, he can do so after the Calendar of resolutions has been called and the morning business is over.

PAYMENT OF SUGAR BOUNTY.

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the message of the President of the United States, received on the 22d instant, in response to the resolution inquiring what action had been taken, if any, in regard to the payment of sugar-bounty claims, and, if no payment had been made, to give the Senate the reasons therefor. I desire to have the reference of the message of the President of the United States changed from the Committee on Finance to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I would state, Mr. President, that I was not in the Chamber when the message was laid before the Senate and the reference was made to the Finance Committee. I suppose it was on the request of some Senator that it was so referred.

I desire to call the attention of the Judiciary Committee to the very grave matters springing out of this message. In the sundry civil appropriation act of March 2, 1895, there was an appropriation of some $5,238,000 for the payment of a bounty on sugar.

Some time in July, 1895, immediately after the law went into effect, the claim of the Oxnard Beet Sugar Company for some $11,000 was presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and was by him certified for payment to the Auditor. The Auditor took the claim and certified it to the Comptroller of the Treasury. The Comptroller of the Treasury then took it under advisement, under the authority of the eighth section of the Dockery Act, declined to pay it on the ground of its unconstitutionality, and referred it to the Court of Claims under the powers given in section 1063 of the Revised Statutes.

In response to the inquiry contained in the Senate resolution referred to by me, the President writes thus to the Senate:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution adopted by the Senate on December 16, 1895, respecting what action had been taken in regard to the payment of the appropriation for the bounty on sugar, contained in the sundry civil bill approved March 2, 1895, I herewith transmit a communication received from the Secretary of the Treasury, which contains all the information I have upon the subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 22, 1896.

The communication of the Secretary of the Treasury, which immediately follows, sets out that this bounty appropriation came up in the shape of a claim made by the Oxnard Company, was duly certified, as I have stated, was taken before the Comptroller, and that the Comptroller referred it to the Court of Claims for adjudication under section 1063 of the Revised Statutes referred to by me. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury does not state—perhaps it was not necessary for him to state—the reasons why the Comptroller of the Treasury referred this bounty claim or this part of the bounty claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. President, the very grave question arises whether or not a subordinate official of the Treasury Department, when a claim is properly certified to him, when the law authorizing the claim has been construed so as to include that claim and to authorize that payment, can refuse to pay the appropriation on the ground that he thinks the law authorizing it to be unconstitutional. This sets up a new construction, never heretofore adopted by any subordinate official of the Treasury or any other subordinate official that I am aware of, and places in the power of subordinate officials the practical nullification of appropriations made by Congress.

In asking for the reference of the message to the Judiciary Committee, instead of the Finance Committee, I mean no sort of disparagement to the Finance Committee, but I imagine that with the volume of work now upon them in the shape of financial legislation they, although perhaps otherwise qualified, might not be able to devote to this subject the attention it deserves. I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that the request I make will be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The change of reference will be made, in the absence of objection.

ARMENIAN OUTRAGES.

Mr. CALL. I hope that the regular order will now be observed, and that the resolutions which are on the table of the Vice-President coming over from previous days will be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions referred to will be laid before the Senate at the proper time. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order. If there be none such, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the resolutions be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions reported by Mr. CULLOM from the Committee on Foreign Relations January 22, 1896, as follows.

Whereas the supplementary treaty of Berlin, July 13, 1878, between the Ottoman Empire and Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia contains the following provisions:

"LXI.

"The Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out without further delay the ameliorations and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds.

"It will periodically make known these steps taken to this effect to the powers, and will superintend their application.

"LXII.

"The Sublime Porte having expressed the wish to maintain the principle of religious liberty, to give it the widest scope, the contracting parties take note of this spontaneous declaration.

"In no part of the Ottoman Empire shall difference of religion be alleged against an individual as a ground for exclusion or incapacity as regards the discharge of civil and political rights, admission to the public service, functions, and honors, and the exercise of the different professions and industries.

"All persons shall be admitted, without distinction of religion, to give evidence before the tribunals.

"Liberty and the outward exercise of all forms of worship are assured to all, and no hindrance shall be offered either to the hierarchial organization of the various communions or to their relations with their spiritual chiefs.

"The right of official protection by the diplomatic and consular agents of the powers in Turkey is recognized both as regards the above-mentioned persons and their religious, charitable, and other establishments in the holy places;" and

Whereas the extent and object of the above-cited provisions of said treaty are to place the Christian subjects of the Porte under the protection of the other signatories thereto, and to secure to such Christian subjects full liberty of religious worship and belief, the equal benefit of the laws, and all the privileges and immunities belonging to any subjects of the Turkish Empire; and

Whereas by said treaty the Christian powers parties thereto having established, under the consent of Turkey, their right to accomplish and secure the above-recited objects; and

Whereas the American people, in common with all Christian people everywhere, have beheld with horror the recent appalling outrages and massacres of which the Christian population of Turkey have been made the victims:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is an imperative duty, in the interest of humanity, to express the earnest hope that the European concert brought about by the treaty referred to may speedily be given its just effect in such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them both as men and Christians and as beneficiaries of the explicit provisions of the treaty above recited.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States, the House of Representatives concurring, will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

Mr. CULLOM Mr. President, I hesitate to take up the time of the Senate or to occupy its attention even for a moment, but I feel that the gravity of the subject requires that I should do so.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the Senator will allow me to say that I shall be glad to have a full explanation of the resolutions before voting upon them.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will listen to me for a few minutes he will see the serious condition which at least prevails in Turkish Armenia.

Mr. President, I am amazed—I am astounded and appalled at the brief accounts which I have had of the awful carnival of havoc, destruction, and blood which has prevailed for a time in a country with which the United States maintains amicable relations. The concurrent and accumulated testimony of hundreds and thousands of intelligent, humane, honest, and courageous Christians and Jews alike, Catholics and Protestants, Europeans and Americans, makes it absolutely certain as a dreadful truth that a massacre of innocence unparalleled for ages has been perpetrated in the Armenian provinces of Turkey. How can we believe that in 1894 and 1895, along the very borders of the land where scriptural history was made, and where the patriarchs of old fed their flocks, almost in sight of Hermon and Lebanon, and only a short journey from Bethlehem, the most gigantic and brutal enormities have been committed upon a wholly unoffending people?

We believe, without questioning, those words which have long been part of our religion, that "of one blood God made all the nations of the earth," but I confess that my faith is somewhat shattered in the accepted belief when I see the soldiers of an organized and recognized Government, where there is no war and no enemy, killing, bayoneting, and outraging an unarmed and unoffending people—a Turkish army, under the pay of the Turkish Government, composed of Circassians, Kurds, and other barbarian soldiers, led through the rural and pastoral districts to devastate and destroy every living thing, to rob, to murder, and flay alive, old and young, male and female. Destruction and rapine have been and now are the orders obeyed in the beautiful valleys and on the rugged hills of Armenia. There has been no war, no conflict between two contending powers, but a merciless, pitiless tornado of bloody ruin. Over many square miles of territory, fire and the sword have swept the last vestige of Armenian human life. Through hundreds of Eastern villages, towns blessed with schools and colleges, with churches and missionaries, the demon of damnable and fanatical hate has spread ruin, desolation, and death.

Has it come to this, that in the last days of the nineteenth century humanity itself is placed on trial? There is responsibility somewhere. There is to be retribution some time. Who is responsible? Not alone the poor, weak, slavish Sultan who sits at Constantinople, and has been forced to let Austria manage one province and to permit other nations to manage and govern other provinces. But there are what we know as the great powers of Europe who have practically determined that they will not allow Turkey to abdicate her autonomy until they can agree among themselves as to how her territory shall be apportioned between themselves. In my judgment, if Great Britain had consented that Russia should look after Armenia, as Austria has been permitted to control Bosnia for some years, this era of blood would not have stained the history of Europe. But the fear that Russia might obtain some greater share of the "sick man's" estate than herself caused England to prevent the establishment of decent government in Armenia.

But without going into the detail of the disputes between the countries of the European alliance, it is not wrong to say that upon those great powers rests the responsibility. They have for years practically "held up" the Turkish Government and allowed her to say nothing and do nothing which they did not direct. They could have in six days put a perfect and absolute stop to the reign of death. They are responsible for the policy which has allowed this. The Turk is the puppet in their hands, and his soldiers and people are but the toys of their will and pleasure.

Mr. President, I favor the adoption of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations in reference to the condition of affairs in the Turkish Empire. It is a matter of some embarrassment to this nation that it can not, consistent with its declarations in the past, consent to send a fleet and an army to that country with orders to use whatever power may be necessary to put a stop at once to the indiscriminate murder and slaughter of all classes of Armenians who have so far offered practically no resistance.

As I have shown, a condition of affairs has for some time past existed in the Armenian portion of Turkey so appalling to the human heart that it is scarcely fit to be told. The Committee on Foreign Relations are not disposed to sit idly by and take no notice of such condition. They have, therefore, reported certain resolutions, reciting in connection with them certain provisions of the treaty made between the Ottoman Empire, Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia which would seem almost sufficient to excuse any other nation from having anything to say with reference to the conditions existing in Turkey.

The treaty of 1878, made between the powers as above indicated, substantially obligates those powers to see to it that the Ottoman Empire shall in no way interfere with any class of its subjects on the ground of difference of religion. In that treaty the Ottoman Empire bound itself to make no distinctions for any reason whatever between one class of its subjects and another, and the combined powers in effect obligated themselves to give protection to the Armenian portion of that country, guaranteeing the same against any imposition by the Porte or any other authority in the Turkish Empire.

The people of the United States are intensely excited over the condition of affairs reported to exist in that country. It can not be questioned that such condition is well known to the Allied Powers, and yet, so far as we are informed, nothing has been done, except by diplomatic correspondence, to stop the further slaughter of innocent people or to care for the hundreds of thousands of Armenians who have been left homeless, helpless, and starving. The purpose of the resolutions reported and under consideration is to plead with great earnestness to those Allied Powers who have undertaken to care for those people to put a stop to such brutality as is practiced upon them by the Circassians and Kurds; and not entirely without the help or connivance of the Turkish soldiers themselves.

The sixty-first article of the treaty referred to recites that the Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out the ameliorations and reforms demanded by the local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds.

Mr. President, the Sultan appears to have done nothing to protect the Armenians from those savage robbers and murderers, but it is believed, and I think correctly, by the Christian world that the Sultan is knowingly allowing such slaughter to go on, the object being, it is said, to so reduce the Armenian population that they will no longer be of sufficient consequence to give him any concern.

Mr. President, it is unnecessary for me to say that it is amazing to the people of this country, at least, to witness such a terrible slaughter of those innocent people, and at the same time witness the apparent indifference manifested by the powers who agreed to see that they were protected.

Mr. Henry Norman, of the London Chronicle, in an article published recently, in the Star of this city, says:

> Yet Abdul Hamid II seems to sit firmly on his throne, secure in the jealousies of the great powers unable to agree upon the division of his kingdom. One of them will do nothing to introduce stability or further autonomy into the Balkan Peninsula, preferring to wait until the ripe and rotten fruit shall drop into her lap, and the hands of the others are thereby paralyzed. And if the Sultan loses heart for a moment in the desperate game he is playing, he can find fresh courage by thinking, as Professor Grosvenor in his great book has recently reminded us, that the British embassy stands upon land presented to England in gratitude for help against France in 1801; that the site of the French embassy was given to France in thankfulness for aid against England in 1807; that the shaft among the cypresses of the cemetery at Scutari commemorates English and French support against Russia in 1857, and that another column on the Bosphorus tells how Russia saved Mahmoud II his empire in 1833. "You think us weak," said a Turkish statesman recently to a foreign ambassador, "but the truth is we are very strong, for our strength is rooted in your divisions."

Before the treaty of Berlin was entered into by the great powers in 1878, Great Britain announced its own treaty of defense with the Porte, which, it is said, caused a great sensation among the Allied Powers. This treaty between Turkey and England provides that England was to join His Imperial Majesty the Sultan in defending certain portions of his territory against any future attempt on the part of Russia to take possession of the same, and the Sultan promised England to introduce the necessary reforms, to be agreed upon between the two powers, in his Government, and for the protection of the Christian and other subjects of the Sultan. As a guarantee of good faith, the Sultan consented to the occupation by England of the Island of Cyprus. That compact was secretly signed at Constantinople on the 4th day of June, 1878, only a few days before the congress convened at Berlin to make the treaty of 1878.

So that, Mr. President, the English Government, making greater pretensions to the observance of the rights of the people than perhaps any other Government in Europe, has an additional obligation resting upon it to protect the Armenians in Turkey, and yet nothing has been done by it, notwithstanding this double obligation resting upon it, nor by any of the other powers looking to the enforcement of their treaty obligations beyond a mere diplomatic correspondence between them and the Sultan.

So, Mr. President, it seemed to the Committee on Foreign Relations that we could not do less, that we could not say less by way of a recital of the obligations of the Allied Powers to protect those people and an appeal to them to carry out their pledges than we have done by the resolution which is now under consideration.

It may be proper for me to say that yesterday dispatches came from that country saying that Turkey and Russia had made a treaty, by which Russia was to dominate Turkey and hold it as a vassal. I see, however, what I anticipated might be true, that the former dispatches have been substantially denied this morning. So the condition prevails that these several allied powers, having taken upon themselves practically the special right, if such a right could be conferred, to protect the Armenians by name, consisting of over 2,000,000 in European Turkey and more than a million and a half in Asiatic Turkey, have, notwithstanding that obligation, permitted the indiscriminate slaughter which has been going on there for the last year, to say nothing of what occurred before that time, almost distancing any description of slaughter in the history of the world. I do not myself believe that there can be found in all the history of the world such a condition as has existed in that country for the last year and a half.

It is not necessary for me to say that apparently the Allied Powers are watching each other, each hoping by its silence or nonaction to secure, if the Ottoman Empire should go to pieces, a portion of its territory. The heart of all Christendom is stirred to its very depths as it witnesses the piteous pleas of the suffering Armenians beseeching the Christian world to give them protection.

The Armenians are said to be a harmless, industrious, and honest people. They number, in Turkey, 2,500,000 people; in Russia, 1,300,000; in Persia and other parts of the East, 150,000; scattered through Europe, 100,000; outside of the places I have named and in the United States, about 10,000. What is called ancient Armenia is said to be divided between Russia, Turkey, and Persia. The area of Turkish Armenia is about 60,000 square miles.

Mr. President, it would be very interesting, perhaps, to go back to the early history of those people. It is said that the Armenian nation is one of the oldest in the history of the world; that its beginning was soon after the flood, in the land of Ararat, and it may be said that that region of the world is the birthplace of the human race. History tells us that the glory of the Armenian nation reached its height about eighty years before Christ, and that the cause of its downfall may be traced back to about the same period; that it resulted from a war with the Romans. Since the conquest of Armenia by the Romans the Armenians have passed through many and various vicissitudes; at times they have been tributary to some nation and at times independent. It is also said that the downfall of Armenia as an independent nation was the result of aid given the Crusaders in their effort to free the Holy City from the Arabs and Turks. They have been, as a people, subject to the persecutions, outrages, and massacres of what Gladstone terms "the unspeakable Turk" for seven or eight hundred years. They have, however, retained their distinctive language and religion to this day, and are said to be the leading class in commerce as well as in education in Turkey.

I said awhile ago that nothing had been done by the combined powers looking to putting a stop to the murder of the Armenians since the treaty of 1878, aside from mere diplomatic protests. I ought to say that some eight months ago a scheme of reform for the Armenian provinces was presented to the Sultan by the English, French, and Russian Governments, which was sanctioned October 17, 1895, by imperial irade for the provinces of Bitlis, Diarbekir, Seevas, Erzerum, Van, and Harpoot. These provinces cover the region where the majority of the Armenians reside. Since the sanction by the Sultan of this proposed reform wholesale slaughter and plunder have been perhaps more frequent than before.

It is unnecessary, Mr. President, for me to detail the history of what has been going on at any greater length, but it would seem, from all the information that can be obtained, that there has been a determination on the part of the Sultan of Turkey to allow the Armenian population to be almost exterminated. It appears to be an assault upon the Armenians because of their religion. The religious leaders of those engaged in the indiscriminate slaughter which has been carried on incite the people to action by crying from the housetops, "Woe to the Mussulman who does not kill at least one Christian and carry away some of their belongings, in the name of Mohammed and His Imperial Majesty the Sultan."

This country of ours may be said to be a neutral Government, so far as interference with the internal affairs of any Government in Europe is concerned. It has no disposition to interfere in the affairs of European Governments, except in the cause of humanity itself. And we now appeal most earnestly, in the name of humanity, to the Governments which have contracted to protect those people that they shall carry out their obligations. As to the right of this Government to protect American citizens everywhere we ask no odds from any nation upon earth.

In earlier days the crusaders from western Europe swarmed over this very country in their misguided efforts to establish religion through the agency of the sword. Of late it has seemed almost necessary to inaugurate another crusade in the interest of peace and humanity, that possibly a few people might be saved from a nation numbering about 4,000,000 in all. They are greater in number than were the people of the American colonies in the days of the American Revolution. Is it necessary, in the economy of the civilized Governments of Europe, that the blood of 4,000,000 people shall be spilled, that it shall water the soil of that vast area of country?

The sympathy of America has always gone out to the oppressed and misgoverned peoples of other countries. We extended our hands and gave of our means to Greece when Turkey, years ago, strove to crush her to the earth. We sympathized with Hungary and did what we could to relieve the people there when they were held in bonds and difficulties.

Mr. President, I can not refrain from giving here the thrilling words of our great Webster, in an address referring to the affairs of Hungary. He said:

I see that the Emperor of Russia demands of Turkey that the noble Kossuth and his companions shall be given up to be dealt with at his pleasure, and I see that this demand is made in derision of the established laws of nations.

Gentlemen, there is something on earth greater than arbitrary or despotic power. The lightning has its power, the whirlwind has its power, and the earthquake has its power, but there is something among men more capable of shaking despotic power than the lightning, the whirlwind, or the earthquake, and that is the excited and aroused indignation of the whole civilized world.

Mr. President, I know of no condition which has existed in this world for centuries which has called upon civilized nations and peoples for interference equaling the necessity for stopping the indiscriminate slaughter which has been going on in Turkish Armenia for a number of years.

I ask that an article which I find in the Chicago Tribune, which is not long, be inserted at the close of my remarks. I also ask that a statement of the number of places where this indiscriminate slaughter has been going on shall also be inserted, which shows that not less than about 40,000 of these people have been killed; and the accounts show that not less than a half million of those who have not been killed are houseless, homeless, and starving, with no relief being afforded them from any quarter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers referred to by the Senator from Illinois will be inserted in the RECORD, in the absence of objection.

The articles referred to are as follows:

MOSLEM OR DEATH.

It is another terrible statement of facts which E. J. Dillon sets forth in the last Contemporary Review. They are of exactly the same character as those presented in previous numbers of that Review by the same trustworthy eye-witness. These later accounts, specific and circumstantial, such as are already confirmed by a whole cloud of witnesses, only add horror upon horrors. All the world stands aghast at this modern infernalism of the Turkish ruler. But apparently there is not a power on earth that dares to face the horrid monster. Here is a strange spectacle; let history explain it as best it can.

In Asia Minor during the last two months, Dr. Dillon declares, the direct victims amount to at least 60,000, with double that number plundered of their all and sent forth as fugitives from the ashes of their pillaged and devastated homes to perish. The occasion of the massacres, he says, was the pressure put upon the Sultan to carry out certain reforms; the object of the massacres was to nullify those reforms and to carry out the established policy of the present Sultan by reducing the Christian population in this territory to an insignificant minority. That this is the simple fact in the case admits of no doubt.

To all appearances up to date the Governments of all the great civilized nations stand looking on as if smitten with insensibility and cowed into abjectest pusillanimity before this Abdul the Accurst. Even the culminating insult in the Sultan's notification to the Society of the Red Cross to keep off seems to be tamely submitted to.

The issue could not be more sharply made up. It is the Turk against Christendom—"Moslem or die!" And yet the massacres that have been systematically going on now ever since a year ago last August are, in fact, but a minor part of all that systematic and comprehensive reign of oppression, torture, and terror. The facts presented in detail in the Contemporary Review and in a multitude of letters from other witnesses on the ground reveal a diabolism of all cruelties and wickedness such as give the world a new idea of the malign possibilities of human nature.

The writer in the Review referred to speaks of a woman who, having seen her husband butchered by a Moslem mob and her daughter tortured to death by the devilish indignities of the ruffians, not to speak of her own tortures and indignities, in the wildness of her agony felt reason give way and went about declaring that God himself had gone mad and left maniacs and demons to rule the world.

The answer which the English poet, William Watson, gives in the Westminster Gazette to the question as to whether Great Britain will, after all, do anything about it is put by him in this way:

"She will act at last, when there is naught remaining to relieve! At last! When the last altar is defiled, when the last mother folds with famished arms to her dead bosom her last butchered child! Then shall our England, throned beyond alarms, rise in her might! Till this 'she bides her hour.'"

If such an outcry is not poetic, it is at any rate only too telling and pertinent.

[The Chicago Tribune, Monday, January 20, 1896.]

R. J. Suabian, a student at Northwestern University, read several extracts from letters showing the hostility the Turks bore to the Armenians. The writers said a stretch of 100 miles had been visited by the inhuman Kurds, who swept everything before them. As a result there were 50,000 killed, 500,000 made destitute, and $3,000,000 worth of property lost to the owners. Men, women, and children had been pursued into the churches and killed there, and their blood reddened the steps.

Mr. Mangasarian said the work was done by troops attired in Kurdish costumes. He read a letter from relatives in Armenia in which the terrible tale was told in a thrilling manner. He said the Armenians had excited the jealousy of the Turks from the fact they represented and were impregnated with the ideas of Western civilization and wanted to be free. The fact they were progressive and the Turk represented the civilization of 1,000 years ago; that at every turn they forced the Turk to the wall in trade, literature, and finance was enough to make the Turk envious and determined the Armenian should not have the liberty he sought.

Statement showing the number of Armenians massacred at different points in Turkey, taken from the Armenian, published in London, December 1, 1895:

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the resolutions will be promptly adopted, Mr. President.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am glad, Mr. President, that the Committee on Foreign Relations have at last reported resolutions giving expression to the abhorrence felt by the American people at the atrocities which have been perpetrated upon the Christian inhabitants of Turkish Armenia. For more than a year the world has been shocked by what has been going on, and is still going on, in Turkey. Not only have there been indiscriminate massacres of men, women, and children, but, so far as the women are concerned, there have been worse than massacres.

These outrages in Turkey began in 1894. The world was shocked and horrified by the reports that reached us then. An expression in protest was sought from this Government then. On December 3 of that year I offered a resolution in the Senate, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but never acted on. That resolution was as follows:

Joint resolution relating to the recent massacre of Christian inhabitants of Turkish Armenia.

Whereas the Christian inhabitants of Armenia, under the dominion of the Sultan of Turkey, were recently subjected to inhuman atrocities resulting in the indiscriminate massacre of thousands of men, women, and children; and

Whereas such outrages are a blot upon the civilization of the age, meriting the severest condemnation of mankind generally, and especially of the Christian nations of the earth: Therefore

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of the United States view with horror and detestation the atrocities aforesaid, and do hereby protest, in the name of common humanity, against the same.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States communicate this remonstrance to the Government of Turkey.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Louisiana will pardon me, he made one statement which I think was perhaps inadvertent, that the massacres and outrages began in 1894. I have in my hand now a statement from very high authority, indeed, describing the condition of things and what was going on there in the year 1890, and had been going on for several years before 1894. Undoubtedly the outrages were still more flagrant at the time of which the Senator speaks.

Mr. BLANCHARD. That is true. The outrages upon the Christian inhabitants of Turkish Armenia have been going on for years, but they became bolder and were more flagrant in the fall of 1894 than they had been previous to that time, so much so that the attention of mankind generally was called to them.

Mr. President, it may be true that the United States as a nation can do nothing within the dominions of the Sultan of Turkey save to protect the lives and property of American citizens who may be domiciliated there, but, I take it, it is not out of place for us as the representatives of a free people, a great Christian nation, to express in some official way our horror and detestation of the condition of affairs in that unhappy country.

The resolutions are timely. They perhaps do not go far enough, but they are, and will be considered by the world, an expression of the American nation and the American people of their repudiation of and protest against acts of this kind.

Mr. President, the people who are the victims of these outrages are all Christians. We do not hear that the Kurds and Circassians are committing robberies and rapes and murders upon the Moslem inhabitants of the Sultan of Turkey. They all seem to be confined to the Christian inhabitants of the Sultan's Empire, and from that the inference is inevitable that these atrocities are perpetrated upon an unoffending people because of their religion.

The Armenians as a race were the first people to embrace Christianity. It is recorded that they were converted to the religion of Christ thirty-six years before the Emperor Constantine even issued his Edict of Toleration. They and their descendants have remained Christians from that time to this, maintaining their religious creed through persecution amounting to martyrdom. Within their country is Mount Ararat, upon which, we are told in Holy Writ, the ark rested after the deluge. They are a people who would be desirable inhabitants of any country. We have some five or six thousand of them who have become citizens of our country.

Mr. CULLOM. Ten thousand.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Ten thousand. I have met and talked with some of them; one I recollect in particuliar, an Armenian merchant from Boston, who is a most cultured and well-informed gentleman. Something is due to these Armenian citizens of the United States in the way of expression of sympathy for their suffering countrymen, and certainly it is little enough for us to do to pass the resolutions under consideration.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, just one word.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] rather indicates by his first remark, in which he says he is glad that the Committee on Foreign Relations has at last evolved something, that there has been neglect on the part of the committee and on the part of Congress to take notice of the horrible condition of affairs in Turkey. From letters which I have received and from remarks I have heard made I am inclined to think that the religious people of America have looked upon Congress as moving very slowly in this affair.

Mr. President, I desire, in behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to say that at the last session of the last Congress two missionaries appeared here from Armenia, both of whom I knew personally, one of whom was formerly a resident of my own city, and stated the grievances, the troubles, the massacres, their fears. They were asked what was the remedy, and they said to the committee that in their judgment if a consulate could be established at Erzerum and another at Harpoot and consuls appointed, then there would be no trouble in that great interior, because the eye of America would then be upon it. In less than a week after that the Committee on Foreign Relations reported a bill establishing two consulates, one at Erzerum and the other at Harpoot, and it became a law. The President of the United States appointed the consuls.

Surely the committee and Congress did everything then as expeditiously as anybody could ask, and did exactly what these missionaries desired should be done. Turkey refused exequaturs to those two consuls. I do not know what the executive department has done as to that refusal. I do not know what the executive department can do as to it; but it seems to me that some pressure ought to be brought somehow, that when there can be no objection to the persons of the consuls appointed exequaturs shall be granted.

Now, Mr. President, consider this incident. If that consul had been received by Turkey, had gone to Harpoot, a consulate building had been provided for, and an American flag raised, more than 20,000 lives would have been saved. One of the most terrible massacres perpetrated in Turkey anywhere took place at that point.

The good people of the United States have planted in Turkey over $6,000,000 for a single purpose, to improve and better the condition of the people of that country. They have erected as fine colleges as there are in the world. They have been maintained by American money. They have educated thousands and hundreds of thousands of Turks, or Armenians, who are subject to Turkey. It has been a work of wonderful beneficence, a work which has had marvelous success, and yet it is stopped absolutely to-day. That American capital now is held up; it can not do an ounce of work. At Harpoot the American colleges were burned down and the Americans themselves were compelled to flee for their lives.

I do not know how far the United States of America can interfere in Turkey. I am in favor of these resolutions as an expression of our opinion upon the awful tragedies there; but if I had had my way, after the powers of Europe have waited now a solid year looking each other in the face with suspicious eyes and neither one daring to make a move lest the other shall receive a benefit—I say if I had had my way, I would have Congress memorialize Russia and say to her: "Take Armenia into your possession. Protect the lives of these Christians there. And the United States of America will stand behind you with all of its power." That, sir, is the memorial and resolution I would have passed.

Sir, American citizens are suffering there. I care not what our minister reports to the State Department. I know from better opportunity to learn it than Minister Terrell has or can have; that is, from the headquarters of the foreign missions of the United States of America, where information is received by every mail, and where the information is absolutely accurate, but where the informants dare not have their names known because their lives would immediately pay the penalty.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to say to my friend that Minister Terrell is in daily conference with those very people at Constantinople.

Mr. FRYE. I do not attack Minister Terrell. I do not know what his reports have been to the State Department, but I do know that American lives and American property are being interfered with day by day in the interior of Armenia. I know that they are compelled to flee to protect their lives. I know that they do not receive the protection of the Turkish Government there.

Mr. MILLS. Yet, if my friend will investigate and ask those very missionaries, they will tell him that Minister Terrell has done more for them than the minister from any other country. He is given universal praise by all the missionaries for what he has done. I do not know what he has reported to the State Department, but he is a personal friend of mine, I have letters from him frequently, and I have communications that he sends to me from the missionaries, who indorse everything that he has done, and say he is doing everything in his power.

Mr. FRYE. If Great Britain owned a college worth $1,000,000 at Harpoot and by Turkish orders that college had been burned down, and if the teachers, they being British citizens, had been compelled to flee for their lives, does the Senator from Texas believe that the voice of Great Britain would have been silent? Does he not believe that the demand would have been made at once for damages for that destruction of property and that those citizens should be protected?

Mr. MILLS. There is some difference between the Government of Great Britain and that of the United States. The Senator from Maine is now speaking in the Congress of the United States, that has the sole power to declare war and use the armed power of this Government. It is not so with Great Britain. There the King can make war whenever he pleases to do so. If my friend would be for war, I do not know but that I would go with him; wherever people of the United States residing in foreign countries are not protected by foreign Governments I would send the ships of the United States, and I would batter down their capital, as Jefferson did in 1802 with the pirates.

Mr. FRYE. I have no doubt that the Senator would, and I agree with him entirely in his theory about the protection of American citizens. I do not cite Great Britain because I am fond of her.

Mr. President, one could not help admiring the glowing eulogy of England so eloquently uttered a day or two since by the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], but while I was compelled to unite in admiration of the speaker, I dissented from almost every word of the speech. I do not love Great Britain. I recognize her power on the land, her magnificent dominion on the sea, but I assert that in all our life as colony and Republic she has never done us a kind act or offered us a helping hand. While we were hers, her conduct toward us was antagonistic to all of our interests, repressive of our industries, domineering, unjust, and despotic, so that we were compelled to rebel.

As a Republic she was no more friendly. I can not forget that for fifty years she taunted us about our "flag of the free," our Declaration of Independence, our asserted equality of man, while we held black men in bondage, put manacles on ankle and hand, and yet when the South rebelled, undertook by arms to establish another republic whose corner stone should be slavery forever, she was prompt to recognize belligerent rights; aided France to establish a monarchy in Mexico, a perpetual menace to us; built, fitted out, and manned ships to destroy our commerce; did all in her power to establish the Confederacy, so that she might have a customer.

Sir, the British rulers are no friends of ours. Now she is sitting quietly by seeing these Armenians for a solid year murdered because they were Christians, when she was one of the very agencies agreeing to protect their lives or compel Turkey to do it, and she had the power in her hands any day to do it. So I say, regardless of what Great Britain might have thought, if I had had my way Congress would have memorialized Russia at once to take possession of Armenia, and the United States would back her in the doing of it.

Now, so far as American citizens are concerned, I would protect them there at any cost. We never agreed that the Dardanelles should be closed to us. There can not be found a line in the policy of the United States of America which ever permitted any great navigable water to be closed to our ships; not one. On the contrary, we have been ready to go to war at any time to keep navigable waters open to our ships. We have given no assent to the agreement of the concerting nations over there that the Dardanelles shall be closed. If it was necessary to protect our American citizens and their property, I would order United States ships of war, in spite of foreign agreements, to sail up the Dardanelles and plant themselves before Constantinople, and then demand that American citizens should have the protection they are entitled to.

Mr. President, I think one of the grandest things in the history of Great Britain, and one thing for which I admire her, is that she does protect her citizens everywhere and anywhere, under all circumstances. Her mighty power is put forth for their relief and protection, and it is admirable. I do not wonder that a British citizen loves his country. Why that little incident which all of you are familiar with is a marvelous illustration of that. The King of Abyssinia took a British citizen of the name of Campbell, about twenty years ago, carried him up into the fortress of Magdala, on the heights of a lofty mountain, and put him into a dungeon without cause. It took six months for Great Britain to find that out, and then she demanded his immediate release. King Theodore refused to release him. In less than ten days after the refusal was received, 3,000 British soldiers and 5,000 sepoys were on board ships of war sailing for the coast. When they arrived they were disembarked, were marched 700 miles over swamp and morass under a burning sun, then up the mountain to the very heights, in front of the frowning dungeon, and then they gave battle. They battered down the iron gates, the stone walls. King Theodore had killed himself with his own pistol. Then they reached down into the dungeon, with that English hand, lifted out from it that one British citizen, and carried him down the mountain heights, across the same swamps and morass, landed him on the white-winged ships and sped him away to his home in safety. That cost Great Britain $25,000,000 and made General Napier Lord Napier of Magdala.

Now, sir, that was a great thing for a great country to do. A country that has an eye that can see away across an ocean, away across the many miles of land up into the mountain heights, down into the darksome dungeon one, just one, of her 38,000,000 people, and then has an arm strong enough and long enough to reach across the same ocean, across the same swamps and marshes, up the same mountain heights, down into the same dungeon, and pluck him out and carry him home to his own country a free man—in God's name who will not die for a country that will do that?

Well, Mr. President, our country will do it, and our country ought to do it. All that I ask of this grand Republic of ours is that it shall model itself after Great Britain, if it pleases, in this one thing, that the life of an American citizen shall be protected wherever he may be, whether in Great Britain or in Turkey, and in no other thing whatsoever.

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate. When I started it was for a word or two only. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations are very feeble and emasculated utterances compared with the speech of the Senator from Maine. We fight our battles here on the Committee on Foreign Relations report of a resolution that has no significance in it, that protects no American citizens, and the Senator from Maine arises here and commends Great Britain for doing that which we refuse and fail to do, viz, not only protecting her subjects, but asserting her power everywhere.

I introduced a resolution in the Senate which I will send to the desk to be read, which did propose something for the relief of the people of Armenia and did support the dignity and power of the American Republic. Here we have a tame, insignificant declaration of opinion and sympathy, giving no protection and no relief to these people. Have we not more than that right here upon our very borders, under our eyes, within our hearing, in the Island of Cuba? The principles and spirit of the Monroe doctrine, which we seek to enforce and declare, are violated in the wholesale murder of people who have been invited by our example to take action for the establishment of institutions like our own. Yet we hear this empty declaration of duty of this Government and censure of the Executive of the Government, when we are the department upon which the responsibility rests, and upon no one else.

The President of the United States has no power but that which we give to him. I agree with the Senator from Maine that the Armenian people should have the protection of this Government, not because they are citizens of the United States, but because the people of the United States have a duty to civilization, have a duty to the progress of mankind, to perform. It is not because of any treaty between Russia and England or any other powers, but because it is our duty to maintain the principles upon which this Government and our civilization are founded. But when I introduce resolutions to that effect we find the Committee on Foreign Relations holding back, taking no action, and then introducing a mere expression of their sympathy, while murder, outrage, and ferocity such as beasts of the forest do not possess are perpetrated upon these Armenian people and upon the people upon our own immediate borders in the Island of Cuba.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. CALL. I ask permission, before the matter goes over, to have the resolution read which I formerly offered and to which I referred.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope that the Senator from Arkansas in charge of the bill which is the regular order at 2 o'clock will consent to its being laid aside temporarily, that this question may be disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois how long he supposes it will take? There are some Senators who desire to be heard by the Senate on the regular order. One is on the floor now and desires to proceed. I do not like to interfere with the consideration of the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and am anxious myself to have them disposed of, if it can be done in a short time.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course, I am not aware of the number who desire to speak on the resolutions, but I have not supposed that it would take more than a few minutes longer to dispose of them. I desire to say in justification of my own desire to have them finished to-day, that I am under promise to leave the city to-morrow night for ten days, or perhaps a little less; and I should be very glad indeed to have this question settled before I go away.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, may I be permitted to make one suggestion?

Mr. PEFFER. My colleague [Mr. BAKER] has been for several days expecting to address the Senate upon the unfinished business. He is now ready to proceed and has addressed the Chair for that purpose. I hope the matter referred to by the Senator from Illinois can be postponed.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Chair will submit to the Senate the request that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside that the resolution may be disposed of.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair allow me to make a suggestion before that is done?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I introduced the original resolution on this subject, and have taken great interest in it. I am prepared to speak on the question at some little length, for twenty or thirty minutes, but in order to have the matter disposed of, instead of going over until next week, I will forego my purpose of addressing the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that, at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], a vote may be taken on these resolutions. I think other gentlemen who might speak will be willing to forego that purpose. It will take only four or five minutes to reach a vote, I think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. I am entirely willing to go on and dispose of the resolutions, but the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER] is upon the floor and desires to address the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. I have an amendment to offer to the resolutions. I think the resolutions, as they stand, are discreditable to the Senate of the United States. If we are to take action upon the subject let us do something that will grant the people who are suffering these outrages——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida will please suspend. The Chair desires to inquire whether there is objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair pardon me one observation? The Government of the United States (whether right or wrong I will not now detain the Senate by discussing) has undertaken to deal with this matter diplomatically, and diplomatic negotiations are now going on. A lady, an intimate friend of mine, who I am proud to say is my constituent and personal friend, is on her way to Turkey with the ministrations of the Red Cross at her command. Whatever we may think of the opinion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], however much we may sympathize with my honorable friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE], to whose stirring speech we all listened with pleasure, I hold that it is wrong for the Senate to thrust these extreme statements, which I sympathize with almost altogether, into the diplomacy of the United States. The Senator's indignation will keep for a week. Until we learn from our President that the function of diplomacy is over, I hope that we may content ourselves to withhold the expression of our natural indignation, however difficult for manly spirits like that of my friend from Florida it may be.

Now, I appeal to him. I think I know the opinion of the Armenians; there are more of them in my city than in any other. I think I know the opinion of the American Board for Foreign Missions, with whom I have a thousand ties of personal union in the past and in the present. We may be obliged to come to what the Senator proposes, but let us wait until the diplomatic means are exhausted. When the President and the Secretary of State of the United States are endeavoring to save the families, the wives, of American missionaries still in danger from these lawless fanatics, when Clara Barton is on her way with the Red Cross in her hand, it is a pretty serious thing to thrust our intemperate and angry utterances into that diplomatic condition.

As to what the Committee on Foreign Relations have done, does anyone suppose that my friend from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] is not as much stirred to the bottom of his heart with indignation at these things as anybody? Yet he, as the organ of that great committee, unanimously, as I understand the committee have acted, proposes for to-day this temperate and guarded expression. I say to the Senator from Florida he is taking great responsibility—and great responsibility in regard to the lives and the honor of women, which he has so much at heart—when he thrusts himself into that situation and breaks it up.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should like to have the Chair first submit the request for unanimous consent which was suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Let that first be submitted.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. We can then proceed in a regular manner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the request of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Florida the vote may be taken on the pending resolutions. Is there objection?

Mr. PEFFER. I object for the present.

Mr. HOAR (to Mr. PEFFER). It will not take more than five minutes. Let us get this matter out of the way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that if objection is interposed to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts the regular order is before the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. PEFFER. I do object for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. PEFFER. Let me state that if the matter can be disposed of in five minutes I shall withdraw the objection.

Mr. HOAR. It will be disposed of at the close of the remarks of the Senator from Florida, and he is nearly through, I have no doubt.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator from Florida is nearly through I will withdraw my objection; otherwise not.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The objection is withdrawn; and the Senator from Florida will proceed.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the Secretary read the resolution heretofore introduced by me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution submitted by Mr. CALL December 10, 1895, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That humanity and religion and the principles on which all civilization rests demand that the civilized Governments shall, by peaceful negotiations, or, if necessary, by force of arms, prevent and suppress the cruelties and massacres inflicted on the Armenian subjects of Turkey, by the establishment of a government of their own people, with such guaranties by the civilized powers of its authority and permanence as shall be adequate to that end.

Mr. CALL. Now, Mr. President, there was a resolution which proposed something that would protect the soldiers of the Red Cross, Clara Barton and her associates. There was a declaration by the people of the United States that in behalf of our common humanity the power of this people should be interposed to prevent outrages which were shocking to the civilized world. Do Senators say that our people can be endangered by a declaration that our power shall be exercised to prevent these outrages, when diplomacy has failed for half a century to accomplish anything? The history of Armenia has been one continued scene of bloodshed and outrage of women and murder of children for more than a century. We have now a resolution here reciting an agreement between the civilized powers connected with that portion of the world that these outrages should stop, when, in the very face of that agreement, the most terrible outrages the world has ever seen have been perpetrated.

Mr. President, I object to the pending resolutions. I object to them because they mean nothing; I object to them because it is an insult to the suffering people of Armenia and because the nations of the civilized world will look upon it as an empty and unmeaning declaration of sympathy.

I do not agree with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] in his denunciation of Great Britain or the British people. Whatever of courage, spirit, and character we have come from that race of people who have made glorious the English name and have carried civilization and Christianity into every quarter of the globe. Admit that they are aggressive, admit that they have oftentimes created tyranny and wrong, yet they have been the pillars of civilization and the representatives of the virtue of every civilized people; they have advanced science and art; and what we possess we derive from their blood and from their teachings.

Mr. President, while I am in favor of maintaining the principles of the Monroe doctrine and protecting these two continents from aggression of any kind, while I am in favor of preserving civil liberty and opposing a government of caste and privilege, which was the meaning of the Monroe doctrine and its spirit and purpose, I desire to say that it is not because the Government of Great Britain will create upon this continent institutions hostile to civil liberty, for the colonies of Great Britain, New Zealand and Australia, are to-day more advanced than we are in the protection of the masses of the people in their personal rights; they are more advanced than we are in the progress of that civilization which made the Constitution of the United States. Land is free to every citizen, homes and labor are provided for the unemployed, and no part of the world presents a spectacle where the exercise of power is more for the people and for their elevation, happiness, and prosperity.

New Zealand, as a British colony, is fifty-five years old, and her European population is 690,000. She boasts the best temperate climate, the richest healing mineral springs, the most variedly beautiful and soul-inspiring scenery in the world, a coast line of 4,330 miles, and a rising generation passionately fond of the sea. Her agricultural land yields the largest and finest crops, her pastoral land supports the greatest number of sheep and cattle to the acre. Her people rule themselves by means of the most democratic central government and 500 local governing bodies. They own collectively 1,900 miles of railway, 14,000 miles of telegraph wire, all the telephones, 1,300 post-offices, 1,400 schools, and worship in 1,600 churches. They have the most complete system of compulsory, secular, free education, the lowest death rate, the lightest ratio of convictions for drunkenness, the highest standard of comfort, the most perfect land and labor laws in the world. It is not a vain dream for such a colony!

And yet, in her dream, in her aspirations, in her determined policy to stop the production of penury, New Zealand stands alone, and almost outside the pale of the sympathy of Christian England! Being alone and far ahead on that which it deems to be the right road, their small band of men and women get little guidance from the superior culture and experience of the mother country, of the great republic, or even of other colonies. What analogy can there be between a policy which starts from the principle that the land and all its hidden wealth belongs to the nation now and a policy which does not?

But this is foreign to the purpose.

We have a duty to perform. We are a great people, the light of the world, and we owe it to civilization and humanity that the power which has been given to us shall be exercised. We owe it to every principle of civilization that the people of Armenia, and by a greater interest and obligation that the people of Cuba, shall not be murdered by the brutal military despotism which now threatens to extinguish that entire race, and we owe it to the people of Armenia that we shall pass something more than an empty declaration of sympathy.

I offer the resolution heretofore submitted by me as a substitute for the resolutions reported by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the substitute submitted by the Senator from Florida to the pending resolutions.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the proposed substitute be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed substitute will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That humanity and religion and the principles on which all civilization rests demand that the civilized governments shall, by peaceful negotiations, or, if necessary, by force of arms, prevent and suppress the cruelties and massacres inflicted on the Armenian subjects of Turkey, by the establishment of a government of their own people, with such guaranties by the civilized powers of its authority and permanence as shall be adequate to that end.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the substitute offered by the Senator from Florida be laid on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the substitute be laid on the table.

Mr. BATE. Before that is done, can we not have the original resolutions read so that we may understand precisely what we are to vote upon?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The original resolutions will be again read.

The Secretary read the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CULLOM. Those resolutions were unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, including my distinguished friend on my left [Mr. FRYE].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] to lay the proposed substitute on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the concurrent resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolutions were agreed to.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. THURSTON. I wish to give notice that, unless interfering with some previous announcement, I shall, on Tuesday morning next, after the disposition of the routine business, submit some brief remarks upon the resolutions which have been pending in respect to the Monroe doctrine.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, on which the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BAKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Before the Senator from Kansas proceeds, I ask him to allow me just one moment to request the unanimous consent of the Senate that a vote may be had at 4 o'clock on Thursday next on the pending bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HILL. I desire to assent to that, with the condition and understanding that the bill shall not be set aside for any other business, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I presume there would be no objection to that.

Mr. HILL. With that understanding, I assent to it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not suppose the Senator from Arkansas desires to put a condition of that sort on the procedure of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That is the rule of the Senate now. It adds nothing whatever to its force. The regular order can not be set aside except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Or by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Or by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But the Senator from New York proposes that the Senate, no matter what crisis may arise, no matter what may happen, shall not act on anything else except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I do not presume the Senator from New York means to limit the Senate in that way.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My suggestion is only to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I presume it is the intention of the Senator from New York that the regular order shall not be set aside for the purpose of taking up any other matter except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HILL. My idea is not, after this consent shall be given, that to-morrow or Monday, by a vote of the Senate, some other business shall intervene three or four days and then on Thursday we shall take up this bill and a vote be insisted upon. It is for the very purpose of guarding against that, and the Senator sees the force of it, that I make the suggestion. With that understanding clearly, that the bill is to continue as the regular order of business simply from now until Thursday, then it is all right. With that understanding I assent to it; otherwise not.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to enter my objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection being interposed, the Senator from Kansas will proceed,

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I desire to give notice that on Thursday next I shall ask the Senate to remain in session until the pending bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. BAKER. I ask to have read the amendment I offered the other day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1 of the bill it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That this section shall apply to the coinage of the silver mined in the United States of America only.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have offered as an amendment to the bill under consideration the proviso which has just been read, limiting it to the free coinage of American silver only, believing it to be a reasonable compromise between the conflicting views of the gold monometallist and the silver monometallist. I do not believe in either gold or silver monometallism; nor am I in favor of legislation which will produce the one or continue the other. The people are divided in their opinions upon the money question, and the politicians, judging from their divergent views, are in a hopeless state of "innocuous desuetude." However, I think all shades of opinion and belief may be classified as follows:

First. Gold monometallists.

Second. Silver monometallists.

Third. Bimetallists.

A gold monometallist believes in gold only as a measure of value and the money of final redemption and silver as subsidiary coin.

A silver monometallist believes in the free and unlimited coinage of all the silver of all the world at the ratio of 16 to 1, regardless of present conditions or of other nations.

The extreme views entertained by the gold and silver monometallists appear to be irreconcilable.

The gold monometallist claims that the legislation now proposed, if enacted into law, would produce disaster, panic, and repudiation. The silver monometallist, on the other hand, claims that the same bill, if enacted into law, would be immensely beneficial to the people and restore immediate prosperity to the country.

Thus extremes meet in legislation. Both claims can not be true. No act of legislation can produce such opposite results at one and the same time, and I am of the opinion that the awful calamity predicted by one extreme would not follow any more than the beneficial and glorious results predicted by the other.

Mr. President, I am a firm believer in what I understand to be bimetallism. Our legislation should be along the line of equality and parity between the metals at the ratio of 16 to 1. In the discharge of our duty we should not lose sight of the great central idea in all legislation, to wit, "the greatest good to the greatest number." Of course, this beneficial rule should be limited to legislation for our own people. We are not the guardians or trustees of the people of other nations. Nor should we be influenced by the charges and countercharges of extremists, nor by unjust and unfriendly criticism of the press, which frequently "condemns without evidence and executes without trial."

Mr. President, it is refreshing as well as instructive to recall the history of silver legislation in this country since 1792. The first silver dollar was coined in 1794. And from that time until 1806 less than one and one-half million silver dollars were coined. Owing to the ratio of 15 to 1 then existing between gold and silver, it was believed that our silver dollars went abroad and found a market and recoinage in France, as the ratio there was 15½ to 1.

President Jefferson, in order to retain, as he believed, our silver at home, laid his Democratic hand on the coinage of silver dollars, as will appear by the following copy of a letter written by the Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, to the Director of the Mint:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, May 1, 1806.

SIR: In consequence of a representation from the director of the Bank of the United States that considerable purchases had been made of dollars coined at the mint for the purpose of exporting them, and it is probable that further purchases and exportations will be made, the President directs that all the silver coined at the mint shall be of small denominations, so that the value of the largest piece shall not exceed a half dollar.

I am, etc.,

JAMES MADISON, Secretary of State.

ROBERT PATTERSON, Esq.,
Director of the Mint.

At that time two half silver dollars were exactly the weight and value of a silver dollar. It therefore appears quite incomprehensible how such an order could have any material effect on the purchase and exportation of silver for recoinage and mintage purposes abroad. It would appear to most people that the cost and expense of exportation of 10,000 silver half dollars of precisely the same weight and value of 5,000 silver dollars would be practically the same. This evidently was an experiment in silver. The order so promulgated at the instance of Mr. Jefferson, although not a law, seems to have been obeyed for thirty-four years, and during such time and down to 1840 no silver dollars were coined. In 1840 the coinage of silver dollars was resumed and was continued in a tentative way until 1873. From 1840 to 1873 only about 7,000,000 of standard silver dollars were coined. In course of time it became quite apparent that the order promulgated at the instance of Mr. Jefferson relating to the coinage of silver did not have the desired effect, for, notwithstanding such order, silver still went abroad. Gradually it dawned upon the minds of statesmen that as two half dollars weighed as much as one standard dollar and were of the same value the difficulty was not merely in the coinage, but must be attributed to some other cause. Finally it was agreed that the commercial ratio of 15 to 1 between gold and silver, fixed under the act of 1792 upon recommendation of Mr. Hamilton, by and with the approval of Mr. Jefferson, was not quite right, as the ratio then existing in France was 15½ to 1. And this difference in value of about 3 per cent was sufficient inducement and profit to cause our silver to be exported. And to stop such exportation the act of June 28, 1834, was passed reducing the number of grains of gold in the eagle, half eagle, and quarter eagle theretofore prescribed by the original act of 1792.

It was believed that this change of about 6 per cent in the value of gold would keep silver at home. It did so, what little there was of it, but gold, being now undervalued, went abroad. This was, of course, unsatisfactory, and after nearly three years of trial, and on the 18th day of January, 1837, another act of Congress relating to mintage and coinage was passed. This act repealed the act of 1834 and changed the ratio theretofore existing between gold and silver and established it at practically 16 to 1.

It provided that of the silver coined the dollar should be of the weight of 412½ grains, nine-tenths fine; the half dollar should be of the weight of 206¼ grains, nine-tenths fine, and other fractional coins of like proportional grains. It also provided that the eagle should contain 258 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, and smaller coinage a like proportional number of grains of gold.

From 1837 to 1853, a period of sixteen years, we had equal laws relating to gold and silver. But the production of the two metals during this time was not equal, largely because of the discovery of gold in California in 1849. The production was so heavily in favor of gold during this period that we had no just or practical experience with the two metals at the ratio of 16 to 1 under the act of 1837. The California gold fields were so vast and extensive, so wonderfully productive, that silver in the monetary race was distanced for the time being. And those friendly to the gold metal, ever alert, aggressive, and active, were not slow in taking advantage of the situation in fortifying and intrenching themselves behind legislation. In proof of this allegation I now refer to the act of February 21, 1853, entitled "An act amendatory of existing laws relative to half dollars, quarter dollars, dimes, and half dimes." So much of the act of 1853 as is pertinent to the discussion is as follows:

That from and after the 1st day of June, 1853, the weight of the half dollar or piece of 50 cents shall be 192 grains, and the quarter dollar, dime, and half dime shall be, respectively, one-half, one-fifth, and one-tenth of the weight of said half dollar.

At this time the number of grains in the standard silver dollar, as fixed by the act of 1837, was 412½ grains, and the half-dollar contained 206¼ grains, and all fractional coins were exact fractional parts of the silver dollar. Under the act of 1853 the silver half-dollar contained but 192 grains, or 14¼ less grains of silver than under the act of 1837. In other words, it was made an inducement to the owners of silver bullion to coin it into fractional currency. This act discriminated against the standard silver dollar and in favor of fractional currency nearly 7 per cent. The owner of silver bullion by coining it into fractional currency instead of standard silver dollars would reap a profit of nearly $70 in every thousand dollars coined. The profit was immense. As a necessary result standard silver dollars were not coined to any considerable extent while the act of 1853 remained in force.

The reason assigned for this legislation is well stated in the report of the chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means, as follows:

We intend to do what the best writers on political economy have approved; what experience, where the experiment has been tried, has demonstrated to be necessary and proper, to make but one standard of currency and to make all others subservient to it. We mean to make gold the standard coin and to make those new silver coins applicable and convenient, not for large, but for small transactions.

Here is a plain declaration of the object sought to be accomplished by the act of 1853:

We mean to make gold the standard coin and to make the new silver coins applicable and convenient not for large, but for small transactions.

Gold for large transactions; silver for small transactions. The advocates of the single gold standard by this act attempted to put he nation on a gold-standard basis, and they were successful in their undertaking, in so far as such object could be attained by legislation. A bounty of nearly $70 to the silver bullion owner on every thousand dollars of bullion coined was amply sufficient to induce the coinage of it into fractional currency, especially when every two half dollars thus coined were the equal of a standard silver dollar in purchasing and debt-paying power. From 1853 to 1861 all large transactions were in gold and small ones in silver. The legislation of 1853 was Democratic. Both branches of Congress were overwhelmingly Democratic. The President was "I am a Democrat." And thus the silver dollar was demonetized by Democracy. Not by direct means, because Democracy never moves in straight lines, but rather prides itself upon indirect methods. This act dealt such a fatal blow to the silver dollar that from 1853 to 1873 less than eight millions were coined. This act just as effectually destroyed the parity and equality between gold and silver as the much scandalized act of 1873. If the act of 1873, by its direct method in demonetizing the standard silver dollar, was "the greatest crime of the nineteenth century," then, pursuing the same line of declamation, the act of 1853 in its indirect method of demonetizing the standard silver dollar was the greatest crime of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

From 1861 to 1873 we had no opportunity of fairly testing the equality of the metals. The rebellion of 1861 retired to private life gold and silver. Both could not maintain the flag in the heavens. They were not sufficient in amount and patriotism. The constitutional rock of finance was struck by loyal hands and bounteous streams of revenue leaped forth. The greenback and bluecoat became very much in evidence. This was long before the greenback had been wrought into an endless chain by a discredited and shortly to be ended Democratic Administration. The unity of the States and the integrity of the nation were preserved and maintained. And a few years after the close of that memorable contest gold and silver, having finished their period of retirement and mission abroad, came "swaggering" home to find a dwelling place beneath the stars, boasting their loyalty and patriotism. If the purpose of the Democratic act of 1853 was to establish a gold standard and to make gold convenient and applicable "to large transactions and silver to smaller ones," then it is quite apparent that the act of 1873 was merely supplemental to such act, or merely a continuation of the Democratic act of 1853. And I presume it was so understood at the time by the Democratic party, as I find by the RECORD that the great leaders of that party in the Senate voted for the act of February 12, 1873, now popularly referred to as "the crime of 1873." Thurman, Bayard, Salisbury, and others voted for this "alleged crime."

Very much has been said about the act of 1873 which is not true. It has been claimed that it was surreptitiously passed; that it went through Congress with "the stealthy tread of a cat."

Anyone at all conversant with the record knows that this is imagination pure and simple, originating, perhaps, from troubled and disordered minds. Few bills were ever more thoroughly discussed. It was before Congress for nearly three years. Its Congressional career is recorded on more than 140 pages. It is true that the act of 1873 prescribed that the unit of value should be gold. It was done in direct language, recording the practical result of the Democratic act of 1853. It is also true that the bill was discussed to no considerable extent by the press of the country; but this is not unusual. Everyone knows that important bills are passed at every session of Congress which are not discussed by the press generally. The fact that silver as a commodity was at a premium at the time is to my mind the principal reason why the act of 1873 did not provoke more discussion. Silver bullion was at that time, largely because of its scarcity and because of its demand for other uses, worth from 3 to 4 per cent more than gold in the market. The silver barons of the West, if they thought about it at all, had not the slightest idea but that it would continue at a premium, and because thereof some of the present free silver extremists voted for the act of 1873—an act to which they now refer when a safe distance from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as "the greatest crime of the nineteenth century."

The senior Senator of one of the silver States who now loads the air by day and by night with his free-silver lamentations voted for the act of 1873, and in its advocacy said:

I want the standard gold; no paper money not redeemable in gold; no paper money the value of which is not ascertained; no paper money that will organize a gold board to speculate in. Gold is the universal standard of the world. Everybody knows what a dollar in gold is worth.

His demand for gold and his championship of the so-called crime of 1873 was loud, long, aggressive, and most persistent. This same Senator now leads in the cause of silver with as much vehemence and energy as he did then in the cause of gold. As champion par excellence he stands preeminently at the head of a party which demands that the standard silver dollar shall be restored to its coinage place, as in the law of 1837—a unit of value, full legal tender, of the weight of 412½ grains—and that upon one side thereof there shall be an impression emblematical of liberty and upon the other the eagle. And the love for the white metal is now so ardent that all the people of all the world, irrespective of race, color, or previous condition, are invited to bring their silver, coined or uncoined, to our mints, which shall be open to them for the coining of their silver, without cost, into standard American dollars, each of the value of a gold dollar, which shall have an impression thereon of liberty and of the eagle, irrespective of its value as a commodity or of its quantity.

The silver monometallist claims that the act of 1873 struck down one-half of our constitutional money. This is a serious charge, if true. I think I have already shown that if silver has ever been stricken down by an act of legislation it was by the act of 1853. I would therefore kindly suggest to the free-silver Democrats and Populists, who appear to be joined in wedlock by silvery bonds, the propriety of redating their marriage certificate from 1873 to 1853. The truth is that we did not really begin to coin silver into money to any considerable extent until after the passage of the so-called demonetizatoin act of 1873.

From the passage of the act of 1873 up to 1878 the coined silver trade dollars amounted to $31,699,460, and from 1878 to 1883 $4,266,460 more were coined, making in all 35,965,924 trade dollars. And each of these trade dollars contained 7½ grains more of silver than the standard silver dollar. And from 1873 to 1878 the mints were busy coining silver halves, quarters, and dimes, amounting to the enormous sum of $47,072,862, making a grand total of silver coinage for these five years of $78,722,322.

The silver industry was booming, the mints in full blast, notwithstanding the alleged crime of 1873. The silver extremists strenuously claim that fully one-half of all the silver mined in America is used in the arts and for purposes other than coinage.

There is probably much truth in this statement, and for the purpose of this argument I shall assume it to be true. It follows then that practically all the silver of America from 1873 to 1893 was coined into money, except that used in the arts and for other than mintage purposes.

From the passage of the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 until November, 1893, when the Sherman Act was repealed, we coined of standard silver dollars $421,175,051. From 1878 to November, 1893, we coined of fractional silver currency $23,844,365. The silver account from 1873 to November, 1893, when summed up, is as follows: Standard dollars, $421,175,051; fractional silver, $70,817,227; trade dollars, $35,965,924; total silver coinage, $527,958,202.

Practically amounting to one-half of all the silver mined during those twenty years, and all this vast sum has been coined since the alleged crime of 1873. Only about eight millions of silver dollars were coined prior to that time, or during twenty years, practically under Republican Administration, we coined nearly seventy times as much silver into money as during all the preceding eighty years. Does it not look very much as though the so-called crime of 1873 is largely a Democratic and Populistic nightmare?

The United States stock of silver is now estimated at about six hundred and twenty-five millions, of which sum about five hundred and forty-seven millions is full legal tender for general purposes, and some seventy-five millions in fractional coin possessing limited legal-tender qualities.

Notwithstanding the alleged "greatest crime of the nineteenth century," we have coined more silver and have more silver money now than Russia, Germany, Austria, and Great Britain all combined, and more silver money than France. Does it not appear as though the "great and awful crime of 1873," in so far as silver is concerned, was a blessing in disguise to silver-mine owners? During twenty years time they put upon the Government nearly $500,000,000 of silver. While the Government was buying silver of the mine owner, was consuming his product, it purchased no large quantities of wheat or corn from the farmer, or of iron, or lead from mine owners. For twenty years the Treasury of the United States has been the dumping ground and market place of the silver barons.

Since 1873 the production of silver has greatly increased. By the discovery of new processes the cost of production has been greatly facilitated and cheapened. As a natural consequence, the increase of the production lessens its price as a commodity, in the same manner as like large productions of corn and wheat cheapen such commodities. Notwithstanding the extensive use of silver as money, it has steadily depreciated as a commodity since 1873. The silver monometallist claims that as a necessary result flowing from the act of 1873 property has been cheapened, and, figuratively speaking, cut in two. The gold monometallist claims that since the act of 1873 the price of property has held its own or advanced in value, and that the people have been benefited thereby.

A strange law, indeed, if such contentions are true—that at the same time it raises and lowers the values of similar property similarly situated. Of course, this can not be true.

The silver extremist exclaims that 50-cent silver produces 50-cent wheat and fifty-dollar horses. The gold extremist exclaims, it produces 40-cent corn and seventy-five-dollar steers, and thus the contention goes bravely on between the theorists. The bimetallist claims that the act of 1873 has necessarily and logically no effect upon cheapening wheat or horses, and at the same time enhancing the price of corn or steers. All such changes in value can be accounted for in accordance with facts and a moderate application of common sense.

In some parts of the country farm lands have increased in value from $5 to $50 per acre, and in other localities they have depreciated from $50 to $5 or less per acre. It is not possible that such enhanced and depreciated prices are caused at the same time by the alleged crime of 1873, but by other causes and conditions.

One faction exclaims that an increase of our circulating medium to $40 per capita would enhance the price of all commodities. The other contends if there is enough money and credit with which to easily transact the business of the country an enlarged per capita circulation would not necessarily appreciate the price of lands and commodities; that five hundred millions of business is easily transacted with ten millions of actual money; that the business of this great country is carried on with an actual cash capital of 5 per cent on the dollar of its value. One side refers to France with its $40 per capita, and the other to England, Germany, and Russia with their $20 and less per capita. And then the inquiry comes, If the circulating medium in France is double that in England, Germany, or Russia, why are not like commodities twice as high in France as in England, Germany, or Russia? We all know they are not, and that there is a common price level for all like commodities in those countries, and that the per capita theory does not accord with actual facts.

But why follow the line of argument of these extremists further? We know that their theories run counter to facts and experience, and therefore should not be followed. What, then, should be done to restore prosperity to the languishing industries of the country?

Before answering this question I wish to pay my respects a little more fully to the pretended love of Democracy for the white metal. The Democratic party in its national platform of 1892 demanded in effect the repeal of the Sherman Act of 1890, under and in pursuance of which nearly fifty millions of standard silver dollars were annually added to the currency.

If all the silver of all the world is to be coined into standard silver dollars, then I fail to see why the coinage of about fifty millions of standard silver dollars per annum was not a pretty good thing, as it practically consumed the entire annual American product of silver, less that used in the arts and for other purposes. It so appears to me, and for fear that I may be misunderstood I now quote from a speech delivered in the Senate on February 18, 1893, by one of the greatest Democrats of the nineteenth century. Among other things he said:

> I would have voted the other day to take up what is known as the Sherman Act and for its repeal but for the fact that its passage would absolutely demonetize silver and leave it unsupported by not one word of legislation. I thought the measure was audacious. I thought it was an outrage to ask men like myself and others to absolutely sweep from under the silver currency every vestige of law. That is not what we meant at Chicago. That is not what the people mean. I would not vote for the repeal of the Sherman Act because it is vicious in principle, but it must be connected with something better.

A few months later the repeal came, at the special session of 1893, without any reservation or limitation.

This is not at all strange, for we are told that in those days Democratic conversions were very numerous and very rapid, some of them in speed almost rivaling that of "Saul of Tarsus," who was converted "in the twinkling of an eye." This much, however, should be said in Saul's favor: He was marching on to no administrative pie counter.

It is true the repealing act contains something more than was necessary for an actual repeal of the Sherman Act; but is this the something better intimated? If so, then it logically follows that nothing is something better in connection with silver.

The repealing clause says:

> It is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, etc.

Silver had then been practically demonetized by the Democratic act of 1853 for more than forty years. Yet this repealing clause says it is the policy to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money. How can a thing not in existence be continued? Shall the dead live again without resurrection?

Silver as a unit of value was eliminated by the act of 1873. It no longer went to the mint on an equality with gold.

For more than twenty years it was treated as a commodity by legislation, yet it is declared by this repealing clause to be the policy to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money. By "standard money" is meant primary money, redemption money, money on an equality and parity in every respect.

Is this what is meant by the word "continue" in the repealing act, when the equality did not exist and had not existed for forty years—certainly not for twenty? Was not the currency by the repeal of the Sherman Act contracted nearly fifty millions per annum? And was not this repeal under Democratic Administration? And were not both branches of Congress Democratic? Therefore, the striking down of silver and the contraction of the currency nearly $50,000,000 per annum must be charged to the Democratic party. I know that some Republicans voted for its repeal, and I also know that some alleged Democrats voted against its repeal. However, the bill emanated from a Democratic Finance Committee; it passed a Democratic House, a Democratic Senate, and was approved by the greatest of all living, yet politically dead, Democrats, and thereby it became a Democratic act.

It is well known that the President and his followers are gold monometallists, and that the present bill, if it should pass both branches of Congress, would never become a law. It is also apparent that the people now believe Democracy incapable of properly administering national affairs. Whenever it has been intrusted with power by the people it has signally failed. Its theories, traditions, beliefs, tendencies, and policies are not in harmony with national supremacy. In 1846 it passed a bill known as the "Walker tariff." This act was practically in force until 1861. During those years the balance of trade was against us nearly $437,000,000, and this vast sum had to be paid in gold. During such time more than four hundred millions in American gold went abroad. This balance represented just that amount of business which should have been done in this country by American labor and capital. From a Democratic standpoint this was a great tariff bill. Under it our gold went abroad and our labor was largely done in foreign lands. Democracy was so enamored of this act that in 1848 they resolved at their national convention—

> That the fruits of the great political triumphs which elected James K. Polk have fulfilled the hopes of the Democracy of the Union in the noble impulse given to the cause of free trade by the repeal of the tariff of 1842 and the creation of the more equal, honest, and productive tariff of 1846.

The tariff act of 1842 was protective. The tariff act of 1846 was practically free trade. The balance of trade under the tariff act of 1842, during the four years of its existence, was in our favor $40,092,164. This balance was paid with foreign gold. Democracy extolled the act of 1846 as productive in revenue. This was a misconception. It was productive, not in revenue, but in the exportation of gold and in the transportation of business and labor abroad. It was truly "a noble impulse given to the cause of free trade," from a Democratic standpoint. It built up and stimulated industries abroad and destroyed those at home. Mr. Buchanan was at last compelled to say the following of this Democratic measure:

With all the elements of natural wealth in abundance, our manufactories were suspended, our useful public and private enterprises were arrested, and thousands of laborers were deprived of employment and reduced to want.

Some amendments were made to the act of 1846, some more ad valorem duties were imposed. Yet gold went abroad and labor was not done at home. Our revenues for current expenses were insufficient. Bonds bearing a high rate of interest were sold at a large discount in order to raise money to supply the deficiency. The condition of the people was most deplorable. Little money in circulation, and Democratic State banks broken and insolvent. History repeats itself. In 1892, Democracy, hungry, bold, and defiant, made an assault upon the business interests of the country. It boldly announced that the method which had been pursued for more than a half century in raising revenue, principally by indirect taxation, was a fraud, and it was intimated that such taxation was unconstitutional. Upon this issue Democracy was intrusted with power in the legislative and executive branches of the Government. Immediately upon its becoming known that the Government had passed under Democratic control, business faltered and fell by the wayside, manufactories were shut down, and large numbers of men and women were thrown out of employment; banks failed; railroads went into the hands of receivers; consternation and panic stalked throughout the land. Amid all this disaster, and to add still more to the misery of the people, the industries of ten States and Territories were almost annihilated and our currency contracted many millions annually by the repeal of the Sherman Act. In 1893, after having repealed the Sherman Act, Democracy, still bold and defiant, destroyed the tariff bill of 1890 and turned to the act of 1846 for inspiration. It consulted its "curios and antiques," and brought forth, after much travail, another act of "perfidy and dishonor."

It took up again the noble impulse in the cause of free trade where it had left off in 1846. The general effect upon our industries under the Wilson bill of 1894 was the same as under the act of 1846, only more deplorable. Again, "with all the elements of natural wealth in abundance, our manufactures were suspended, our useful public and private enterprises were arrested, and thousands of laborers were deprived of employment and reduced to want."

We are now informed by Democracy that the Wilson bill is a great getter of revenue; even more productive and luxuriant than the McKinley bill; that it produces ample revenue to pay current expenses. Of course this statement is not generally believed to be true.

Under the McKinley bill, while Republicans were in control, ample revenues were collected to pay current expenses, and large annual reductions were made in the national debt. Our labor was done at home and our gold did not go abroad. The balance of trade under this act was in our favor for the year ended June 30, 1891, $39,564,614; for the year ended June 30, 1892, $202,875,686. The balance of trade from June 30, 1892, up to and until the election in November, 1892, was largely in our favor. The result of that election immediately paralyzed business, and the balance of trade on June 30, 1893, under President Cleveland was against us $18,737,728. And it has been ever since enormously against us. Since March 4, 1893, more than $350,000,000 in gold has gone abroad. The national debt has been increased by the sale of over $162,000,000 of bonds and is soon to be increased $100,000,000 more, which vast sums of money have been and will be ultimately used in paying the current expenses of the Government. It therefore appears from a Democratic standpoint that an empty Treasury under a free-trade bill and an annual increase of the national debt by the sale of interest-bearing obligations with which to raise money to pay current expenses is preferable to a full Treasury under a protective bill and the annual reduction of the national debt. The severest blows ever dealt American labor and American industries were delivered at the election in November, 1892, and by the subsequent enactment of the Wilson bill in 1894. From the wounds thus inflicted labor and capital have not yet recovered and will not for years to come. The true date of the Wilson bill in its destructive effects was November, 1892, and not August, 1894. The days of Buchanan over again. Selling bonds to obtain money to fill empty treasuries in time of peace. The gold of the country going abroad and the labor of the country being done by foreign hands on foreign soil. One declaring that a State had no right to secede, yet he could find no constitutional power to coerce a sovereign State; the other annulling the Monroe doctrine in one of its most important features. Then, as now, Democracy believed in State rights, State banks, free trade, and a gold standard.

Mr. President, a majority of the people demand two things: First, the enactment of a tariff law not quite so prohibitive in some respects as the McKinley bill and not quite so luxuriant in its free list; second, the coinage of American silver only at the ratio of 16 to 1. The people believe with a proper tariff law the balance of trade will be speedily restored and foreign gold will flow into the Treasury; and that with the coinage of American silver the money of the country will not be so easily cornered, and that panics and lockouts will not so frequently occur. We are told, however, that even the coinage of the American product would greatly inflate prices. I hardly believe this statement to be true. In case of free coinage of the American product, our mines would probably produce annually from seventy-five to eighty million dollars for a few years, when the output would undoubtedly decrease, as many mines by that time would be worked out and exhausted.

There must be an end to silver mining in this country whether we have free silver coinage or not, because large quantities of silver will be annually required for use in the arts and other purposes; many millions are now annually shipped abroad. The end, however, would come more quickly with free coinage, because of a larger use of silver. It is estimated that from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000 in value of silver per annum is used in the arts and for other purposes. If this is true, then with the coinage of the American product our mintage of silver dollars and fractional currency would probably not exceed forty or forty-five million dollars per annum. Thus it will be seen that our increase of money per capita would be less than 75 cents per annum—an amount hardly sufficient to inflate the currency to any appreciable extent, nor sufficient to cause decadence and decay, nor, if we relied upon this only, to bring much prosperity. It is quite apparent that free coinage of silver will not work miracles nor do all that is claimed for it by its advocates. It also ought to be equally apparent to the gold-standard apostle that an increase of less than $1 per capita in our circulating medium per annum would not cause panic and disaster. With the free coinage of the silver produced in America it would take fully ten years of constant and active mining and the work of our mints to their fullest capacity to increase our circulating medium as much as $5 per capita. And in all human probability at the expiration of that time the production of silver in this country would gradually decrease instead of increase, because of the exhaustion of many of the mines. Is it not apparent, therefore, that the crimination and recrimination of the extremists are without substance or just foundation?

To most people the battle now being waged between them appears harmless, and its resemblance to those of Don Quixote with the wind mills very striking. Exaggeration seems to be a potent weapon. Facts are not wanted; theories predominate.

From the loud and persistent assertions of the free-silver Democrats and Populists some are led to believe that since 1873 our industries have been paralyzed, and that as a nation we have not progressed. The truth is, we never had much prosperity or much business in this country until after the rebellion of 1861; and the golden age of American industries was between 1865 and 1893.

During that time we constructed and equipped more than 100,000 miles of railroad, and in such business expended more than a half million dollars daily. We settled the public domain, organized States, and built cities. America stepped to the front as the greatest manufacturing nation of the world, and to-day she exceeds in power England, France, and Germany combined. In the field of labor one American is the equal of two Englishmen, two Frenchmen, or two Germans. In agricultural pursuits here one American can produce as much as two Englishmen, three Frenchmen, four Germans, or five Austrians. In the last thirty years the inventive genius of man has taken new flights. We have outrun all other nations in intelligence, wealth, and enterprise, and to-day 70,000,000 of Americans own one-quarter of all the wealth of all the world. During those years our progress was marvelous, incomparable. Therefore, Mr. President, does it not plainly appear that the silver question has been expanded beyond all reasonable proportions by extremists; its benefit or injury most grossly exaggerated? It is not, in my opinion, the greatest and most important question of the hour. It is not the sole cause of hard times by any means.

There are other industries which are now languishing that far exceed in value and importance the production of the silver mines.

Less than 2 per cent of the land of the great State of Colorado is under cultivation, yet its annual agricultural productions exceed in value its annual silver output. The agricultural products of Kansas for the year 1895 exceed in value the entire silver output of the Western States for any one year. The value of the products and commodities produced annually in America exceed many hundred times the annual output of the American silver mines. Thus we see that the silver product per annum is almost infinitesimal when compared with the aggregate value of our other products and commodities.

It is but a drop in the great commercial bucket. Therefore is it not apparent that the effect of the coinage of the American silver would not be injuriously felt, and that the danger apprehended by the gold monometallist is largely theoretical and imaginary? The greatest benefit to be derived from the coinage of American silver would be to give employment to a few thousand idle laborers, the investment of some capital, and a slow, gradual, and healthful expansion of our primary or redemption money. The inflation of the currency caused by the coinage of the American product, I believe, would be beneficial, not injurious.

It would stimulate business some, but it alone would not produce general prosperity. Our misfortune is not wholly due to the demonetization of silver or a failure to coin it, although it is a factor which enters into the situation to some extent.

In my opinion there is a vastly more important question involved than the mere coinage of silver. When I see the champions of Democracy parading around the prostrate form of the silver queen, shedding copious floods of briny tears, I am led to believe that such great show of grief and sorrow is not from the heart, but rather in the nature of an exhibition before a susceptible public for political purposes. The majority of the American people do not believe in the tenets of Democracy. They have overthrown its most sacred principles, State rights, State banks, and free trade. And in my opinion they will resent its assumed leadership in finance. In the past Democratic theories have been unsound, Democratic policies unfortunate. Why will they not prove equally so in the future? What new and recent assurances have the people that they will be safe leaders in the cause of bimetallism? In discussing this question we must not forget the glorious history of the Republican party or its fundamental principles. Free speech, free schools, free press, free ballot, protection to American industries and American labor, and a currency as national as the flag and as strong as the Government. All other questions are minor and subordinate, and upon such minor questions Republicans can not afford to be led into Democratic and Populistic camps with the vain and delusive cry of the free and unlimited coinage of all the silver of all the world unaided and alone at the ratio of 16 to 1.

In my opinion, the chief cause of our misfortune originated first in the great and unfortunate mistake made by the people in the election of November, 1892, conferring power upon the Democratic party. And this most deplorable mistake was intensified by unfortunate laws relating to our revenues which Democracy placed upon the statute book. The Wilson bill is too near a free-trade act to suit the industries of the nation. Its blighting and destructive effect has been felt in all branches of industry. Nearly three years of Democratic administration has proved more expensive to the people than the national debt incurred because of the rebellion of 1861. Thus we learn that some things are more expensive though not quite so deplorable as war. When we shall have placed upon the statute book a proper revenue bill, then American labor will find full hours of employment at home and good compensation. Then the balance of trade will be in our favor and not against us. Then gold will come from abroad and remain in the Treasury, and the endless chain will be no more. Then the mints of the country can be safely opened to the coinage of American silver only. Then the fears of the gold monometallist as to the danger of bimetallism will have disappeared. His disordered brain will have assumed its normal condition. Then in the head of the silver extremist wheels will cease to revolve. Exaggeration will be forgotten. Then prosperity and contentment will be in every home, gladness will penetrate every heart, and labor will make the nation resound with its joyous acclaim. Then Democracy, what little there is of it, will again consult its "curios and antiques" and arrange its feeble battle lines along State rights, State banks, and free trade. The loud clarion voice of Populism will be heard no more in the land, sounding the praises of the free and unlimited coinage of all the silver of all the world at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Its voice will be lower, and in sad and melancholy tones it will sing of the beauties of irredeemable paper money based upon nothing, and of the inestimable blessing to be derived from free subtreasuries, maintained at governmental expense, in which the people may store their perishable and nonperishable products.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the issue of all issues at this time is the money question. I fully realize that the question is at the front, not, however, because of its merit only, but rather because of hard times, caused largely, if not wholly, by bad legislation, and because of its industrious and persistent cultivation by ambitious men, aided by the discarded and dissatisfied politicians of the old parties.

Mr. President, I am ready and willing at this time to vote for the free coinage of the silver produced in the United States only, not because money is the paramount issue of the hour, but rather because I believe that we are shortly to have more favorable laws governing our greater and more important industries, when prosperity will return.

And then good, and only good, in my judgment, can come by an increase in our redemption or primary money. I am also ready and willing to vote for a bill providing for the coinage of our silver at the rate of 16 to 1 as an object lesson. If the law proves beneficial we will retain it; if injurious, repeal it.

Whatever the result, it will stand as a monument on the highway of time as a warning or blessing to those coming hereafter. Our country is too wealthy, our resources too great, to be permanently injured by the experiment.

Mr. President, the people, as demonstrated by the elections of 1893, 1894, and 1895, have determined to place the entire control of this great Government in the hands of the Republican party as speedily as possible. It is ready and willing to accept the great trust so to be devolved. It will meet every question and decide it properly. It will be equal to every emergency. It will settle the questions of tariff and finance unaided and alone. It will establish and maintain the equality and parity between gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 to the entire satisfaction of the people. Then we shall have no personal Administration in opposition to the will of the people. The people will never forget that whatever there is in this Government for the last thirty-five years worthy of emulation or preservation is due solely to the wisdom, statesmanship, and patriotism of the Republican party. In the future, as in the past, guided by that power which controlrs the destinie of men and of nations, its mission will still be onwad and upwards.

Mr. NELSON. I had intended to submit some remarks upon the pending measure to-day, but it is now rather late in the day and I will let it go over until Monday, when I shall ask for a short time the privilege of submitting a few remarks upon the bill.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

POTOMAC RIVER MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 176) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River, which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments. I will state, if I may, sir, that this bill is very heartily recommended by the Secretary of War, who regards it as important for military purposes, and it has the earnest support in this body of a distinguished gentleman who was the Secretary of War under a former Administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the pending measure may be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. PUGH. I understand that the consideration of that bill will not interfere with the unfinished business?

Mr. DANIEL. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at all. Unanimous consent is asked.

Mr. CHANDLER. By unanimous consent it can be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLANCHARD. One moment, Mr. President. I was on my feet not for the purpose of objecting to the bill, but before unanimous consent is given I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia if it is anywhere provided in the bill that one-half of the expense of this structure shall be paid by the District of Columbia?

Mr. DANIEL. No.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I hope the Senator will agree to an amendment to that effect. Otherwise I shall feel constrained to object to the bill, much as I dislike to do it.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow the bill to be read I think I can appropriately answer his suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must inquire whether there is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and will be read.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The bill is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Louisiana to state that he does not object to its consideration.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I have arranged with the Senator from Virginia about it. I do not object.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The amendments were, in section 2, line 1, after the word "That," to strike out "the cost of said bridge shall not exceed the sum of, $600,000; and"; in line 5, after the word "of," to strike out "securing designs and of commencing the construction of said bridge; which," and insert "making the necessary surveys, soundings, and borings on the line of the proposed bridge, and for securing designs and estimates of cost of said bridge, which"; so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of making the necessary surveys, soundings, and borings on the line of the proposed bridge, and for securing designs and estimates of cost of said bridge, which shall be used exclusively for foot passenger and vehicles, and prohibited to all tramways, whether propelled by steam, electric, cable, horse, or other power.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the bill having been perfected, I beg leave to say just a few words.

The report of the Secretary of War is not yet published in the form in which we usually have it, but no doubt Senators have read it. In that report will be found the considerations set forth in favor of the erection of this bridge by the United States Government. There is an important military post near the capital, at Fort Myer, just across the river. In addition to that, the Government is the owner of the soil. It owns some 1,100 acres of land adjacent to the city, the former Arlington estate, in which is a large national cemetery, and on which also is an immense flat, near the Potomac, which the Secretary of War considers would be of desirable use for troops in maneuvering and drilling and for the large bodies which often visit the capital to encamp.

The considerations set forth by the Secretary of War in favor of this bridge are that it is to be erected for the purpose of connecting the national capital with the military post which is its guard and with the property which is under the control of the Secretary of War, which holds a great national cemetery and a field appropriate for future military uses, both of the Army and the militia. These considerations are so weighty that in considering them we should lose sight of any view as to the mere government of the District of Columbia. I think, sir, that this is a fair charge directly upon the Treasury of the United States. It not only has the support of the present Secretary of War, but the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who once occupied that position during the Administration of President Harrison, is now one of the committee which has passed upon and is supporting this bill.

I hope it may be the pleasure of the Senator from Louisiana to recognize the broad national considerations from a military point of view which have controlled the advocacy of this bill on the part of the War Department, and that he may not offer the amendment which had occurred to his mind, and which would be very pertinent and just if this were a mere local improvement for the benefit of the city of Washington. Though incidentally advantages will undoubtedly accrue both to the District of Columbia and to the State of Virginia, the chief benefit is that to be derived by the Government of the United States, which for its convenience desires this bridge to connect the national capital with the military post which defends it, with the military cemetery which is so often visited by citizens of this country from all portions of it, and with a military parade ground upon which both regular troops and militia and other large bodies may encamp.

An additional consideration is found in the fact that should the Government ever desire to dispose of any portion of this large area the accretion in value would be immense.

Mr. President, access to the national capital ought to be made easy to the citizens who approach it from any quarter, and communication between the Headquarters of the Army and the fortifications which concern it should also be made by an easy highway always ready to be used. It is a shame, in my humble judgment, that we have so long neglected this matter and that communication is so poor and imperfect between the capital and the places to which I have referred.

I will now throw myself upon the magnanimity and place myself at the mercy of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, I did not rise a while ago for the purpose of preventing the passage of this bill for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River to connect the District directly with the military post at Fort Myer and with the national cemetery at Arlington. I believe the bridge should be built. I agree with the Senator from Virginia that the facilities for crossing the Potomac River at the city of Washington are inadequate. My purpose chiefly was to suggest the propriety of the payment of one-half of the expense by the District of Columbia.

The Government of the United States pays now and has been paying for many years past, certainly as long as I have had any connection with either House of Congress, one-half of the public expenditures in the District of Columbia. That was all right so long as Washington was a straggling town, but now when Washington has grown to the colossal proportions of a city of 250,000 people, it is not just to the people of the United States at large that the Federal Treasury should continue to be taxed to pay one-half of the municipal expenses of the District. This system had its origin in the idea that the Government owned one-half of the area of the city of Washington; hence, should bear one-half of the expenses of the city. But in order to debit the Government with the ownership of half of the area of the city, they charged the area occupied by the streets and avenues to the Government. This was done when Washington was a small town as compared with its proportions now. Now, Mr. President, it is not right to charge to the Government the streets of the city. They are common to everyone and should be excluded from the computation.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Louisiana permit me to correct him there?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Certainly; if I am in error I desire to be corrected.

Mr. FAULKNER. Fifty-one per cent in area of the entire property within the limits of the city of Washington is in streets and reservations, not counting at all the property owned by the Government, on which its public buildings are situated, nor does it include the hundreds of lots owned by the Government as proprietor, and which the Government has the power to sell and is selling at different times, paying no taxes whatever upon it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. My remarks had reference not to the structures erected by the Government on lands owned by it, but to the area constituting the city of Washington. By the Senator's own statement 50 or 51 per cent of this area is in streets and parks. This must be according to a survey made a long time ago. I venture to say a survey made now would show no such results. Washington has been built up and spreads out over a large space.

The time has come, and I hope in the near future it will crystallize into law, when the amount that the Government will be called upon to pay of the municipal expenditures of the city of Washington will be less than one-half. What was fair and just in this regard twenty-five years ago ceases to be so now. Conditions have changed, but the policy complained of has not changed; it still exists.

Inasmuch, then, as we are still contributing one-half out of the public Treasury to the expenses of the District of Columbia, it is not an injustice to ask that when structures of this kind are sought to be built, connecting the District of Columbia with the adjacent Virginia shore, one-half of the expense of such structure should be borne by the District.

If I mistake not, one-half of the expense of the bridge that spans the Potomac River at Georgetown was paid by the District. If I am in error in this, I trust the Senator from Virginia or the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia will correct me. If that bridge was constructed by the joint expenditure of moneys pertaining to the District of Columbia and the Federal Treasury, why should not the same rule obtain in regard to this bridge, which, though it is called a memorial bridge, is nothing but an additional bridge over the Potomac River for the accommodation of the District of Columbia and the people who desire to cross the river to get into the District?

Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of the bill by the Senate. There was an understanding between the Senator from Virginia and myself that, notwithstanding the fact the bill was laid before the Senate, if I insisted upon urging an objection, it would go over. I do not insist upon its going over, but I do hope the Senator from Virginia will accept an amendment which I offer to the bill. I send up to be read by the Secretary a proviso to be appended at the end of the second section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana moves to further amend the bill by adding to it what will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill add the following proviso:

Provided, That one-half of the cost of said bridge shall be paid by the District of Columbia and one-half by the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. I can not acquiesce in the amendment. I would be glad to have it passed upon by the Senate, but it hardly seems to me to be just.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not want to object to the bill if this amendment can be adopted. I will vote for it if we can have the bill disposed of, so that we can proceed to the consideration of executive business. If there is to be further debate I must object to the further consideration of the bill at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VEST subsequently said: I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill in regard to the memorial bridge was passed, on account of an amendment which I understand was adopted while I was temporarily absent from the Chamber. If I had been here I should have expressed my opinion about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

LANDS AT PORT ROYAL, S. C.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw that motion for a moment?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 1297) to provide for the purchase of lands adjoining the United States naval station, Port Royal, S. C., a small bill which the Navy Department wishes to have passed, and which has been reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs favorably.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment, in section 2, line 2, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "three"; so as to make the section read:

That for the purchase of the lands hereinbefore described there is hereby appropriated the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. TILLMAN. I move to amend the amendment of the committee by increasing the amount from $3,000 to $5,000. I have conferred with the Secretary of the Navy, and this is proposed in order to gain time. It is feared that the land will not be sold if an amount so small as $3,000 is offered for it. I have consulted the members of the committee and they have agreed that the amendment I propose shall be made. I ask, therefore, that $5,000 shall be inserted as the amount named.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the appropriate amount which should be inserted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT ASSINNIBOINE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 626) providing for disposal of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CARTER. There are certain amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands which I ask to have considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands were, in section 1, line 10, before the word "act," to strike out "an" and insert "any," and at the end of the section to insert:

Provided, That if the entire reservation be abandoned for military purposes this act shall not apply to an area 1 mile square embracing the Government buildings at Fort Assinniboine.

So as to make the section read:

That all lands which have been or may hereafter be excluded from the limits of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation in the State of Montana shall be open to the operation of the laws regulating homestead entry, except section 2301 of the Revised Statutes, and to entry under the town-site laws and the laws governing the disposal of coal lands, desert lands, and mineral lands, and shall not be subject to sale under the provisions of any act relating to the sale of abandoned military reservations: Provided, That if the entire reservation be abandoned for military purposes this act shall not apply to an area 1 mile square embracing the Government buildings at Fort Assinniboine.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 27, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 24, 1896.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL.

Patrick S. Nagle, of Oklahoma Territory, to be marshal of the United States for the Territory of Oklahoma, vice E. D. Nix, removed.

COLLECTOR OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

John A. Mason, of New York, to be collector of internal revenue for the Second district of New York, to succeed John A. Sullivan, resigned.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

George H. Cleaves, of New York, to be surveyor of customs for the port of Greenport, in the State of New York, to succeed E. S. Havens, resigned. Mr. Cleaves is now serving under a temporary commission issued during the recess of the Senate. This nomination to correct error in name of Mr. Cleaves, nominated as George S. Cleaves December 17, 1895, which nomination is withdrawn.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 24, 1896.

POSTMASTERS.

Francis Riley, to be postmaster at Hoosick Falls, in the county of Rensselaer and State of New York.

William Killefer, to be postmaster at Paw Paw, in the county of Van Buren and State of Michigan.

Jonathan L. Pettyjohn, to be postmaster at Olathe, in the county of Johnson and State of Kansas.

SENATE.

MONDAY, January 27, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. 1) granting a pension to Mrs. Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell;

A bill (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood; and

A bill (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 147) granting a pension to George W. Case, late private Company B, Twenty-seventh New York Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. 711) to increase the pension of Uzziel B. Church;

A bill (H. R. 925) to pension Annie J. Corbett;

A bill (H. R. 994) granting an increase of pension to Andrew B. Keith;

A bill (H. R. 1020) granting an increase of pension to Gilman Williams;

A bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion;

A bill (H. R. 1605) granting a pension to Anna Kelley;

A bill (H. R. 1616) granting a pension to Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind.;

A bill (H. R. 2340) granting a pension to Caroline Parker; and

A bill (H. R. 3698) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulany.

SENATORS FROM UTAH.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I take great personal pleasure, and a peculiar pleasure, in presenting the credentials of Frank J. Cannon, elected a Senator from the State of Utah. I ask that the credentials be read and that the Senator-elect be qualified as a member of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials of Frank J. Cannon, chosen by the legislature of Utah a Senator from that State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I present the credentials of Arthur Brown, a Senator-elect from the State of Utah, and ask that they may be read and that the oath of office be administered to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be read.

The Secretary read the credentials of Arthur Brown, chosen by the legislature of Utah a Senator from that State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. DUBOIS. There being no question about the regularity of the proceedings, I ask that the Senators from Utah be sworn in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senators-elect will come forward and receive the oath of office.

Mr. Cannon and Mr. Brown were escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. DUBOIS and Mr. BURROWS, respectively, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to them, they took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Senate proceed to ascertain the classes to which the Senators from the State of Utah shall be assigned, in conformity with the resolution of May 14, 1789, and as the Constitution requires.

On motion of Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon, it was Ordered, That the Secretary put into the ballot box two papers of equal size, one of which shall be numbered 1, and the other shall be numbered 3. Each of the Senators from the State of Utah shall draw out one paper; and the Senator who shall draw out the paper numbered 1 shall be assigned to the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1899; and the Senator who shall draw out the paper numbered 3 shall be assigned to the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire the 3d day of March, 1897.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senators from Utah will please come forward, in accordance with the order of the Senate.

Mr. CANNON and Mr. BROWN advanced to the Secretary's desk and drew, respectively, in the order named, a paper from the ballot box.

The papers were then handed by the Secretary to the Vice-President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Mr. BROWN has drawn the paper numbered 3, and is accordingly assigned to the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire March 3, 1897. Mr. CANNON has drawn the paper numbered 1, and is accordingly assigned to the class of Senators whose terms of service will expire March 3, 1899. The proper entry will be made upon the Journal of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of a joint resolution providing for the temporary appointment of expert money counters in the Treasury Department in order to bring up the work of counting and assorting currency sent to the Department for redemption, which is now $7,500,000 in arrears, and requesting that the resolution be enacted into a law as early as practicable; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Auditor for the State and other Departments in regard to the necessity for an additional clerk of class 4 in his office, and recommending that provision be made for such clerk for the remainder of the current fiscal year in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a resolution of the 3d instant calling for information as to what disposition has been made of the appropriation made in the act "making appropriations for the support of the Army, approved September 22, 1888," for pneumatic dynamite guns, whether any batteries have been established under the act at any of the ports of the United States, and whether it would be possible to establish such a battery at Fort Warren, Boston Harbor, transmitting reports from the Chief of Ordnance and the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, upon the subject; which, with the accompanying reports, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 147) granting a pension to George W. Case, late private Company B, Twenty-seventh New York Cavalry;

A bill (H. R. 711) to increase the pension of Uzziel B. Church;

A bill (H. R. 925) to pension Annie J. Corbett;

A bill (H. R. 994) granting an increase of pension to Andrew B. Keith;

A bill (H. R. 1020) granting an increase of pension to Gilman Williams;

A bill (H. R. 1141) granting a pension to Miss Mary E. Hull, dependent sister of John A. Hull, deceased, late of Company F, Eighty-first Regiment of Illinois Volunteer Infantry, in the late war of the rebellion;

A bill (H. R. 1605) granting a pension to Anna Kelley;

A bill (H. R. 1616) granting a pension to Michael E. Bricker, of Edgerton, Ind.;

A bill (H. R. 2340) granting a pension to Caroline Parker; and

A bill (H. R. 3698) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulany.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the protection of the seacoast cities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

Mr. PLATT presented the petition of Henry Spies and 103 other citizens of New York, praying that the Congress will authorize the Secretary of War to contract with Charles Stoughton and his associates for the entire work of constructing a canal through the Harlem Kills, New York, 15 feet deep and 300 feet wide, for a sum not exceeding $1,450,000; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. QUAY presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that appropriations be made to complete the defenses of harbors of coastwise cities; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented petitions of W. G. Conn and 304 other citizens of Fayette County, of J. A. Hart and 19 other citizens of West Lebanon, of Henry Blackwell and 61 other citizens of Montoursville, and of W. C. Elder and 76 other citizens of Red Bank, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. NELSON. I present the petition of J. S. Pillsbury, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the national banking law. I ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., January 15, 1896.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read the text of a bill which you have introduced governing our national banks. I most heartily approve of the alterations which you propose; they will be very helpful; and I am glad you have taken up the subject of national banking. After ten years' experience as director of national bank, you will permit me to make the following suggestions for further alterations in the law, as I did not notice that you will include these changes.

Amend the banking law so as to prohibit, and, in fact, make a penalty for banks to make rediscounts. This is a very important amendment, from the fact that almost any national bank would have sufficient liability when it loans its deposits; and the risk is great when any bank goes beyond this and borrows money by rediscounts.

Second. It should be made a penal offense for the officers of any bank to borrow money, directly or indirectly, from the bank of which they are officers. It has become quite the custom for the officers of banks to take the money which they use, without permission, from the fact that they are officers. This has probably had a tendency to wreck more banks than any other factor in the management of national banks. More than half of all the failures of national banks have been caused largely by the officers taking money from the banks without the directors' knowledge.

Third. The officers of all national banks should be prohibited from loaning any of the funds of the bank of which they are officers above the sum, say, of $500, except where the limits for loans to customers have been fixed by the discount committee or directors of the bank. And no loans should be made above the limit of $500 except the applicants shall first have been passed upon by the discount committee or directors of such bank.

It is entirely wrong, and should be considered a misdemeanor, for the officers of the bank to make loans on their own judgment without consulting the directors or the discount committee.

Fourth. National banks should have the advantage of all bills which may be destroyed or lost; as, for instance, when bank bills are destroyed by fire, or lost by water, or anything of this kind, banks should have the advantage of these losses, instead, as now, under the general banking law, the Government having the benefit of such losses, as the Government has full security, by the deposits of bonds, for the issuing of their bills.

The financial crisis through which this country has recently passed has given experience to those who are connected with the management of banks that it is imperatively necessary that the laws should be more strongly guarded by making these amendments for the safety of the community, and all financial institutions should be so managed that safety is the first object of a bank.

Excuse me for calling your attention to this. I should not do so, except that my experience teaches me that such amendments as suggested would make the law more perfect, and would throw around us such guards for the safety of the community as are absolutely necessary.

Very truly, yours,

J. S. PILLSBURY.

P. S.—The officers who should be prohibited from borrowing money are the president, vice-president, cashier, assistant cashier, teller, and assistant teller. The prohibition should not embrace the directors.

J. S. P.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SQUIRE presented petitions of the Board of Trade of Savannah, Ga.; of the Chamber of Commerce of Charleston, S. C.; of the Savannah Cotton Exchange, of Savannah, Ga.; of the city council of Charleston, S. C., and of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for fortifications and other seacoast defenses; which were referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Ballard, Wash., and a petition of the common council of Hoquiam, Wash., praying for the speedy construction of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the Government; which were referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Whatcom County, Wash., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of the University of the State of Washington, and petitions of sundry citizens of Skagit County, and of sundry citizens of Snohomish County, in the State of Washington, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 735, to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy; which were referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present a series of petitions containing thousands of signatures of citizens of King County, in the State of Washington, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 735, to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented resolutions adopted by the congregation of the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Calumet, Mich., favoring the resolutions recently introduced by Senator HOAR relating to the Armenian persecutions; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the White Lake Farmers' Club, of Oakland County, Mich., praying for the free delivery of mails in rural districts; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BURROWS presented a petition of 80 citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of House joint resolution No. 11, to amend the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting further appropriations to institutions under ecclesiastical control; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON presented sundry petitions of employees of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, of the Franklin Sugar Refinery, of Philadelphia, and of citizens of Buttercup, Mineral Point, and Vinco, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. TILLMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Fairfield, S. C., praying that an appropriation be made for the deepening of Winyah Bay bar, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the protection of the seacoast cities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented a petition of the National Association of Manufacturers of the United States, praying for the speedy passage of the emergency tariff bill; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Paint, Oil and Varnish Club of New York, praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Boston (Mass.) Chamber of Commerce and a petition of the Park Street Club, of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation restricting immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of sundry citizens of Chattanooga, Tenn., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of Worcester, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to secure the adoption of the international metric system of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the First Methodist Church of Calumet, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed withdrawal of American missionaries and the abandonment of American Christian enterprises in Turkey; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to the American missions in Turkey, and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition of the board of supervisors of Butte County, Cal., and a petition of the board of supervisors of Lassen County, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation developing the mining industries of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. VILAS presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Superior, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to extend to the port of Superior the privileges of immediate transportation in bond, and remonstrating against the enactment of any and all legislation which has in view the attachment of the city of Superior to the Duluth district for any customs purposes whatever; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRICE presented petitions of the Board of Industries of Warren, of the Board of Commerce of Youngstown, and of the Board of Trade of Niles, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the construction of a ship canal connecting Lake Erie and the Ohio River at Pittsburg, Pa.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of Encampment No. 125, Union Veteran Legion, of Cincinnati, Ohio, remonstrating against the restoration of deserters to the military rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the Ministerial Associations of Troy, New Philadelphia, and Canal Dover, all in the State of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation in the interest of morality; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of 35 citizens of Melrose, Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I present a petition of the common council of the city of Junction, Oreg., in which the petitioners urgently request that the Fifty-fourth Congress will not fail to enact such wise and conservative legislation as will secure the speedy construction of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the Government, and for the benefit of our whole country, under such conditions as will secure low tolls without discrimination, safe passage, and free from the abuses which have attended franchises granted to any transportation companies. I move that the petition be referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

The motion was agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT OF JOHN LEWIS WALLER.

Mr. BAKER. I present the petition of Mrs. Susan Waller, who represents that she is a citizen of the State of Kansas, and that her husband in 1891 was appointed a consul at Tamatave, Madagascar; that on the 5th day of March, 1895, he was arrested by a French expedition that had no jurisdiction over the island; that he was tried by a drumhead court-martial on the 18th day of March, 1895, convicted in about three hours afterwards, and sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment in France; that he was transported from the Island of Madagascar to France in chains; that he has been in prison ever since, and is still in prison; and that the authorities of the United States have not yet been able to obtain a copy of the record or of the evidence upon which he was convicted. I desire to read the last four or five lines of the petition, as the relief the petitioner demands is expressed better than I could express it. She says:

> That these acts by which France has held my husband, an American citizen, as an imprisoned felon for the past ten months, are a crime against justice, and I believe and am sure that had my husband been a subject of Great Britain he would have long since been released. Therefore your petitioner, an American woman and an humble citizen of this great Republic, in behalf of my husband, the said John Lewis Waller, appeals to the Congress of the United States and prays that some suitable and immediate action be taken for his release.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE COL. CHARLES A. ZOLLINGER.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a paper from the Military Order of the Loyal Legion of the United States, Commandery of the State of Indiana, in memoriam of Companion Charles A. Zollinger, colonel One hundred and twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteer Infantry, who died at Fort Wayne December 27, 1893. I move that the paper be referred to the Committee on Pensions to accompany Senate bill No. 1485, granting a pension to Mary Zollinger, heretofore introduced by me.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VOORHEES, from the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1359) for the construction of two steam revenue cutters for service on the Pacific Coast, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 656) appropriating $125,000 for the construction of a light-house tender for the Gulf coast of Florida, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 56) extending the time for completion of the Washington and Maryland Railway Company, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 129) for the relief of Capt. George H. Perkins, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1320) to confirm the title to certain lands in William Morgan and Harrison Moore, and to require the issue of patents therefor, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

DOCUMENTS FOR DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Printing I report back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 66) to supply the Department of State with documents and submit a report thereon. I ask for the consideration of the joint resolution at the present time.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to print, in addition to the usual number, and furnish the Department of State with 20 copies of each Senate and House of Representatives document and report.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the necessity for the joint resolution?

Mr. HALE. Instead of having the report read, I will state for the information of the Senate that the State Department, which is constantly being called upon for copies of these documents, has under the existing law only one copy for the head of the Department and each bureau and division. That number, of course, as will be readily seen, does not in any way answer the wants of the Department. The committee looked at the matter carefully, and concluded that the request for only 20 additional copies is not unreasonable, and therefore directed the House joint resolution to be reported favorably. It is not a matter of large amount, anyway, being only 20 additional copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HALVOR K. OMLIE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 818) for the relief of Halvor K. Omlie, of Homen, N. Dak., to report it without amendment. It is a very short bill, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant a period of one year to Halvor K. Omlie, who May 12, 1893, made final proof on his preemption claim for the northwest quarter of section 8, township 163 north, of range 58 west, of the fifth principal meridian of the State of North Dakota, within which to make the necessary payment for the lands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 1772) to revoke the order of dismissal of Capt. Thomas M. Elliott from the service of the United States, and to amend his military record; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1773) granting a service pension to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who served in the war of the rebellion for the period of ninety days; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1780) to provide for the erection of a wall around the jail of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1781) making an appropriation to furnish flags for the schoolhouses of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1782) providing for the appointment by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of the trustees of the Industrial Home School, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 1783) granting a pension to Mrs. Helen G. Heiner, widow of Capt. Robert G. Heiner, of Washington, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1784) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1785) for the correction of muster of Adolph von Haake, late major Sixty-eighth Regiment Veteran Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1786) for the relief of the legal representatives of John H. Crane, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1787) granting a pension to Nancy T. Duncklee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1788) granting a pension to William R. Lake; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 1789) for the relief of Henry Hamlin Gale, alias Henry Hamlin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLANCHARD introduced a bill (S. 1790) granting a pension to Mrs. Hypolite Huard, of New Orleans, La., widow of Hypolite Huard, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 1791) granting an increase of pension to William H. Bennett; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1792) to purchase a painting of Abraham Lincoln; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 1793) to provide for the restatement, readjustment, settlement, and payment of dues to army officers in certain cases; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 1794) to establish a military post on the Penobscot River near the city of Bangor, in Penobscot County, in the State of Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon introduced a bill (S. 1795) to provide for a final settlement with the Naalem band of the Tillamook tribe of Indians, of Oregon, in accordance with a certain agreement between the United States and the said Indians, dated the 6th day of August, 1851; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1796) making an appropriation for a governmental survey of the mouths of the Yukon River, in Alaska; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1797) for the relief of C. M. Carter; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1798) granting a pension to Thomas B. Hanoum; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1799) authorizing the President of the United States to place Col. David Stuart Gordon, Sixth United States Cavalry, as a brigadier-general on the retired list of the United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 1800) supplementary to an act entitled "An act granting pensions to soldiers and sailors who are incapacitated for the performance of manual labor, and providing for pensions to widows, minor children, and dependent parents," approved June 27, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. QUAY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 63) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury in preparing designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the mint building at Philadelphia, Pa.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HAWLEY, it was Ordered, That James M. Miller be permitted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the petition for relief filed by him in the Fifty-second Congress, there having been no adverse report thereon.

RAILWAY TRAFFIC AGREEMENTS.

Mr. PEFFER. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read, lie over under the rules, and be printed.

The resolution was read, ordered to lie over, and to be printed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to inform the Senate—

First. Whether there has been a custom, rule, regulation, or agreement a long time existing among railway companies and associations engaged in interstate traffic whose lines extend to or through Missouri River points, which custom, rule, regulation, or agreement establishes and maintains different rates of charges for carrying passengers and freight east and west from said points, and whether such difference in charges is reasonable and warranted by law.

Second. Whether such agreement affects alike companies running through lines to and beyond said Missouri River points, as well as companies whose lines terminate there, giving the names of roads engaged in interstate traffic to and through such places.

Third. Whether an agreement or traffic arrangement was recently made or entered into by and between any railway companies or associations, naming them, whereby charges for carrying grain and other farm produce from points in Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Indian Territory to points in Texas and Mexico were advanced; whether such advance charges are now in force; what was the reason or purpose of the advance, and whether it is reasonable or unreasonable and in violation of the provisions of the interstate-commerce law.

Fourth. Whether, in case these agreements have been made and these proceedings had, there is, in the opinion of the commission, any additional legislation required to better protect the public interests.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 23d instant, approved and signed the act (S. 43) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," approved September 29, 1890, and the several acts amendatory thereof.

IMPRISONMENT OF EUGENE V. DEBS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], coming over from a previous day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. CALL, by request, that a committee of seven Senators be appointed who shall be charged with the duty of inquiring into the imprisonment of Eugene V. Debs for alleged contempt of court.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Florida if he will not kindly permit that resolution to lie over?

Mr. CALL. I will agree to that to accommodate the Senator, provided the resolution shall not lose its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins; and as the public exigency requires that the valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, to be purchased under the authority of the said act and by the said appropriation, may be ready for distribution at the earliest possible date, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to procure them by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "seeds," to insert:

Provided, That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them: And provided further, That he shall not be required to expend all the appropriation available for said purchase, but only so much thereof as, considering the time when distribution can be made, may profitably be expended to promote the objects named in said act.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, my object in calling up the joint resolution is not that I may have an opportunity to make a speech thereon, because I am willing that we shall take a vote at once on the joint resolution if the Senate is ready to vote.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to know whether he is proceeding under the courtesy of the Senate to call up the joint resolution so as to make a speech thereon, or whether the joint resolution itself is now the order of business before the Senate? I should like to know the parliamentary status.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is a matter which rests with the Chair under the rules. I was recognized to call up the joint resolution, and desire to address the Senate upon it.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator merely desires to address the Senate, to appeal to the courtesy of the Senate upon the joint resolution, of course I do not object. If, however, he moves to take up the joint resolution as a matter for consideration, that is another question. I do not know that I should object to that; but I should like to know which one of those positions the joint resolution occupies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from North Dakota kindly repeat his request?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to have the consideration of the joint resolution. I do not desire to occupy the time of the Senate in making a speech for home consumption. I want action on the resolution. That is my object in calling it up for immediate consideration.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I understand the Senator does not propose to displace the regular order, but simply to have the joint resolution taken up in the morning hour.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I can not displace the regular order. One objection will of course prevent that.

Mr. PLATT. Taking up the joint resolution now does not displace the regular order.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like the Chair to state whether the joint resolution is up for consideration or whether the Senator from North Dakota is merely proceeding under the courtesy of the Senate to make a speech?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I did not hear the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from North Dakota. Will the Senator state to the Chair whether he makes the request for unanimous consent or whether he enters a motion to take up the joint resolution?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It was my object to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have one question answered before I can respond to that. It used to be the rule—I do not know whether it is now—that debate during the morning hour was limited to five minutes. Does that apply to this case?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That applies to debate under Rule VIII, the Chair will state.

Mr. GEORGE. And it does not apply, then, to this case?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not apply to this case.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. As I was saying, my object in calling up the joint resolution at this time is not that I may have an opportunity to make a speech on it, or that my constituents shall be supplied with garden seeds. I think they can exist without them. My purpose is much higher than that. It seems to me that there is a great principle involved here. The question at issue is whether an executive officer of the Government shall deliberately set aside the laws of Congress. I believe that I shall be able to show, if I am allowed to proceed, that the Secretary of Agriculture has deliberately, willfully, designedly, and premeditatedly refused to comply with certain statutes passed by the Congress of the United States. It is not a question of the value or the importance of distributing seeds and trees to the agriculturists or the horticulturists of the country, but it is simply a question of the supremacy of the law, as I take it.

Mr. President, when a Cabinet minister, one who sits at the council table of the Executive of the United States, is thus permitted to violate the law, or rather nullify the law, what may we expect of the great mass of the people who move along the pathway of private life? I very much doubt whether this particular Secretary of Agriculture really comprehends the importance of his duty in the position which he occupies. I do not believe that he understands the intricacies and the wants of the great industry of agriculture and the great industry of horticulture to a sufficient extent to direct him in performing his duties as his predecessors have performed them.

It is said that the Secretary was at one time and in some way connected with what is known as Arbor Day—a veritable Touchstone in the forest of Arden, except that Shakespeare's greatest jester knew nothing whatever about trees, and was not even conscious of his own wit until he had rubbed his shins against it. The Secretary of Agriculture is, however, every moment of his life conscious of his own wit and never fails of an opportunity to show it. It may be that this recalcitrant officer knows something about the question of trees; it is barely probable that he can distinguish between an oak and an orchid, but I very much doubt whether he can discern the line of difference between a night-blooming cereus and a Russian thistle.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the law governing the duties of this officer. First, we have the provision in the agricultural appropriation act, passed at the last session of Congress, which I will read:

Division of seeds: Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins: For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, and expense of labor, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $180,000.

Of that sum, I understand that it is customary to devote about $50,000 to the publication of the farmers' bulletins, which would leave $130,000 to be expended in the purchase and distribution of seeds, trees, etc. The law referred to in the appropriation act will be found as section 527 of the Revised Statutes, an act approved in July, 1866. The section referred to is as follows:

The purchase and distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

None of the predecessors of the present Secretary of Agriculture ever refused to comply with this law. To show that it was the purpose of this particular officer not to carry out the will of Congress, it will be seen in a publication which is on the desks of Senators (Senate Document No. 40, page 5) that the Secretary, on April 20 of last year, addressed a communication to the honorable Attorney-General on this subject in the hope, no doubt, of securing the opinion of the Attorney-General that the Secretary of Agriculture would be justified in refusing to comply with the law. The first question asked by the Secretary is as follows:

Can the Secretary of Agriculture legally purchase any other seeds than those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to wit, seeds "rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent change from one part of our own country to another," under authority of the act of March 2, 1895?

To this question the Attorney-General replied as follows:

1. The seeds purchasable under the act of March 2, 1895, are limited to those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, there being no reasonable ground for claiming that the act of March 2, 1895, operates, or was intended to operate, as a repeal of the earlier statute.

The second question asked by the Secretary was:

Would it be proper and lawful for the Secretary of Agriculture, in view of the verbiage of the act of March 2, 1895, and the wording of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to advertise for proposals to furnish the Department of Agriculture seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants, "rare and uncommon to the country, and for such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," reserving the right to reject any and all bids?

To this the Attorney-General replied as follows:

2. If not obligatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds, trees, etc., conformably to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, it is certainly competent for him to make the purchases conformable to said statute, the right to reject any and all bids being reserved. But the form of the question is such that I think it proper to call attention to the fact that while seeds purchased must be such as are "rare and uncommon to the country or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," the trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings to be purchased are such "as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States."

I submit that the Secretary of Agriculture obtained but very little consolation from the reply of the Attorney-General, but he saw that it would be necessary for him to proceed, much against his will, to advertise for proposals under the law. He did so advertise, and there were numerous bids made, numerous propositions to supply the Department with seeds, and every one of those propositions was rejected. Did the Secretary propose to readvertise, as is common in business transactions in private life, and in commercial affairs? Did he even comply with the law which requires him to readvertise? No, nothing of the kind. He seems entirely to have lost sight of the fact that there is a statute which requires a second advertisement. I call attention to it. It will be found as an amendment to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes. Perhaps it will be well to read the statute in order to get at the full meaning of the amendment:

SEC. 3709. All purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles or performance of the service. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency, the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract, at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold, or such services engaged between individuals.

That law was amended in 1894, and the amendment will be found in chapter 22, volume 28, of the Statutes at Large. It is quite a lengthy amendment, and I shall read only those portions bearing upon this question.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the page of the statutes?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Page 33, volume 28, Statutes at Large. The amendment is as follows:

And the advertisement for such proposals shall be made by all the Executive Departments, including the Department of Labor, the United States Fish Commission, etc.

Then the amendment goes on and recites the Departments which are excepted from its provisions. The last paragraph of the amendment reads:

And if any or all of such proposals shall be rejected, advertisements for proposals shall again be invited and proceeded with in the same manner.

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. The statute from which the Senator has quoted describes certain gentlemen connected with the Department, the Assistant Secretaries, and so on, who shall form the board to open and examine bids.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It does.

Mr. GEAR. Then, did the Secretary comply with that statute when he appointed a board to receive those bids?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Not at all.

Mr. GEAR. Will the Senator state whom he appointed?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before I get through I shall point that out. He appointed a board composed of subordinates in his own Department.

I desire to be entirely fair with the Secretary, and I think it is but charitable to say that I believe that he was in entire ignorance of the amendment to the statute.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture has been given every opportunity consistent with the importance of this case and with the high position which he occupies to explain to the Senate and to the country his reason for refusing to comply with the law. On the 12th of December I introduced a resolution requiring him to set forth his reasons for failing to carry out the law. He did so in a lengthy document which is printed and in the document room.

Mr. GEORGE. Has the Senator's attention been called to section 2 of an act of Congress found on page 62 of the same volume which he cites, which repeals the act upon which he relies, except as to proposals for fuel, ice, stationery, and other miscellaneous supplies? I call his attention to that act.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. To what section does the Senator refer?

Mr. GEORGE. Section 2 on page 62. It will be seen from that that the Senator's remarks, based on the former statute he cites on page 32, are wholly inapplicable to this case.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Do I understand that the Senator from Mississippi holds that the section to which he has referred repeals all of the section which I read?

Mr. GEORGE. I will read it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. It reads:

SEC. 2. That the act entitled "An act to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments at Washington," approved January 27, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, so amended that, the provisions thereof shall apply only to advertisements for proposals for fuel, ice, stationery, and other miscellaneous supplies to be purchased at Washington for the use of the Executive Departments and other Government establishments therein named.

It does not apply at all to purchases made by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Then the Senator holds that under that section the Secretary of Agriculture was not required to readvertise. Do I understand that as the position taken by the Senator?

Mr. GEORGE. I hold that the provision to which I called the attention of the Senate in the first statute on page 32, which requires the readvertisement, does not apply to any advertisement made by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That of course will be a matter that I prefer to submit to the Senate. I will ask the Senator from Mississippi if he thinks, under all the circumstances, that the Secretary of Agriculture was justified in refusing to comply with the statutes of Congress on this subject?

Mr. GEORGE. To comply with what statutes?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. With all the statutes covering his duties as to the purchase of seeds, trees, etc.

Mr. GEORGE. I will answer that question by saying that so far as I am advised and informed, and I have given some attention to this matter, the Secretary has not refused to comply with any law of Congress on this subject.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Does the Senator hold that the Secretary has spent any portion of the $130,000 for the purchase and distribution of seeds and trees?

Mr. GEORGE. I hold that under section 527, which prescribes the kind of seeds, and the explanation made by the Secretary, he has not violated section 527 or any other law of Congress.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I should like to have the Senator answer a question for the information of the Senate. Has the Secretary of Agriculture purchased any seeds or trees with that appropriation?

Mr. GEORGE. He has not purchased seeds, because no seeds of the kind required by law were offered or could be had.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is simply the opinion of the Secretary. I think there is abundant evidence that a great quantity of seeds was offered of the kind and quality required.

Mr. President, I do not desire to argue this question any further. It must be clear to all that the Secretary did not comply with the laws of Congress. I simply desire action upon the joint resolution. If the Senator from Mississippi desires to offer some remarks, as I understand he does, I am perfectly willing that he shall proceed with his side of the case.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I do not know that I ought to participate in the debate on the pending joint resolution, and I do not think I will do so to any great extent. I know of no political opinion held by the Secretary of Agriculture with which I agree. We are entirely antipodal in our political beliefs and political affiliations. I disagree entirely with the Secretary of Agriculture as to his duty to carry out the provisions of the law which have been quoted by the Senator from North Dakota. Section 527 of the Revised Statutes is in this language:

The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

I do not care to examine the law further than it is quoted here by the Secretary of Agriculture himself. I think it was his plain duty under this language, "or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another," to execute the law and purchase the seeds required by the last appropriation act.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to state that when the Secretary of Agriculture was before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to give his reasons for refusing to comply with the law, he was asked this question by the chairman of the committee:

How did you look upon the second clause of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, the first requiring you to be "confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country"; then it says "or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our own country to another"? Might not that include the most common seed that could be made more profitable?

To this the Secretary replied:

I suppose that is true, but it is difficult to say or the Department to know just the varieties that have not been exchanged already.

It will be observed that the two propositions in the law are stated disjunctively, not conjunctively. The word "or" is used instead of the word "and," making altogether a different condition.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator from North Dakota is altogether right. It is a disjunctive form of conferring power, and under the second power conferred in that section I have no doubt in my own mind that it was the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of the appropriation act and purchase the seeds.

I do not agree with my distinguished friend [Mr. GEORGE] that the law to which he referred a moment ago has been in any respect repealed. The act of the Secretary of Agriculture in advertising for bids upon the seeds was perhaps a work of supererogation. Perhaps there was no express statute authorizing it, and yet it occurs to me that as an incident to his power to purchase he had a right to appoint a board, either from employees of the Agricultural Department or other competent gentlemen, to supervise the purchase of the seeds by advertisement or otherwise.

I did not rise this morning for the purpose of discussing the legal features of the joint resolution before the Senate. That will be amply done, no doubt, by the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I rose, however, for the purpose of making a statement, and correcting by that means the distinguished Senator from North Dakota, as to the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary is a distinguished citizen of my State. I have no doubt whatever as to his honesty and his competency. I believe him to be a thoroughly honest man. I believe him to be thoroughly competent to discharge the duties imposed upon him by his high office. However much I believe him to be mistaken, as I do, not only upon this question, but upon other questions, I believe that no man who is acquainted in the slightest degree with the Secretary of Agriculture will doubt his great capacity to discharge the duties of his office. I believe that he sincerely desires to execute the law as he understands it.

The only fault I have ever found with the Secretary of Agriculture (and I say this with great delicacy) has been that he has not always confined himself to agricultural subjects. He has undertaken to discuss financial questions quite frequently, and in that respect perhaps has usurped to some extent the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. But certainly the Secretary of Agriculture is a man of rare experience as a horticulturist and of rare research and rare knowledge. His great education along those lines can not be doubted. He is a man of high character and honest purposes.

That is all I desire to say.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I have given some attention to this matter, and I believe it to be my duty to make some statement to the Senate, so that they may understand what they are asked to do.

I desire to call the attention of the lawyers and the other members of the Senate to the very extraordinary status which the pending joint resolution occupies. It is not the enactment of a law. It does not propose to enact a law. It proposes to do exactly what a court of justice would be required to do upon an application to that court for a mandamus against an officer requiring him to perform an official duty. The language of the joint resolution is not, "Be it enacted, That the law shall be so and so." That is not it. The language of the joint resolution is that an officer appointed by law shall carry out a law. It is a command to the officer to do what the Senate may regard as his legal duty under the law now in question.

Mr. President, I say that the Senate can not do any such thing. We have the power to enact laws, and we have the power to enact laws to punish men who violate laws, but we have no power to issue a writ of mandamus. I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] to what I am saying. We have no power to issue a writ of mandamus against an officer requiring him to perform what we regard as an official duty.

In the first place, we are not authorized to construe a statute. The very first thing that a constitutional lawyer or any other sort of a lawyer learns is that courts construe statutes; that legislatures make them. What is the extraordinary position occupied here before the Senate to-day by the prosecutor, my friend from North Dakota? He assumes for the Senate to decide what the law is. The Senate can not decide that. We can enact what the law shall be, but we can not enact what the law is, and then issue a writ of mandamus to an officer compelling him to carry out the law. That is the very remarkable attitude in which the Senator from North Dakota and (with due respect to the committee of which I am an humble member) the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry place themselves in putting this measure before the Senate.

Mr. LINDSAY. Have you the joint resolution before you?

Mr. GEORGE. Here it is:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to carry into effect—

That is the language of a court, is it not? That is the language of a court, and not the language of a legislature—to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations, etc.

I say we have no right to pass any such law. What have we to do in order to enact such a law? We have, first, to try the question as to what the law is. Then, secondly, we have got to try the question as to default on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture in not carrying the law into effect. Both of these questions are denied in every constitution in the United States of America, State and national, to the legislative department. That is our attitude here.

Mr. VEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question.

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. VEST. I ask him if it is not the custom of the Senate from day to day to pass resolutions directing the heads of Departments to do certain things—resolutions mandatory upon them?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is always done.

Mr. VEST. I ask if the point has not been repeatedly made here that a resolution which requested the head of a Department should be changed by substituting the word "directed" for "requested"?

Mr. GEORGE. The answer to that question would be no answer to the argument I have made. We may direct the head of a Department to send us information, because he is our servant, but we can not direct him to carry into effect a law, for the reason, first, that we are not competent to construe the statute, nor are we competent to decide whether he has carried it into effect. That is a judicial question.

Mr. VEST. If my friend will permit me, suppose the Secretary of Agriculture comes to the conclusion that he ought not to send certain papers to the Senate. We have had that identical question before us as to another Department of the Government. He says in his opinion the law authorizes him to withhold those papers. The Senate of the United States considers that question and then passes a resolution directing him to send them. Is his construction of the law to be put against ours? Is he not our servant and agent and compelled to obey the resolution of the Senate?

Mr. GEORGE. If I were to admit that the question propounded by the Senator ought to be answered in the affirmative, that does not cover this case. That is the performance of an official duty only as a servant of this body and not the performance of his duty as an officer of the Government, as to whether he carries out a law over which this body has no jurisdiction.

Mr. President, that is the attitude in which we stand here. We are a court. We have assumed to summon this man before us and upon an application for a mandamus hear the case, construe the laws, hear the facts, decide that he has not performed his official duty, and then direct him, not to perform an act which he owes to the Senate, but an act which he owes under the law to the country. It would be just as well to pass a law ordering him to deliver to the owner a horse which he has. Then we decide, first, who is the owner of the horse, and next, whether the law authorized him to take the horse. That is the attitude of the case now before the Senate. We are here trying a mandamus case.

Now, let us see what sort of a case they have got on their mandamus. It is a most miserable case at that. The Senator from North Dakota arraigns the Secretary of Agriculture as if he were proceeding in the House of Representatives upon articles of impeachment for a violation of duty. We can not do that here. He arraigns him for violating the law. Let us see what the law is. We are prosecuting attorneys and bring the case before us, and then we are to try it. This is the only instance, except as to our own officers, in which we are authorized to try a question whether a man has complied with the law and punish him for not doing it.

Now, Mr. President, let us go back in this matter. All this trouble about seeds arises out of a section of the Revised Statutes which I shall read. Let us see how the Senator from North Dakota has got his foot into it in trying to get the head of the Secretary of Agriculture into his political basket. Nobody disputes now that in the purchase of seeds the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to "such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country." Let us stop on that. There is another clause there that I will get to directly. Such seeds as are rare and uncommon in the country. He is not authorized to keep a seed store for the gratuitous distribution of seeds for the American people, or to Congressmen for the purpose of securing the votes of the American people. He has no authority for that. He is confined by the statute to the purchase of "such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country." What is the object of that? Manifestly to introduce into our country rare and uncommon and valuable seeds for the purpose of being tested.

As it is but fair to the Secretary of Agriculture, and it is a very ably prepared paper, I shall ask the consent of the Senate to incorporate this paper by the Secretary of Agriculture on seed distribution in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Without objection, the paper will be incorporated.

The paper is as follows:

FREE SEED DISTRIBUTION.

Statement of Secretary of Agriculture at the joint meeting of the Senate and House Committees of Agriculture, January 15, 1896.

From a special report of the chief of the division of accounts and disbursements of this Department, received December 18, I learn that only a very small part of the appropriation for this fiscal year was paid out for the services of employees in the seed division who were engaged until the 1st of October in closing up this business. The report shows that there has been used from the appropriation the following amounts:

For the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, fiscal year 1896 ($130,000):

1895.	To whom paid.	For what purpose.	Amount.
July 31	Enos S. Harnden et al.	Salaries for July, 1895	$541.30
August 31	do	Salaries for August, 1895.	541.30
September 30	do	Salaries for September, 1895.	527.40
Total			1,610.00

For the portion thereof permitted to be used for farmers' bulletins, fiscal year 1896 ($50,000):

1895.	To whom paid.	For what purpose.	Amount.
July 31	John Hyde et al	Salaries for July, 1895	$1,322.60
August 31	do	Salaries for August, 1895.	1,332.75
September 18	The Public Printer	10,000 copies Bulletin No. 7.	98.75
Do	do	40,000 copies Bulletin No. 29.	566.44
September 24	The Springfield Envelope Co.	Envelopes	270.20
September 30	John Hyde et al	Salaries for September, 1895.	1,243.20
October 21	Easton & Rupp	Twine	15.00
October 24	The Public Printer	Printing Bulletin No. 30.	164.76
Do	do	Printing Bulletin No. 31.	411.62
October 31	John Hyde et al	Salaries for October, 1895.	824.70
November 15	The White, Corbin & Co.	Envelopes	917.60
November 30	John Hyde et al	Salaries for November, 1895.	653.00
Total			7,820.62

For printing, etc., fiscal year 1896 ($5,400):

1895.	To whom paid.	For what purpose.	Amount.
September 18	The Public Printer	Services and material, July 1 to August 14, 1895.	$2,210.88

The above statement of expenditures shows but three items charged against "that part of the act in question which appropriates $130,000 for the purchase of seeds for the gratuitous promiscuous distribution" for the year 1896, aggregating $1,610. These three items are, as explained above, for labor performed during the period from July 1 to September 30, 1895.

From July 1 to November 30, 1895, $7,820.62 was paid on account of the preparation, printing, and publishing of farmers' bulletins for the current fiscal year. It will thus be seen that of the $130,000 appropriated for the "purchase and distribution of valuable seeds" for the fiscal year 1896 the sum of $128,390 remains unexpended.

Finding that farmers' bulletins would still have to be prepared, printed, published, and distributed, "as seeds are distributed," and that this must be done by the officer provided for on the statutory roll of the "division of seeds" in the act making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, the chief of this division and a few of the persons employed therein have been continued upon this roll for the purpose of distributing these documents in accordance with the orders of Members and Delegates in Congress. This was only done after receiving the report of the "Committee on the Distribution of Publications" (Exhibit A), and certain opinions from the Comptroller of the Treasury (Exhibit B), authorizing the continuance of the expenditure for this purpose, copies of which are submitted herewith.

It only remains to state "why such seeds have not been purchased under said appropriation in accordance with existing statutes relating thereto."

Beginning in 1839 with an appropriation to the Patent Office of $1,000 for collecting and distributing rare and improved varieties of seeds, prosecuting agricultural investigations, and procuring agricultural statistics, the appropriations for seed distribution have grown until the appropriation for the present fiscal year amounts to $199,120, including the statutory rule for the division of seeds and the expenses of printing for this division. The act says that the "Secretary of Agriculture may use not to exceed $50,000 of the amounts herein appropriated for the preparation, printing, and publishing farmers' bulletins." Deducting this, the total appropriation for the purchase and distribution of seeds for the present fiscal year is $149,120.

Down to the year 1865 the seeds distributed were purchased out of the general fund above described, so that we have no accurate information at hand with regard to the amount used for this purpose prior to that year, but since 1864 a separate appropriation has been made annually for the purpose of buying and distributing seed, as shown in the following table.

No specific appropriation for seeds was made prior to the fiscal year 1865. The appropriations were for "collection of agricultural statistics, etc., and purchase, etc., of seeds."

Year.	Appropriation.	Expenditure.	Balance.
1865	$61,000.00	$61,000.00
1866	70,165.90	70,165.90
1867	115,200.00	115,200.00
1868	85,200.00	85,200.00
1869	20,000.00	20,000.00
1870	20,000.00	18,981.33	$1,018.67
1871	30,000.00	28,865.17	1,134.83
1872	45,000.00	45,000.00

1878	75,000.00	74,579.33	420.67
1879	75,000.00	75,000.00
1880	75,000.00	75,000.00
1881	102,160.31	102,157.48	2.83
1882	100,000.00	99,991.53	8.47
1883	80,000.00	80,000.00
1884	75,000.00	74,986.48	13.52
1885	100,000.00	99,983.82	16.18
1886	100,000.00	99,980.24	19.76
1887	100,000.00	99,998.37	1.63
1888	103,000.00	102,587.55	412.45
1889	104,200.00	104,168.73	31.27
1890	104,200.00	104,174.55	25.45
1891	105,400.00	105,090.94	309.06
1892	105,400.00	104,920.35	479.65
1893	135,400.00	134,908.27	491.73
1894	135,400.00	119,664.90	15,735.10
1895	165,400.00	120,445.15	44,954.85
1896	185,400.00	14,312.80	171,087.20
Total	2,837,526.21	2,595,987.61	241,538.60

The figures for 1895 include $35,400 appropriated and $30,567.99 expended for farmers' bulletins and printing, while those for 1896 include $5,400 appropriated and $12,702.80 expended for the same purposes. The expenditures for 1896 are for the period from July 1, 1895, to December 31, 1895, inclusive.

This enormous purchase and distribution of seeds, costing the Government $2,581,674.81 in twenty years, was made under section 527 of the Revised Statutes. This section reads as follows:

"The purchase and distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another; and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interest of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States."

Every annual appropriation act has read "For the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds," etc.

Under this statute the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Agriculture, and the Department of Agriculture for fifty-six years have sought "such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another," in all foreign countries and in all parts of this country, and have purchased freely almost every seed or plant that offered the slighest appearance of novelty or prospect of value and have distributed them most liberally through Members and Delegates in Congress.

Through our representatives all foreign countries have been searched and through our own seed growers and horticulturists the resources of our own country have been completely canvassed. The law has always been construed most broadly and the money expended most liberally.

When the present Secretary of Agriculture came into office he directed that lists be made of all the seeds, plants, shrubs, vines, etc., which had been distributed to parts of our country in all the years previous, and that, guided by these lists, the seed-purchasing agent should deliberately proceed to find such seeds, plants, shrubs, vines, etc., as had not been previously liberally distributed in all parts of our country. Through the aid of the State Department and its agents in foreign countries every part of the world has contributed its share for the distribution of seeds and plants which promised to be of value to our people. Great pains were taken thus to find genuinely new, useful, and valuable things "rare and uncommon to the country and adapted to general cultivation or to promote the general interest of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States," and they were carefully distributed to every portion of the country where there was the slightest hope that they might prove useful. In this way it became each year more and more difficult to get things which came up to the requirement of the law. The tremendous pressure for quantity to supply Congress has led to the purchase of seeds, etc., on very imperfect evidence as to novelty and value. During recent years, therefore, the seeds obtained were of very doubtful value to the people of the country. Experience has shown that the vast majority of the so-called new seeds and plants offered by seedsmen or horticulturists are merely old varieties under new names. The distribution has, therefore, become very disappointing and unsatisfactory, growing necessarily more and more so as it was continued, extended in area, and increased in volume.

This was the necessary logical result of such a distribution under this law. There are only a certain number of rare and uncommon seeds or useful or valuable trees, shrubs, vines, etc., in the world, and their collection and distribution can not, therefore, be continued indefinitely. In fact, the more carefully and zealously the collection and distribution is made, the earlier must it come to a conclusion. For many years the purchases of seed by this Department were only possible under the very liberal construction of the broad provision for "such seeds as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another." During recent years almost no seed rare or uncommon to this country has been found by this Department anywhere in the world. The distribution during the last three years was kept up, therefore, through great difficulty and with growing doubt as to its legality. Every seed that could be found anywhere offering a reasonable prospect of usefulness in any portion of the country has been purchased and liberally distributed.

The extent and liberality of the distribution which has been made by the present Secretary of Agriculture will be shown by the following figures, taken from the reports of the seed division. During the three fiscal years July 1, 1889, to July 1, 1892, under his predecessor in office, there were distributed the following:

	Kinds.	Varieties.	Packages to Congressmen.	Total packages distributed.
July 1, 1889, to June 30, 1890	23	520	4,459,778	5,605,246
July 1, 1890, to June 30, 1891	22	413	4,157,931	6,013,613
July 1, 1891, to June 30, 1892	20	426	4,542,177	5,932,989
Total, 1889 to 1892	65	1,355	13,159,886	17,551,848

For the three fiscal years between July 1, 1892, to July 1, 1895:

	Kinds.	Varieties.	Packages to Congressmen.	Total packages distributed.
July 1, 1892, to June 30, 1893	18	387	6,215,781	7,704,943
July 1, 1893, to June 30, 1894	25	309	8,385,120	9,555,318
July 1, 1894, to June 30, 1895	25	288	7,209,089	9,528,653
Total, 1892 to 1895	68	984	21,809,990	26,788,914
Increase for last period	3	.....	8,650,104	9,237,066

In the three years of his term of office the present Secretary had distributed to members of Congress 8,650,104 packages more than did his predecessor in office. In doing this he believes that he went to the utmost limit of the authority given him in the statute.

Under the old plan, which prevailed in this Department before this year, the noncompetitive offers of seedsmen and horticulturists were sifted, and the most reliable and promising varieties were taken upon the representations of their producers as to their rarity and value. The fact is that the people in every portion of this country have, through the instrumentalities of this Department and our enterprising seedsmen, already secured nearly all the vegetable and field seeds, plants, trees, etc., that are well adapted to their peculiar soils and climate.

After testing the seed purchased in this way in the last three years in the field and in the garden, our correspondents and the experiment stations assure us that very few of them are really rare, uncommon, or specially valuable.

At least one-half of the so-called new varieties sent to any particular section of the country have proved comparatively unsuitable and often worthless, while the other half proved to be old varieties already well known there. Although diligently carried out, the seed distribution of the last three years has thus been extremely unsatisfactory to the people of the country as well as to this Department. By inducing interested people to spend their labor upon things that were represented to be new, but proved either common or unsuitable, the Government has imposed upon them, and has been the occasion of no little loss of the rent of land, money, time, and labor of the people.

New varieties of seeds and plants where there are any can be obtained at the present much more readily by skilled, practical botanists and horticulturists than by this Department, and it is a fact that when such commercial agencies find anything new, they are not apt to sell it to the Department of Agriculture at any price. A single year's free distribution ends their trade in it. On the other hand, it is generally stated and believed that unscrupulous dealers make a business of selling the Department of Agriculture their old seeds and their surplus stock of failures.

The Department of Agriculture has no farm or other arrangement for testing the real value of so-called rare and uncommon plants, and could not do so for all sections of the country if it had.

Being thoroughly convinced that the end of the legitimate purchase and distribution of seeds under the law, as cited, had been reached, and perhaps far passed, and being entirely unable to find any seed which would come up to its requirements by the methods which had been pursued in the past, namely, by correspondence with seedsmen and inquiries through the representatives of the State Department abroad, the Secretary of Agriculture, on the 18th of April, 1895, addressed a communication to the honorable Attorney-General of the United States, a copy of which, with his reply, is inclosed herewith, in which he asks for an opinion as to whether (1) "The Secretary of Agriculture can legally purchase any other seeds than those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes," and whether (2) "it would be proper and lawful for the Secretary of Agriculture * * * to advertise for proposals to furnish the Department of Agriculture with seeds, bulbs, trees, vines, cuttings, and plants," etc., in accordance with section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, which requires that "All purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same," etc.

The reply of the Attorney-General informed the Secretary of Agriculture that (1) "The seeds purchasable under the act of March 2, 1895, are limited to those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes—there being no reasonable ground for claiming that the act of March 2, 1895, operates, or was intended to operate, as a repeal of the earlier statute"; (2) that "if not obligatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds, trees, etc., conformably to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, it is certainly competent for him to make the purchases conformably to said statute, the right to reject any and all bids being reserved," etc.

In accordance with this construction, the Secretary of Agriculture immediately caused an advertisement for seeds, plants, trees, etc., stating the requirements of the Department of Agriculture in the language of the statute itself, to be published in the lawful number of papers, and to be mailed to all the seedsmen, horticulturists, and others whose addresses were on file in this Department.

Since the act of Congress requires "that the seeds allotted to the Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-second parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery on the 10th day of January, or at the earliest practicable time thereafter," and since all Representatives expect their seeds to be ready early in February in order that they may be forwarded to the people in time for their early gardens, it was necessary to stipulate in this advertisement that all seeds should be delivered in Washington on or before the 1st of November. Under the well-known rule of moving the seed from one section of the country to another, those grown in the extreme North are frequently desired for planting in the extreme South. This arrangement gave the Department only from seventy to one hundred days in which to clean, test, sort, pack, and label the seed for distribution to members of Congress, therefore it was not considered possible under the law to grant a longer time for delivery of the seed.

In order that the Department might treat their bids intelligently, it was required that the "persons submitting bids should specify the kind and varieties, with full description of each variety of seeds and plants upon which they desire to submit bids and the quantities they are prepared to contract for," etc. The bids were to be received by the Secretary of Agriculture until 2 p. m., July 1, 1895.

On July 1, the Secretary appointed Messrs. E. S. Harnden, F. L. Evans, and J. B. Bennett, of the Department of Agriculture, "a board to open and examine bids for supplying the United States Department of Agriculture during the fiscal year 1896 with 'seeds,'" etc., as required by law, in accordance with this advertisement (Exhibit —). This board opened and carefully examined the bids which had been received at the appointed time. They found only three which, in form, came up to the requirements of the advertisement. These bids are submitted herewith, together with the indorsements of the board thereon, and the final report of the board.

Messrs. Peter Henderson & Co., offer roses, cannas, "flower seed novelties and specialties in vegetable seeds," and two kinds of grass seeds. The board found that their bid was deficient in description; that the flower and vegetable seeds offered were not rare; and that the only farm or field seeds offered were two grasses. These were referred to the Agrostologist of the Department of Agriculture, who submitted the following opinion with regard to them:

"Bromus inermis, awnless brome grass, was fully described and its agricultural characters and value pointed out in German publications more than a hundred years ago. It was frequently mentioned in English agricultural works in the early years of the present century. It was introduced into this country nearly twelve years ago. It has been widely grown in this country experimentally, and the seed has been offered for sale by our leading seedsmen for a number of years.

"Cynodon dactylon. Bermuda or wire grass. This grass is very widely distributed in tropical and subtropical countries throughout the world, and has been known since prehistoric times. In the parts of this country where this grass is most valuable, it is known to almost every man, woman, and child, either as a weed or good hay or pasture grass. The cotton planters of the South look upon this grass as one of the very worst of weeds. The grass is best propagated by root cuttings or sets."

The vegetable seeds offered in this bid were all such as the Department had previously distributed, and could not, therefore, be called rare or uncommon in the opinion of the board. Nothing was offered that was "adapted to general cultivation or to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States." This bid was therefore rejected as a whole.

The next bid was that of J. C. Vaughan, of Chicago. He offers a number of "rare and useful flower seeds" (to quote his language) and three varieties of vegetable seeds. The flower seed include such things as "Giant Paris Pansy," at $25 per pound; "Lobelia Erinus," $35 per pound; "New Double Morning Glory," $40 per pound; "White Branching Aster," $36 per pound; "Chinese Primroses," $60 per pound; "Petunia White Star," $35 per pound, and "Chabaud Carnation," at $128 per pound. The board appears to have promptly decided that the flower seeds at these prices were not "adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States." The three varieties of vegetable seeds offered were "New Mangel, Erfurt Model," "Turnip, New Scarlet Kashmyr," and "New Victoria Spinach." The board reported that these "are not new, rare, or unique." The bid was also deficient in that the quantity of each that could be supplied was not mentioned. It is likely that a confession that they had a large quantity of the above flower seed at the above prices would render it impossible for them to sell any of them.

The bid of Messrs. J. M. Thornburn & Co., of New York, includes a variety of vegetable, but only three specimens of field or farm seeds, viz: Havana tobacco seed, Bermuda grass seed, and 25 bushels No. 1 wheat, "by parentage half wheat, half rye, at $3 per bushel."

This bid was found deficient in descriptive matter; the varieties are not new or rare; every kind and variety of seed mentioned in it, with the exception of 11 items out of 65 offered, have already been distributed by this Department, and of these 11 items none are stated to be rare or uncommon. It was therefore rejected also.

This entire lot of bids, although it includes many high-priced flower seed and so-called new varieties of kitchen-garden plants, thus includes only four kinds of field or farm seed, viz: Brome grass, Bermuda grass, and Havana tobacco, and one variety of wheat. Two bidders offer the Bermuda grass or wire-grass seed. The total amounts of field seed offered were as follows:

4,000 pounds awnless brome grass seed, at 14 cents per pound	$560
500 pounds Bermuda or wire grass seed, at 80 cents per pound	400
375 pounds Bermuda or wire grass seed, at 80 cents per pound	300
		$1,260
100 pounds Havana tobacco seed, at $1.50 per pound	150
25 bushels or 1,500 pounds Carman, No. 1 wheat, "by parentage half wheat, half rye," at 5 cents per pound	75
6,400 pounds		1,485

This would, under the law, have been less than 10 pounds of field and farm seed to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress if every pound offered had been bought.

Having received no bids that came up to the requirements of the statutes and offered anything worthy of consideration, the board rejected them all and submitted the following report:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 6, 1895.

SIR: The undersigned board, appointed by you on July 1, 1895, to open and examine bids for seeds to be furnished this Department for distribution according to law during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1896, have the honor to report that we have opened and examined the bids received and find that the same do not meet the requirements of the advertisement as printed, and therefore, respectfully recommend that all bids be rejected.

Respectfully, yours,

ENOS S. HARNDEN.
F. L. EVANS.
J. B. BENNETT.

The Honorable the SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

In accordance with the instructions of the resolution, I have the honor to submit herewith, also, copies of all bids or offers of seeds made to this Department in response to its advertisement dated April 27, 1895, or otherwise submitted for its consideration, together with copies of each letter sent to this Department relative to or asking any information concerning or modification of the proposals issued and its reply thereto (Exhibit E). These include all bids which were found deficient in description or otherwise failed to come up to the conditions of the advertisement. In the hope of finding something that would come up to the requirement of the statute the board informally examined all of these bids and made their indorsements upon those which might be "made profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another." Had any rare or uncommon seeds or plants "adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture or agriculture throughout the United States" been found, they would have been purchased under the "emergency" plan.

The indorsements of the board show that in the entire list of informal bids and offers no rare or uncommon seeds or plants "adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States" were to be found. In almost every case the offers were of old and well-known things at very extravagant prices. The bids that were received after the 1st of July were also informally examined, and nothing was found in them which came within the purport of the statute.

The offer of Mr. C. F. Carpenter, of Bartow, Fla., to furnish 100 pounds of "teosinte," being of slight novelty, was referred to the agrostologist of the Department for his consideration with regard to its character under the statutes and its value for general cultivation. The officer reported as follows:

"Teosinte.—Illustrated and described in the American Agriculturist for January, 1880, at which time reports were being received in England from a number of its colonies, including the Bahamas and the West Indies, generally south and tropical Africa, and Australia, relative to its growth in these countries. It was noticed in the Southern Cultivator in 1879, and has been repeatedly mentioned in the Southern agricultural journals since that date. Seed was distributed from this Department in 1886, and has been advertised for sale by our leading seedsmen for a number of years past. Teosinte is a subtropical American grass, and has been grown successfully in many parts of the extreme South. It does not mature elsewhere."

It is to be specially noted that none of the bids, either formally or informally made, in connection with the advertisement of the Department of April 27, 1895, or the offers made to this Department in correspondence contain any proposals to supply trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings "adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States." Seeds of some such things were offered, but no plants or cuttings were offered by anyone. It appears, therefore, that the horticulturists of the country have distributed these things so thoroughly through their regular agencies that nothing of this kind remains to be done by this Department. No plants or cuttings were purchased, therefore, for distribution this year.

As soon as it had been fully ascertained that no seeds, trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings could be obtained for distribution this fiscal year, a brief circular announcing the fact was published and mailed to all persons interested. This circular contains the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, the advertisement, and the report of the board. It announces in conclusion that in consideration of the failure of the Department to get any seeds or plants under section 527, Revised Statutes, and by the method laid down in section 3709, Revised Statutes, the seed division would be abolished, with the exception of as many persons connected therewith as would be needed to prepare and distribute farmers' bulletins. A copy of this circular is inclosed herewith, marked Exhibit G.

ADDENDA.

As an evidence of the fact that recipients of seeds, whether supplied upon the orders of Congressmen or directly from the Department, regarded them simply as a free gift, it may be cited that not one in one thousand made any report whatever of the results obtained from the planting of the seed, notwithstanding that all seed sent was accompanied with an explicit request by the Department for such a report. This experience is not that of the present administration only, for, referring to the reports of chiefs of the seed division in former years, complaint is made to the same effect with a statement in some cases that special efforts were put forth to secure a fair average of reports, but without success.

Another remarkable feature of these reports is that no one of them, for several years at least, has pointed out a single instance of benefit accruing to agriculture from this seed distribution. So patent was this omission in the reports furnished during General Rusk's administration, that while the work of every other division is generally, sometimes highly, commended, not a single reference is to be found in three out of the four reports he presented as to the work of this division or the subject of seed distribution.

Of the few reports received during the years 1893, 1894, 1895, and 1896, all were so vague and indefinite, in a word, so manifestly perfunctory, as to give no valuable experimental results or information whatever. It may be safely asserted, from all the evidence available in the Department, that for the $1,100,000 and over expended for seed distribution by the Department in the past ten years no visible practical benefit to general agriculture or horticulture has resulted.

So well is this understood by those who have had occasion to give attention to the matter that not one of the hundreds of papers, mostly agricultural, received at the Department has ever printed a single word commendatory of the distribution, while many of them have persistently ridiculed it, and most of them have earnestly condemned it. Grange associations and their officers and other agricultural bodies have adopted resolutions to the same effect.

Should it, however, be deemed wise and expedient to reinstitute the gratuituous distribution of seed at the public expense, the Department should not be made a depot and packing house, but all seed should be purchased already put up in packets and properly labeled by seedsmen. The room required for packing and the skilled labor is not available in the Department, and putting up seed can be made to cost, by the seedsmen themselves, 50 per cent less than it has heretofore cost the Government.

Mr. GEORGE. We have been purchasing rare and uncommon seeds now for thirty years. We have been diligent in the purchase of them. We have ransacked the whole world. We have called to our aid the consuls and the consular agents of the United States in every country in the world for the purpose of getting rare and uncommon seeds. What is the result? The result, as the Secretary says, is that we have heretofore purchased about all the rare and uncommon seeds in the world that are adapted or might be adapted to our country.

Does the statute mean that having purchased rare and uncommon seeds all over the world, and having distributed them to the American people for the purpose of testing their value, he shall go on and repurchase the same seeds every year? Certainly, that is not the correct interpretation of the statute, because as soon as we have made the purchase and distributed them our people have had the opportunity of testing whether they are of any value or not. I want to show you what the Secretary says about that:

During recent years—

Says the Secretary—we are to try the Secretary here as if he was an officer acting under oath and in good faith—

During recent years almost no seed rare or uncommon to this country has been found by this Department anywhere in the world.

Yet he is to go on purchasing that which does not exist!

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes. Do you know of any rare and uncommon seeds anywhere in the world that he has not bought?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Please answer that? Please answer if you know of any rare and uncommon seeds anywhere in the world that the Secretary of Agriculture has declined to purchase?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I maintain that seeds and trees that are common to the State of Michigan might be very rare and uncommon in the State of Louisiana, and it is the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to study that question and see that those seeds are exchanged from one part of the country to the other.

Mr. GEORGE. As the Senator from North Dakota is prosecuting the Secretary of Agriculture, I ask him to name one single rare and uncommon seed anywhere on the habitable globe that the Secretary has failed to purchase.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. If I were the Secretary of Agriculture it would be my duty to know of the rare and uncommon seeds.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Now, hold on. I want to ask the Senator a question. One of the bidders, in response to the advertisement of the Secretary of Agriculture, requested the Secretary to specify any special seeds and varieties that the Department might want. He did not specify any kind of seeds that he wanted. The reply made by Mr. Harding, who had something to do with the board of awards I believe, was that as to the special wants the Department had no special wants other than those conveyed by the advertisement itself.

Mr. GEORGE. That is for rare and uncommon seeds?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Another bidder, in writing to the Department, said that they were prepared to comply with the law, and submit and forward and deliver to the Department seeds that were rare and uncommon. Here is a seed dealer who proposes to submit seeds that are rare and uncommon, but he insisted that it would be a physical and natural impossibility to have the seeds ready for distribution by November 1, the date stated in the advertisement of the Secretary.

Mr. GEORGE. All right. The Senator can not tell me of a rare and uncommon seed, and I want to tell him, then, of one.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. GEORGE. I will tell you of one right here and now.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Just a moment. There was something——

Mr. GEORGE. Here is Bermuda or wire-grass seed. There is not a seed of Bermuda grass that ever matures in the United States or has ever germinated in the United States if it was ever sowed. It is just like the sugar cane that comes from Cuba; it is a tropical plant and it does not germinate here. Everybody who knows anything about Bermuda grass (and we know something about it in our part of the country), knows that it is not propagated by the seed. It is propagated by cuttings of the roots of the grass, and planted in that way.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator yield just a moment? Of course if the Senator does not desire——

Mr. GEORGE. That is one. That is a rare and uncommon seed in this country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course. I wish he would explain how the Secretary of Agriculture could dispose of that rare and uncommon seed, the Bermuda grass, which will not germinate here and which never did mature in this country.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator from Mississippi, of course, like most lawyers, seems inclined to be technical on this question.

Mr. GEORGE. Very.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Now, I want to cite one illustration. Fifteen years ago, in the State of Minnesota and the State of South Dakota, corn was a very rare thing. Five years ago such a thing as a crop of corn in the State of North Dakota could not be found anywhere; we did not raise corn at all. But experimentation and the exchange of seed from one State to another have made South Dakota and Minnesota two of the leading corn States in this country——

Mr. GEORGE. Then you do not want corn there. You have got that.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And in North Dakota it is one of the leading crops that we produce now.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That has been brought about by experimentation, according to the idea which the Secretary of Agriculture should entertain.

Mr. GEORGE. We are not talking about that; we are talking about what was offered the Agricultural Department as "rare and uncommon seed." Never was one seed of Bermuda grass matured in the United States or anywhere else except in a tropical country, and none ever germinated in the United States.

Here is "Bromus inermis, awnless brome grass," and I find it stated that—

It was introduced into this country nearly twelve years ago. It has been widely grown in this country experimentally and the seed has been offered for sale by our leading seedsmen for a number of years.

I want to show you about some other "rare seeds" which were offered to the Department, and I want the Senator from North Dakota to pay a little attention. He has indicted the Secretary of Agriculture here for a high crime and misdemeanor in refusing to carry out a statute of Congress. Here are some seeds that were offered, and I want to know if the Secretary of Agriculture is to blame for not making these purchases?

Flower seeds—

I suppose for the belles and nice women of the country—

Giant Paris pansy—

At what price?

At $25 per pound.

Ought the Secretary of Agriculture to be hung for not making a purchase of that sort? Here is another:

Lobelia erinus, $35 per pound.

Ought the Secretary of Agriculture to be hung for not making such a purchase as that? We have the morning glory everywhere over our country, but it seems a new one has been gotten up, a "new double morning glory at $40 per pound" for the seed. Would you think an officer under a republican form of government ought to be paying $40 per pound for seed even of the "new double morning glory"? What that is I do not know, unless it blooms twice in the morning instead of once, as the others do. [Laughter.]

White branching aster—

These are the things that were sent to the Department to be bought in answer to its advertisement—

White branching aster, $36 per pound; Chinese primroses, $60 per pound; petunia white star—

The petunia is found everywhere in our country; everybody has it, and yet the price of the seed was $65 per pound. Then there is—

Chabaud carnation, at $128 per pound.

And the Secretary of Agriculture is to be hung, is to be drawn, quartered, and exhibited before the American people as a man who has utterly disregarded their rights because he did not make such purchases as that.

Now, let us go on a little about the law, which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] is so familiar with.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. I have only a minute or two to speak, and I desire to finish.

This is a proceeding by way of mandamus in the United States Senate on the relation of the Senator from North Dakota against the Secretary of Agriculture. There is one thing which I think is settled, and if I am wrong about it the Senator from Kentucky can correct me, that in a proceeding by mandamus, where there is discretion allowed to an officer, the court does not undertake to decide that discretion for him. Am I right about that?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. That is settled. Now, let us see about the discretion where a man is to exercise for himself and for the public the right of judgment. Whose right of judgment is provided for in this section?

The purchase and distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country.

Who is to judge about that? I ask the Senator from North Dakota and other Senators who are prosecuting the Secretary of Agriculture to answer this question: Who is to decide under the law what seeds are rare and uncommon? Is it the Senator from North Dakota? Is it the Senate of the United States, or is it the sworn officer of the Government of the United States who is intrusted with this duty? Everybody knows that it must be the Secretary of Agriculture who is to determine that question, and he determined that he could not make these purchases. Here is the fact. The Senator from North Dakota comes here and asks the Senate to say that the Secretary was wrong about that; that there are plenty of rare and uncommon seeds which are to be had at a reasonable and fair price which he ought to have bought, and when I asked the Senator from North Dakota to specify a single one of these things what did he say? He said that is for the Secretary of Agriculture and not for him. Exactly. That is what I say; and it is not for him nor for the Senate of the United States. When he wants to prosecute the Secretary of Agriculture, then the Senator assumes that the Senate can judge what is rare and uncommon. But when I ask him to tell me where is the default of the Secretary of Agriculture in not purchasing these things, and to name a single rare and uncommon seed which he has not purchased, the Senator falls back upon the law and says that is for the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I stated distinctly to the Senate a while ago that a few years ago corn was rare and uncommon in the State of North Dakota, and that it has become common simply as a result of experimentation.

Mr. GEORGE. The Secretary did not want to buy corn, then, did he, because that had ceased to be rare and uncommon? That is exactly what the Secretary of Agriculture says in another part of that paper. He says that seeds which had been rare and uncommon by purchase and cultivation had ceased to be rare and uncommon and had become very common.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There are many other States where corn is still rare and uncommon, and if the Secretary of Agriculture were to proceed to experiment there, a time would come when corn would not be rare and uncommon.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator if he has a complaint from people anywhere in the United States that the Secretary has not purchased corn and sent it to them? Where is the man anywhere in all this broad land who is complaining before the American Senate that the Secretary of Agriculture did not purchase the rare and uncommon thing called corn? [Laughter.]

Let us go back to the law. I think it is pretty well settled that the Secretary of Agriculture is to judge of what is rare and uncommon, and not the Senate of the United States. Especially I want to call the attention of the Senate to that proof. When I asked the Senator to point out a rare and uncommon thing, he said, "That is for the Secretary of Agriculture." What is the next provision of the law? That the Secretary of Agriculture in his purchases—

Shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another.

Does the Senator know of a single seed which has not been purchased and distributed by the Agricultural Department which can "be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another"? I pause for a reply. The Secretary of Agriculture is indicted as a criminal, as a willful violator of the laws of the land, which he has sworn to carry out, because he did not purchase seeds which "may be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another."

I understand now that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is read by everybody, is the most popular journal published in the United States, containing more useful information than any other journal, and I should like to have appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for the benefit of the people of the United States and for the people of the world at large, what particular seeds which have not been purchased by the Agricultural Department come under this description, which "may be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another."

I hope the Senator from North Dakota will answer that question. I pause for a reply. I think mankind everywhere, whose attention has been called to this extraordinary proceeding, is on tiptoe to hear the answer to that question. [A pause.] There is no answer, and yet we are to condemn the Secretary of Agriculture for not purchasing a seed which nobody can describe. The Secretary of Agriculture does not know of it. He is not bound to know all about these seeds. In order to show the Senate how particular the Secretary was to get the benefit of everybody's judgment in this matter, and not to rely on his own, I want to read the advertisement. The Secretary did not sit down in his office and evolve out of his inner consciousness—I reckon that was the way he would have to get it, if he got it at all—what particular seeds were "rare and uncommon to the country," or what particular seeds could be "made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another." He did not do that. He sought the advice of every seedsman in the United States. Here is the publication. He did not advertise for Bermuda grass, nor for corn seed, nor for any particular kind of seed. He advertised for seeds that are "rare and uncommon to the country or such as may be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another." So he called upon every seedsman in the United States to produce his seed, bring it before him, and let him try it.

What did the Secretary of Agriculture get? I read you a list:

Bermuda grass seed, brome seed, petunias, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much in favor of that bill, and while I have a great deal more of interesting matter to bring before the Senate at this time, I am perfectly willing, in order to save the country and in the interest of the free coinage of silver, which I believe is the proposition of the bill, to give way, and let the regular business be carried on. At some other time I shall finish what remarks I have to make.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to say that to-morrow morning, at the conclusion of the routine business, I shall seek to call up the joint resolution again.

SILVER COINAGE AND COIN REDEMPTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. NELSON Mr. President, I propose for a few minutes, perhaps not over a half hour, to discuss the so-called silver amendment to the pending bill, and shall aim to do so in a wholly impersonal manner, without lauding one party or aiming to detract anything from the other.

The free and unlimited coinage of silver, at the ratio of 16 to 1, by the United States alone, at this time and under existing conditions, will destroy the last vestige and last hope of genuine bimetallism, and will reduce us to a pure state of silver monometallism, with Mexico, China, and Japan as our chief metallic money associates.

Complete bimetallism implies not only equal mint privileges, but also equal faculties of circulation. Both metals may be freely coined and yet not freely circulate. A metal may be freely coined and yet be powerless to maintain itself in circulation. Though both metals may be freely coined, yet if, for any cause, only one of them is in active circulation, then there is a failure of that bimetallism which seeks an abundant currency and enhanced prices, the chief grounds upon which free coinage is placed.

In this full and plenary sense we have never had complete bimetallism in this country. We have been subject to that law from which no nation is exempt—that where two kinds of metallic money of equal coin value, but of unequal commercial value, circulate side by side, that money which is intrinsically and commercially cheapest will drive the dearest out of circulation, unless the two are, as a matter of law and fact, interconvertible with each other. Our own experience and our own financial history make this plain and manifest. At least three times in our experience have we suffered the penalty of this law and sought to overcome its effects.

In 1792, when our mint was established and our first coinage law was passed, the commercial ratio of silver to gold was 15.17 to 1. That law, at the suggestion of Hamilton and Jefferson, who, unlike some of the statesmen of to-day, were imbued with the desire to approximate the commercial ratio, fixed the coin ratio at 15 to 1 and provided for the free coinage of the following gold coins:

The eagle, or ten-dollar piece, of 270 grains and 0.916⅔ fineness.
The half eagle, or five-dollar piece, of 135 grains and 0.916⅔ fineness.
The quarter eagle, or two-and-a-half-dollar piece, of 67.5 grains and 0.916⅔ fineness.

And also provided for the free coinage of the following silver coins:

The dollar, or unit, of 416 grains and 0.8924 fineness.
The half dollar, of 208 grains and 0.8924 fineness.
The quarter dollar, of 104 grains and 0.8924 fineness.
The dime, of 41.6 grains and 0.8924 fineness.
The half dime, of 20.8 grains and 0.8924 fineness.

The commercial value of the gold coins coined under this act being and becoming higher than the coin value, they were withdrawn from circulation and exported. To remedy this evil, and to retain our gold coin in circulation at home, the act of 1834 was passed, by which the weight and fineness of gold coins was fixed as follows:

The eagle, 258 grains and 0.899225 fineness.
The half eagle, 129 grains and 0.899225 fineness.
The quarter eagle, 64.5 grains and 0.899225 fineness.

And this left the ratio at near 16 to 1. What had been true during this period as to gold was also true as to our silver coinage. The coin value of that was less than the commercial value, and as a consequence that, too, was shipped abroad. To remedy this evil the executive department suspended the coinage of silver from 1805 till 1836. But finally Congress intervened, and by the act of 1837 established the following weight and fineness of our silver coinage:

The dollar, of 412½ grains and 0.900 fineness.
The half dollar, of 206¼ grains and 0.900 fineness.
The quarter dollar, of 103⅛ grains and 0.900 fineness.
The dime, of 41¼ grains and 0.900 fineness.
The half dime, of 20⅝ grains and 0.900 fineness.

This same act also changed the gold to the same rate of fineness as silver. During this early period, from 1792 till 1834 and 1837, our gold and silver coins were both expelled from circulation by the cheaper foreign coins, especially by the so-called Spanish milled dollar. The act of 1837 failed to bring back our silver into circulation. Its coin value as against gold was still less than its commercial value, and so our gold usurped the entire field of circulation.

To cure this and to keep some of our silver in circulation, the act of 1853 was passed, by which the weight of the silver coinage below the dollar was changed as follows: The half dollar to 192 grains; the quarter dollar to 96 grains; the dime to 38.4 grains; the half dime to 19.2 grains.

By this act free coinage was suspended as to this subsidiary silver, and it was only permitted to be a legal tender in sums of $5 or less. Prior to this there had been no limitation, either as to free coinage or legal tender, in respect to either metal. The statesmen of those days had no scruples and could see no injustice in suspending free coinage in respect to money the coin value of which was so much inferior to the commercial or intrinsic value as our subsidiary silver then became. From the time of this legislation till 1862, when both gold and silver, through the vicissitude of war, were withdrawn from circulation, our metallic currency consisted of gold and this subsidiary and some foreign silver. The silver dollar had totally disappeared from circulation. In fact, from 1837 till 1862, so far as circulation was concerned, we had the single gold standard as completely as any country ever had it. And by the rules now laid down by the advocates of free coinage, that low prices, hard times, and financial distress are the results of a lack of silver money, surely the prices of commodities must have been tenfold lower then than now and the distress more than tenfold greater. But we know that this was not so; that the country grew and prospered even on a single gold standard.

During the period of seventy years, from 1792 till 1862, we had, except as to subsidiary silver, bimetallic free coinage, but in no sense bimetallic circulation. The most important element of bimetallism was wanting. Free coinage without parity in faculty of circulation, without a bimetallic circulation, is a snare and a delusion, is, in substance, only a form of monometallism.

Under the law of 1792, by the year 1834 our gold and silver, because its commercial value was higher than its coin value, and higher than our paper currency and a lot of foreign silver, had, by this inferior silver and paper currency, been driven out of circulation; and subsequent to 1834 our silver, except the subsidiary coins saved by the act of 1853, was driven out of circulation by our gold more completely than at any other time in our history. Did anyone ever see an American silver dollar in circulation in the fifties, or from thence until we got the Bland dollar?—and that was not a free-coinage dollar. During these seventy years we had a shifting monometallism as to circulation. Somehow, in one form or another, under the operation of the law I have described, one-half of our so-called "primary" money was "stricken down" most of the time; and part of the time our entire stock of "primary" money was "stricken down" and hid below the horizon of circulation by cheap foreign silver and cheap paper. These seventy years of our financial experience demonstrate to all fair and candid minds in search of truth, and who are willing to accept the truth, that free coinage, even at a coin ratio not very far removed from the intrinsic ratio, does not of itself lead to bimetallism in circulation, and does not result in an expansion of metallic currency or "primary money."

This is still more apparent if we study the coinage of our mints. Up to 1875 there had been coined in our mints a total of $919,212,930 in gold, $8,031,238 of silver dollars, and $149,132,720 of subsidiary silver, or a total of $157,163,958 of silver. And as to circulation, the disparaity between silver and gold from 1850 till 1873 was still greater.

Our own experience during the first seventy years of this century was the experience, in a greater or less degree, of the nations of Europe. Aside from England nearly all of them had free coinage of both metals, with a shifting monometallism as to circulation. It was no doubt this fluctuating monometallism, in connection with the difficulty of maintaining the parity of the two metals, that led so many countries in the seventies to adopt the single gold standard, or to suspend the free coinage of silver.

In 1873 our country adopted the single gold standard and demonetized the silver dollar. And this has been called by those who now seek the free coinage of silver the great crime of 1873. Most of our economic and industrial misfortunes from that day to this are ascribed to this cause. I am not here to defend or justify, nor have I ever defended or justified, the act of 1873. In my opinion it ought not to have passed. But that act did not accomplish all the dire results with which it has been charged. It did not strike down silver, for the reason that there was none in circulation to strike down. Silver had been stricken down—that is, expelled from circulation—long before that under the acts of 1834 and 1837. Under free coinage our silver dollars had been in hiding ever since the early fifties, and neither gold nor silver had been in circulation since 1862. We were on an exclusive paper basis. We did not commence to retire even our fractional paper currency by the substitution of subsidiary silver till 1876, and in 1878, one year before we resumed specie payment of our greenbacks, silver was remonetized and made a legal tender with an enforced monthly coinage of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion.

The harm that the act of 1873 might have accomplished, had it remained in force when we resumed specie payment in 1879, was cured by the act of 1878. Under more than seventy years of free coinage only 8,000,000 of silver dollars had been coined, while under the act of 1878 there was coined from the time of its passage till it was supplanted by the act of July, 1890, $385,000,000 in standard legal-tender silver dollars; and from the bullion purchased under the act of 1890 there has already been coined over $40,000,000 in standard silver dollars. And "the net profit or seigniorage on the coinage of silver during the seventeen years ended June 30, 1895, including the balance in the coinage mints on July 1, 1878, aggregates $75,643,893." Only a small fraction of this profit would have inured to us had there been free coinage.

Under free coinage we were unable to keep our silver dollars, though comparatively few in numbers, in circulation, while under the restricted coinage of the acts of 1878 and 1890 we have been able to keep all our coined silver in circulation, either in coin or silver paper, and to maintain the whole of it on a parity with gold. On the 1st of November, 1895, the status of our metallic currency was as follows:

	General stock coined or issued.	In Treasury.	Amount in circulation.
Gold coin	$564,132,920	$88,951,327	$475,181,593
Silver:
Standard dollars	423,289,309	364,935,217	58,354,092
Subsidiary	77,259,180	13,426,421	63,832,759
Treasury notes, act July 14, 1890	141,092,280	26,565,611	114,526,669
Certificates:
Gold	50,585,889	168,230	50,417,659
Silver	342,409,504	8,953,268	333,456,236

Our total gold circulation, including coin and gold paper, was $525,599,243, and our total silver circulation, including silver dollars, subsidiary silver, and both kinds of silver paper, was $570,169,747. And the whole of this silver currency, the silver certificates being convertible into silver dollars at will, except the $63,832,750 of subsidiary silver, was in law a legal tender on a par with gold, and was as much primary redemption money in law as gold.

We thus had $506,336,997 of legal-tender silver against $525,599,243 of legal-tender gold, thus giving us almost parity in volume as well as parity in value. Here we have more of genuine bimetallism and far less of monometallism than we ever had under the free-coinage laws prior to 1873. We make a better showing as to silver than even France, which is the only country whose per capita circulation materially exceeds ours. The estimated amount of metallic money in France is, gold, $775,000,000; full legal-tender silver (5-franc pieces), $435,000,000, and limited legal-tender silver, $45,000,000. How, in the face of these figures, can it be said that silver has been stricken down, or that one-half of our so-called primary money has been destroyed? Our $8,000,000 free-coinage silver was unable to maintain itself in circulation, while our $500,000,000 of silver currency, under restricted coinage, though intrinsically worth only half of its coin value, is kept in circulation on a parity with gold. And how is this done; how is this parity maintained? It is maintained by making the cheaper metal, silver, interconvertible with the dearer metal, gold. As long as the cheaper metal can at will be exchanged, and the public believe it can at will be exchanged for gold, dollar for dollar, there is no object in retiring the gold from circulation, and it will not be retired.

It is this principle of interconvertibility in law and in practice that has kept, and is keeping, our large volume of silver currency in circulation on a parity with gold. It was because our cheap foreign silver and our paper could not be converted dollar for dollar into our dearer gold and silver that both of the latter disappeared from circulation between 1792 and 1834; and it was because our cheaper gold could not be converted at will dollar for dollar into our dearer silver that the latter disappeared from circulation after 1854.

Steady, continued bimetallic circulation, at any ratio, can only be maintained by making the dollar of one metal always interconvertible with the dollar of the other metal, for the bullion value of the two metals will inevitably, as against each other, fluctuate more or less, and this fluctuation is what necessitates interconvertibility, or the right of always exchanging the cheaper coin for the dearer coin. It is only under this principle—the principle of interconvertibility—that bimetallic circulation, in the absence of international agreement, can exist or be maintained. And even under international agreement there is need of interconvertibility, in order to insure complete and continued bimetallic circulation. For, unless the two metals are at all times interconvertible dollar for dollar, there is apt to be more or less of a shifting and fluctuating monometallic circulation.

Our large silver currency, almost equal to our gold currency, is kept in circulation, side by side with gold, and on a parity with it, though intrinsically worth only half as much, because, by law and in practice, we stand ready to make good every silver dollar with a gold dollar. The law directs us to maintain the parity, and this can only be done by maintaining interconvertibility. As long as we have the power and ability to maintain this, real bimetallic circulation, which I believe in with all my heart, can be maintained. As long as our silver currency under present conditions is kept on a parity in volume with gold and is not allowed, materially, to exceed it, we can maintain a parity in value. But the moment you destroy this parity in volume, the moment you open wide the door and get such an abundance of silver coined that we are powerless to maintain it interconvertible with gold, gold will go out of circulation and we will be in a state of silver monometallism, and silver will circulate on its bullion value, which will be a fluctuating value, liable to change from day to day, as the price of bullion goes up or down, with none of that fixity of value that silver has when its coin value is kept on a parity with gold.

Under such a system of silver monometallism no one could do business unless he took pains to post himself from day to day in regard to the bullion price of silver.

Mr. President, I hold in my hand two silver dollars. One the American dollar, the dollar of our daddies, the other the Mexican dollar, the Greaser dollar. There is a little more silver, of little more fineness, in the Mexican dollar than in ours. If I go down to Texas and cross the Rio Grande into Mexico, I can get two Mexican dollars for one of ours. Why is this? It is because in Mexico they have silver monometallism, and because silver there circulates on its bullion value, while with us it circulates on its coin value on a parity with gold, and our Government stands ready to maintain the dignity of the silver dollar on a par with the gold dollar, and to make every silver dollar good with a gold dollar. Do you want to Mexicanize our currency? If you do, then adopt free coinage. If you want genuine bimetallic circulation, then you must adhere to the principles of moderate and limited coinage, and have the two metals interconvertible.

Owing to the fact that in the seventies nearly all the nations of Europe either adopted the single gold standard or suspended the free coinage of silver, and also owing in part to the fact that there has been a large increase in the production of silver, and in spite of the efforts of India, and the United States under the act of 1890, to maintain and uphold silver, and in spite of the fact that for upward of three years these two countries consumed nearly two-thirds of the world's silver, this metal continued to fall in price until in 1894 it had reached a commercial ratio of more than 32 to 1, and has remained substantially at that ratio ever since. It will do no good to taunt or call to task the nations of Europe for demonetizing silver or suspending the coinage thereof. We can no more expect to control them in these matters than in their revenue and tariff legislation. But it is a fact that we must take into account and can not overlook.

The chief use of silver prior to the seventies was for coin purposes under free-coinage laws, and under those conditions the coin value fixed or kept up the bullion price. But this kind of a market for silver has since that time ceased to exist in Europe.

Europe still uses a large amount of silver for coin purposes, almost as much as before demonetization, but it purchases the silver bullion at its commercial or market value, and not at an arbitrary coin value, as before. These facts and this condition, which we did not cause and can not control, have reduced the price of silver bullion to its present low level, and it is in the face of these facts and this condition, which no one can gainsay, and when the commercial ratio of silver is 32 to 1, that the advocates of free silver ask us to embark upon the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the cooperation of even a single nation in Europe; and in this request they not only ask us to increase the circulation of silver without limit, but also to double the price of it, for they are as persistent about the ratio as about the fact of coinage. They insist on a ratio that has been obsolete for over twenty years. They argue that by free coinage we can, by our own might, restore the price of silver to correspond with the coin ratio they insist upon. But our experience under the act of 1890, when we were purchasing silver at the rate of 54,000,000 ounces per year, and had the assistance of free coinage in India, shows, aside from other considerations, that we can not now, shorn of the help of India and with all Europe against us, hope to restore silver to its former, or near its former, price. By free coinage we could perhaps raise the price of it a little above the present level, but we would be utterly unable to maintain it on a parity with gold.

Bimetallism in circulation would cease and vanish, and we would be in a state of silver monometallism like Mexico, China, and Japan. The American people are in favor of ample and complete bimetallic circulation, and it is because that they have good ground to fear that free and unlimited coinage would destroy such bimetallism that they are opposed to such coinage. Our silver currency is now nearly equal in volume to our gold currency. It could bear expansion to an exact equality of volume, and it should be kept on that footing, for that would be using both metals to an equal degree, and in that proportion we can sustain their interconvertibility and maintain the parity of the two metals.

The great mass of the American people own neither silver mines nor silver bullion, and if they are content to accept and circulate, by means of a gold reserve, an inferior and cheaper silver dollar on a parity with a gold dollar, it is their business. They are the chief parties in interest, and bear the chief burden. But if there is a profit of 50 cents or less on each silver dollar, that profit ought to inure to all the people of the United States. It ought to go into the Treasury of our common country for the common benefit and advantage of all, and not into the pockets of the owners of silver mines or silver bullion, as it would under free coinage on the ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States alone.

But it is argued by the advocates of unlimited coinage that silver is primary money, and that values are measured and prices fixed by the amount of primary money in circulation, and that prices rise or fall as the volume of such money rises or falls. It is further said that silver, for want of free coinage, has ceased to be primary money, and that this has resulted in the destruction of one-half, more or less, of our total stock of primary money, and a proportionate lowering of prices and values; and finally, that it is because there is an insufficiency of currency in circulation, especially silver currency, that values and prices are low and cheap and business embarrassed and depressed. The fallacy of all this argument, though supported by scholastic dissertations and quotations from publicists, becomes apparent from a brief review and a brief consideration of our own conscious experience as a nation. Our own history, if read aright, affords us ample means of disproval.

In one sense, any coin is primary money when it is a legal tender, though it may not be freely coined. In this sense it was only from 1873 till 1878 that silver was not primary money. But at that time we were on an exclusive paper basis, so that practically the demonetization was more technical than actual. Except during that period of five years, the silver dollar has always been a legal tender, and is a legal tender to-day. In another sense—that sense which lies at the root and constitutes the very essence of bimetallic circulation, either under free or restricted coinage—there is but one kind of primary money, and that is the money which for the time being maintains the parity of the two metals, be it either silver or gold. In brief, there is a primary money of law and a primary money of fact.

From 1854 till 1862, or, if you please, till 1873, silver dollars were a legal tender and were freely coined, but there were none of them in circulation, and, as a consequence, the people had none of that money to tender. Free coinage and legal tender were there, but the actual money was wanting. Since 1878 silver, though under restricted and limited coinage, has been a legal tender, both for the individual and the Government. Where the individual does not foreclose himself by an agreement to the contrary he can at all times stand on silver as a legal tender, as primary money, and make his payments therein, and he can now obtain, what he could not do in that free-coinage period to which I have referred, a reasonable and ample amount of silver dollars with which to make such tender, provided he has something in the shape of property or labor to exchange for it, and that would be a requisite, even under free coinage. Technically and as a matter of law, the Government, too, unless by special agreement foreclosed, can stand on silver as legal tender, as primary money. But the Government is charged with a duty from which the individual is exempt—that of maintaining the parity of the two metals, that of maintaining bimetallic circulation, and on this account the Government can not afford at all times to stand on its technical right, but must always be ready to pay in the dearer metal, the primary money of fact rather than the primary money of law. Unless the Government does this monometallism will be the inevitable result. It is not true that values or prices are fixed by the volume of primary money alone. Nor is it true that the volume of business is measured by any such standard. Neither is it true that prices or business is gauged by the volume of silver in circulation.

Prices and business during the period from 1854 till 1862 were fairly good, and, on the whole, better than during the last three years, and yet during that period there was no legal-tender silver whatsoever in circulation. At no time in our history have we had, either absolutely or relatively, so large a volume of silver currency in circulation as during the last three years, and yet prices and values have scarcely ever been so low as during these years, nor have we ever before had any greater business depression.

From 1861 till 1878 we had no so-called primary money, either silver or gold, in circulation, and yet we carried on with success a great war, paid and pensioned a great army, and paid or funded a great national debt. And during all this period prices were maintained at a much higher level than to-day. And from the close of the war till 1878 we enjoyed a period of great and almost unequaled progress and prosperity. And all this without any primary money whatsoever in circulation. And during all this period our per-capita circulation of money was less than it has been at any time since 1881, and much less than it is to-day, as appears from the following table of circulation from 1860 till 1872, and from the table of circulation and prices hereinafter set forth from 1872 till 1895:

Amounts of money in the United States, and in circulation, on July 1 of each year from 1860 to 1871, inclusive.

July 1—	Amount of money in United States.	Amount in circulation.	Population June 1.	Money per capita.	Circulation per capita.

If primary money is the measure of values, of prices, and of business, then, by this token, everything ought to have been at zero—at a standstill during this period.

Values and prices are primarily fixed and controlled by the law of supply and demand, now and at all times. The abundance or scarcity of money may affect them to some extent.

Whatever effect money may have, it is not silver nor gold alone, nor both together, but the entire volume of our circulating medium—gold, silver, paper, and credit currency combined—that is controlling. In the entire country, as an aggregate, over 90 per cent of all transfers and exchanges for goods and commodities are affected and liquidated by means of checks, drafts, and bills passing, most of them, through the clearing houses. About 8 per cent are in paper currency, 1 per cent in gold coin, and one-half of 1 per cent in silver coin. In the great commercial centers, in the large towns, and among middlemen, wholesalers, and jobbers transactions are mostly in the commercial paper mentioned, while in the small country towns, among the retailers, producers, and middlemen, and in retail business, transactions are, to a large and preponderating extent, carried on in bank notes and paper currency, and but a mere trifle in gold or silver coin.

The traffic and the commerce of the country is measured and carried on, not by the silver and gold coin in circulation, but by the paper money and credit currency circulating. And this fact, it seems to me, makes it plain that values are not fixed or controlled by the most limited element of our circulating medium, but rather by the aggregate of all the elements combined. An abundance of currency, if excessive, leads to overspeculation, overproduction, and to an unhealthy inflation of business, and such a condition is always, sooner or later, succeeded by a great reaction, often ruinous in its consequences. The high tide of 1890, 1891, and 1892 was succeeded by the ebb of 1893, 1894, and 1895.

It is a grave question, in my mind, whether the great and abnormal reaction of the last three years was not, in part, superinduced and brought about by the forced and artificial money inflation of the three preceding years. But, be this as it may, it is certain that a mere abundance of currency does not always, nor as a general rule, bring in its wake an enhancement of prices. This can be established from our own commercial and statistical history in a manner that can not be gainsaid. Our leading agricultural export crops are wheat and cotton. I have compiled from the Annual Statistical Abstract of 1894 and from the October Statistical Abstract of 1895 the following table, showing the total money circulation, the gold circulation, the silver circulation, and the per capita circulation, and the New York export price of wheat and cotton for each year from 1872 till November, 1895.

The table is as follows:

This table shows that during the period of 1872 to 1878, when silver was demonetized, when there was scarcely any gold or silver in circulation, and when the per capita circulation never exceeded $18.19, and was down to $15.58, the prices of wheat and cotton were high, far higher than they have ever been since. This table also shows that, as our circulation has increased and as our gold and silver money has increased, prices have, in the main, been gradually dropping lower and lower, and that they were never so low as in the year 1894, when our aggregate gold and silver circulation was the highest, and when our per capita circulation was within 11 cents of the greatest amount it has ever attained, that of 1892. How much sophistry and how much ingenious and farfetched reasoning the figures in this table dispel. They show conclusively that prices have not been lowered through a want of currency, or through a want of either gold or silver, and, above all, they show how harmless the crime of 1873 was during the five years of its existence.

The level of prices of wheat and cotton during those five years was higher than during any five years since. And during the entire period of twenty-four years covered by this table the prices of cotton and wheat were never so low during any five-year period as during the five years succeeding the passage of the silver-purchasing law of 1890, thus pointing out to us that the silver shower, whatever else it may have done, did not rain manna into the hands of the producers of wheat and cotton. The silver countries, Mexico, China, and Japan, are not the purchasers of our surplus wheat and cotton. We have to look to the gold-standard countries for our customers. But when every other argument fails the advocates of free silver appeal to our prejudices and say that by aiming to keep our money up to the gold standard we are merely knuckling down to England, putting ourselves in her grasp and placing ourselves at her mercy. England occupies the vantage ground; she does, because her exchanges are made in the universal money of the world. Our form of government, our climate and our resources, and, above all, the restless energy and vigor of our people entitle us to stand at the head of the industrial and commercial world. But we can never hope to reach that high plane by reducing our currency to the level of Mexico, China, and Japan, the mere bullion value of silver.

If we would win and conquer we must seek the best coign of advantage, and, above all, we must equip ourselves with the best of weapons. We must adhere to the universal money standard of the world. Anything less than that is unworthy of us and will place us at great disadvantage now and in times to come.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the discussion of the question whether silver shall be restored to the same right of coinage which from the foundation of the Government until 1873 it enjoyed equally with gold has been for twenty years in the forefront of those agitating the public mind and demanding a final determination at the hands of Congress. In spite of this universal public interest and the unremitting popular agitation which has continued without cessation as a result thereof, the problem is yet unsolved and still constitutes, after this long period of contention, the most important, the most importunate, and the most irrepressible question of the day. So long as it remains undetermined it is not only natural but unavoidable that there should continue concerning it the deepest public interest and the most active political contention. This contention is not confined to the state papers of the Chief Executive, and to the debates in Congress, and to the discussions of the press, but extends to every class and condition, from those whose annual incomes are counted by millions of dollars to the humblest laborer whose week's toil will not earn the smallest gold piece now coined and issued from the mint of the Government.

It not only marks divisions between political parties, but also the most pronounced and well-defined divisions between antagonistic factions within these parties.

In the presence of such widespread and consuming interest it is a fact, to which thoughtful and conservative people of whatever political faith should not shut their eyes, that unless at an early date there is by them a fair and proper adjustment of this momentous matter its solution may be accomplished at the hands of those who have less concern for the establishment of a sound and stable currency. The possibility of such occurrence may seem to be very remote. Nevertheless, those who feel most secure in the confidence that the question of the restoration of silver has been put finally to rest, and who boast that further discussion is but a moot debate, the thrashing over of old straw, should not forget the fact taught by experience in both political and civil convulsions that the most violent and successful revolutions have frequently been developed when the power they overthrew seemed most impregnably intrenched and girt about with its defenses.

The question of the restoration of the coinage of silver upon terms of exact equality with gold, when reduced to its last analysis, is whether the basis of the money of final payment shall be narrowed to the possible supply of gold coin, or whether it shall be broadened so as to include the available supply of both gold and silver for coinage as primary standard money.

The resultant of this last analysis must embrace both the gold and the silver coin, each with equal current interchangeable value with the other. For otherwise there would necessarily be practically either gold monometallism or silver monometallism.

Pretermitting for the present the question whether the double standard of gold and silver is practically possible, it is apparent that the question whether the money of final payment shall in this country consist solely of gold, or whether it shall consist of both gold and silver, is one most deeply and directly affecting every person, rich or poor, every interest, great or small, and every occupation from that of the highest salaried official in the land to that of the humblest laborer who eats his crust as the reward of his daily toil.

In considering the importance of the restoration of silver as a standard money it is essential to keep clearly in view the distinction between real money and other forms of currency. This is especially essential because the most dangerous device adopted by those who are in truth the friends of the single gold standard is to advocate such a plan for the coinage of silver as will only make it representative or token money and not real standard money. By this cunning device many of the friends of silver coinage are deceived, and the line of division is obscured between those who are really gold monometallists and those who are in good faith bimetallists.

In common parlance all forms of currency are called money. It is nevertheless true that many of these forms of currency are not money, but only the representatives of money. Accurately speaking, only that is money which is the standard of value and which is known as the money of final payment; that form of currency which is itself paid or redeemed is nothing else, but which in itself pays and redeems everything else. All other forms of currency are but the representatives of money. Only unlimited legal-tender coin is strictly money. Even legal-tender greenbacks are not money, because while they are under the law legal tender in the payment of debts, they are themselves a demand upon the Government for redemption in legal-tender coin. All forms of paper currency are but the representatives of money. Not only so, but it is a fact which can not be too clearly understood or too strongly emphasized that all forms and grades of metallic token money, such as our subsidiary coinage, whether of silver, nickel, or copper, are but the representatives of money. They are not in themselves money, but derive their current value, just as the paper currency does, from the fact that they are, under certain regulations, redeemable by the Government in that which is real money.

To coin silver, in whatever amount or in whatever denominations, as subsidiary or token money, is but to make it representative money, at last redeemable in gold. If it is to be representative money it may as well be of paper as of silver. The important object to be accomplished in the restoration of silver is to enlarge the quantity of standard money. To accomplish this silver must be coined and used as standard money of final payment in no wise dependent on gold. Anything short of this is a delusion and a snare, cunningly spread for the feet of the unwary and the uninformed.

Whatever may be the volume of merely representative currency, whether it be of paper or of coin token money, the questions of the price of property and of labor are necessarily and materially affected by the volume of the standard coin money. Supply and demand and also other influences undoubtedly affect prices. The question whether there shall or shall not be general and individual prosperity, whether prices shall be high or low, whether business shall be active or stagnant, whether enterprise shall be productive or paralyzed, or whether wages shall be remunerative or insufficient for support, are all more or less affected by many influences. But be these influences what they may, whether for good or for evil, the important potential factor in the decision of these questions for good, is the proper supply of primary standard money in the country.

The advocates of the restoration of silver as primary money are in favor of silver, not as against gold. They favor the restoration of silver because the use of both gold and silver as ultimate redemption money is necessary to constitute true bimetallism. They are now struggling in behalf of silver because silver is the metal which is now excluded from equal rights of coinage.

If the conditions were reversed and silver were by law allowed free coinage and the same right of coinage denied to gold, all true bimetallists would contend with equal earnestness for the restoration of gold. There can be no true bimetallism which does not embrace as a constituent part silver as primary standard money.

In the discussion, therefore, of the restoration of silver, the issue should be accurately defined and clearly recognized, not as gold on the one side and silver on the other side, but as gold monometallism on one side, opposed on the other side to bimetallism, embracing both gold and silver as primary standard money. The man who favors unlimited gold coinage, and also silver coinage, but the latter only in the shape of subsidiary or token money, is not a bimetallist. Whatever be the reasons which control him, he is in effect a practical gold monometallist. He only is a bimetallist who favors both gold and silver as standard, final redemption money.

The importance of true bimetallism to the prosperity of the country is the fundamental controlling fact underlying the demand for the restoration of silver. The strength of the argument in favor of bimetallism is based on the fact that the use of both metals is necessary to supply the amount of money of final payment required to do the business of the world, for the reason that all the gold in the world available for coinage is, taken by itself, insufficient for this purpose; and that all the silver in the world available for coinage, taken by itself, is likewise insufficient for this purpose.

This is the basic, fundamental proposition in favor of bimetallism. Is this proposition true? If it is, then the restoration of bimetallism with the use of both gold and silver as the money of final payment can not be overestimated, and there can be no higher obligation on the statesmanship of the country than to find a speedy way for its accomplishment. If it is not true, but if on the contrary it is a fact that there is enough of gold available for coinage to answer all the needs of the world as the money of final payment, then for myself I am ready to admit that the question of bimetallism, and the question which it involves of the restoration of silver as primary money, except so far as they concern debts previously contracted, are comparatively unimportant questions. Upon the crucial question as to the sufficiency of the gold supply there is little division in the opinions of public men, judging by their former utterances, and there is little room for division. Most of them have borne direct testimony to the fact of such insufficiency. In 1878 the present senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], then Secretary of the Treasury, wrote a letter to Hon. William S. Groesbeck, of Cincinnati, from which I will ask the Secretary to read the portion which is marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

I have some delicacy in replying very fully. During the monetary conference in Paris, when silver in our country was excluded from circulation by being undervalued, I was strongly in favor of the single standard of gold, and wrote a letter which you will find in the proceedings of the conference, stating briefly my view. At that time the wisest among us did not anticipate the sudden fall of silver or the rise of gold that has occurred. This uncertainty of the relation between the two metals is one of the chief arguments in favor of a monometallic system, but other arguments, showing the dangerous effect upon industry by dropping one of the precious metals from the standard of value, outweigh in my mind all theoretical objections to the bimetallic system.

Mr. BACON. In May, 1894, certain Senators sent a cablegram to the International Bimetallic Conference in London, and I ask that the Secretary read from the report of that conference the portion which is marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

Mr. BACON. I desire to state, in order that the reading of the extract may be properly understood, that the statement which the Secretary is now reading is the preliminary statement of the presiding officer made to the meeting concerning the cablegram, which will immediately follow:

The Secretary read as follows:

I desire to read the following cablegram from America, addressed to the lord mayor, to be read to this meeting this morning:

"We desire to express our cordial sympathy with the movement to promote the restoration of silver by international agreement, in aid of which we understand a meeting is to be held to-morrow under your lordship's presidency. We believe that the free coinage of both gold and silver by international agreement at a fixed ratio would secure to mankind the blessing of a sufficient volume of metallic money, and, what is hardly less important, would secure to the world of trade immunity from violent exchange fluctuations."

This cablegram is signed by Messrs. JOHN SHERMAN, WILLIAM ALLISON, D. W. VOORHEES, H. C. LODGE, G. F. HOAR, N. W. ALDRICH, D. B. HILL, E. MURPHY, C. S. BRICE, O. H. PLATT, A. P. GORMAN, W. P. FRYE, C. K. DAVIS, S. M. CULLOM, J. M. Carey, United States Senators. Having to discharge magisterial duties for the lord mayor, I will ask my esteemed friend, Mr. Hucks Gibbs, to take the chair in my place. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Henry Hucks Gibbs: The secretary will read certain letters of apology. But before his doing so I will mention that the significance of that cablegram which has just been read to you is much enhanced by the fact that the names appended to it include those of the leading "gold men" and advocates of the repeal of the Sherman Act in the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Of course it will be recognized that both the letter and the cablegram contemplated international agreement; but whatever might be the method of relief preferred, both documents contain the emphatic declaration by these distinguished Senators of the insufficiency of the supply of gold, to be relieved from which, by the addition of silver as standard money, would be, in their language, a "blessing to mankind." Nor, Mr. President, is this testimony confined to these eminent Senators, for there is scarcely in the whole country a public man of any political party who has not repeatedly, in public speech and in printed letter, avowed his earnest desire for the restoration of bimetallism, and expressed his antagonism to the single gold standard, recognizing thereby the insufficiency in the possible supply of gold. In addition to the testimony of eminent public men in their individual capacities, the great conventions of the great political parties of the nation, when they have met to nominate their candidates for the highest offices, have in their declarations of principles vied with each other in the strength and earnestness of the avowals of their loyalty to both gold and silver as the standard money of final payment.

Every such utterance by these great national conventions is an emphatic declaration of the insufficiency of the gold supply for the needs of the country. But the crowning declaration of the fact is found in the act of 1893, by which was repealed the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act. That act of 1893, after performing the legislative function which was designed, went further, and in a most unusual manner declared in the most solemn form known to lawmakers the policy and duty of the Government to coin both gold and silver as standard money, and avowed the obligation and intention to find in one way or another the safe way in which to accomplish it. I will ask the Secretary to read the extract from the act as marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Mr. BACON. This solemn declaration, made in this unusual form, could only have been demanded and justified upon the admitted gross inadequacy of gold to furnish the required amount of standard money.

And thus it is seen that we have the unbroken and concurrent testimony of the eminent men of the day, of the great political parties of the nation, speaking through their representative conventions, and of the Government of the United States speaking in the solemn utterance of a statute, declaring the vital importance of a restoration of bimetallism which shall embrace both gold and silver coin as full standard money. These declarations, by necessary intendment, avow the inadequacy of the possible gold supply to furnish alone the standard money necessary to properly carry on the business of the country, in such manner that there may be profitable employment of capital in other business than in bonds and mortgages—in such manner that the great natural resources of the country may be developed, that business may be active, that enterprise shall be eager, and that the labor of the country may find abundant employment at remunerative wages.

The testimony thus piled up in support of this proposition finds its indisputable confirmation in the financial conditions of the leading nations of the world. It can not be said that any one nation has more than a sufficiency of gold. If, therefore, any one of the nations has an insufficiency to supply its needs, to procure such sufficiency would require that the amount needed for this purpose should be taken from some other nation. To do so would necessarily leave the nation from which it was taken with a corresponding insufficiency. Thus it would necessarily result that to fill the treasury of one nation with needed gold would require that the treasury of another should be emptied of gold for the purpose.

What are the facts as to the supply of gold held by the leading nations? The United States and all the leading Governments of Europe are trying to hoard gold. The fearful cost at which this Government is endeavoring to keep what it considers a safe amount to enable it to maintain the gold basis leaves no room for question that our own supply of gold is woefully inadequate for this purpose. While this is so, it is furthermore a most remarkable fact that of all the six great powers of Europe only two of them, England and Germany, are on a gold specie paying basis. It is a reasonable statement that either one of these Governments, if it could command the requisite supply of gold to safely undertake it, would certainly make gold specie payments of its obligations; and yet in spite of great hoards of gold in their treasuries, their knowledge of the undoubted fact that there is not sufficient of it to go around if payments are undertaken in it, keeps every leading power of Europe, excepting only England and Germany, in a condition of suspended gold payments, and practically upon a paper or silver basis.

In Russia there is a paper currency at about 33 per cent discount. I know that Russia is classed among those using the silver standard, but she has a great hoard of gold which she is constantly struggling to increase, and there can be no doubt that her inability to maintain gold payments is the only reason why she is not on the gold basis. So that upon the question of the sufficiency of the gold supply it is practically the same thing in her case as if she had the gold standard.

In Austria there is a depreciated paper currency which is not even upon its face convertible into coin of any kind. In Italy, so far from gold, one does not even see silver, but only bills and shinplasters for amounts as small as 1 franc (less than 20 cents).

France, with the largest per capita gold and silver coinage of any other nation in the world, recognizing the insufficiency of the gold supply of the world, and knowing that she would be speedily drained of her supply if she paid it out on the demands against her, keeps her own gold supply, by arbitrarily refusing to pay it out on any demand, except in cases when it suits her convenience to do so. No government can be said to be on a gold-paying basis which does not pay gold coin to everyone demanding it. This, then, is the situation. Including the United States, there are seven great powers in the world. Of them Russia, Austria, Italy, and France are each confessedly not on a gold specie-paying basis, and Russia, Austria, and Italy not on a specie basis of any kind.

The Government of the United States, while paying gold, does so only by continually borrowing, at a ruinous cost, gold which she would otherwise not have—gold which belongs to others and which must be returned. And even with this continual borrowing, if one-fourth of her demand obligations were presented for payment she would be compelled to suspend gold payments. She, too, then, must be put down in the class which has not enough of gold to maintain gold specie payments.

And thus it is that among the seven great powers of the earth, viz, the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Austria, Russia, and Italy, there are only two, Great Britain and Germany, which each has the sufficiency of gold, in her own right, to enable her to maintain gold payments. This remarkable fact is not due to the poverty of either of these great powers, but solely to the insufficiency of the gold supply in the world, for each of these powerful nations is rich in resources and in products.

Another most remarkable fact in this connection is that while of these seven great powers only two of them have a sufficiency of gold, it is at the same time nevertheless true that these seven nations have in the aggregate more than three-fourths of all the gold in the whole world. The remainder, of less than one-fourth of the gold of the world, is held in small amounts by a number of lesser powers, such as Portugal, Belgium, Sweden, etc. No one of them, with few exceptions, has exceeding $40,000,000, and most of them have much less than this amount. It is a fact of momentous significance that these seven great powers, rich in every material resource and controlling the business and commerce of the world, after twenty years in which they have gathered within their borders more than three-fourths of all the gold of all the world, find it utterly inadequate to maintain one-third of them upon a gold specie-paying basis.

Nor is the insufficiency of gold in these countries only shown in the inability of their Governments to maintain gold specie payments. It is equally seen in a like inability of their citizens. No more startling evidence of this insufficiency in this country is needed than the spectacle recently witnessed of Wall street thrown into a perfect spasm of a panic the first day that England demanded gold of America for one-hundredth part of the debt which this country owes her—a foreign indebtedness which has been unnecessarily contracted and increased to enormous proportions, by reason of the suicidal policy of this Government in refusing to furnish her own people, out of the abundant resources of the country, with a sufficient supply of sound standard money.

The insufficiency of the world's supply of gold does not end with the deficiency in the case of these seven great nations taken in the aggregate. These nations embrace less than one-fourth of the population of the earth.

How is gold, the supply of which is shown to be inadequate for the needs of one-fourth, to be so spread among all the nations as to be sufficient for the business needs of the whole world as the money of final payment? For it is not to be forgotten that the argument of the gold-standard advocate is that steam and electricity and modern methods have so converted the whole world into one business community that there must be for all countries alike a uniform standard of money of final payment.

The insufficiency of the supply of gold, even for the needs of those nations striving for the gold standard, is so abundantly proven by indisputable facts that there can be no reasonable controversy as to the truth of the proposition. It is a fact which stands a very lion in the path that leads to gold monometallism.

This fact necessarily compels one of two conclusions: Either the business world and political economists have heretofore been in error, and there is no need of a due proportion of metallic standard money, as has heretofore been believed and recognized through all the centuries, or this required sufficiency of metallic standard money must be secured by the use of both gold and silver. There is no logical escape from the latter proposition, except by taking refuge in the former. In consequence of this dilemma, there have arisen among the advocates of the gold standard those who, unable to dispute the fact of the insufficiency of gold, boldly advocate the proposition that the bulk of business being transacted on credit, the question of the quantity of standard coin is unimportant, and that, the chief function of the money metal being that of a measure of value, its office can be as well performed by a small quantity as by a large quantity. I have personally heard one of the largest and most influential capitalists of New York seriously argue the soundness of this position; and I have read in a respectable gold-standard newspaper an argument to the effect that if the Government kept a few gold coins as the standard of value in the same way that it keeps standards of weights and measures, it was unimportant how small might be the volume of gold coins in the country; and the President, in his last annual message to Congress, in advocating the gold standard, uses this language:

> If a fixed and stable standard is maintained, as the magnitude and safety of our commercial transactions require, the use of money itself is conveniently minimized.

This may be to the interest of the money powers in the money centers, where, with clearing houses, these great financial associations arbitrarily suspend money payments when money is most needed by their creditors, and in violation of law issue certificates to pass as currency between themselves in the place of money which they either have not or with which, if they have it, they will not part. But to ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people there can be no substitute for money in business transactions. They have no clearing-house certificates or other credit devices which will be accepted when the demand for money is made upon them. The suggestions that we should only have a limited quantity of coin to serve as a standard of value, and that then all business should be done through credit, is utterly untenable. It is on a par with that other plan which proposes to dispense with all metallic money, and establish in lieu thereof an ideal money, fixed by the average value of certain products.

All human experience is against such propositions. From the earliest ages gold and silver coins have been the standards of value, and either themselves the mediums of exchange or the basis for such mediums, and all the devices of men to substitute other forms of standard money and to dispense with the use of actual standard coin have signally failed. History teaches that the undue contraction in the volume of standard coin money retards the progress of nations, stagnates business, and destroys public and private prosperity.

The inevitable result from the contraction of the volume of standard money is falling prices sooner or later. Whenever in the presence of such contraction liquidation sets in prices must go down.

There can be no greater evil to the business prosperity of a country than falling prices caused by the contraction of the volume of standard money. It stagnates the current of all business. One can not afford to buy a house when he knows that prices are falling and that the house will be worth less in a month than it is the day he buys it. He can not afford to buy material and employ labor and build a house when he knows that with falling prices the house within a short time after its completion will be worth less than the cost of the labor and the material. What is true of one man is true of all others in the community. The building of houses stops, and in consequence the man who makes material stops making material and his laborers go unemployed. The laborers and mechanics, having no employment, have no wages to spend with the merchants. The merchant, having fewer customers, have less goods to buy, fewer goods to ship by the railroads, and fewer clerks to employ. The railroads, having less freight to transport for the merchants, run fewer trains, employ fewer men and at less wages in the shops and on the roads, and they in turn have less money to spend with the merchants. And so it can be traced through every industry and branch of business, the depression of each one acting upon the other and paralyzing it. The business disasters of the past three years furnish all details of the picture.

In the general stagnation caused by falling prices during the past three years the merchant has been idle behind his counter, the hammer of the mechanic has been still, the wheels of the factory have ceased to go round, and the farmer no longer has had remunerative prices for his products, and, except where supply has fallen below the normal demand, has had to sell them at less than the cost of production. Out of such conditions it is not to be wondered at that the merchants and farmers have become bankrupt, that railroads and almost all other business enterprises have gone into the hands of receivers, that valuable real estate has become a drug, that all business languishes, and that the land is filled with idle men who can find no work. And the end is not yet, for the commercial agencies report an increasing number of failures. This distress and disaster will in greater or less degree continue so long as the single gold standard is practically maintained, for the annual coinage of gold will not keep pace with the increasing population and business development.

And so it is that in this country, with undeveloped resources practically without limit, with a people resolute, industrious, and enterprising, a people with the will and the capacity to develop these resources and convert them into untold wealth, we stand like a poverty-stricken nation begging the world to lend us gold, refusing to utilize our own resources for the sufficient supply of a sound standard coinage. The London News expressed the truth when in a recent issue it spoke of the United States as "both potentially and actually the richest country in the world." And yet, in disregard of all these elements of wealth, we are sacrificing our own interest that other nations may prosper. We are fast becoming the financial vassals of England, and every year of the maintenance of the single gold standard by this country will strengthen and more closely knit the cords of our bondage. Each year the lessening price which our exports to her will command will represent a corresponding lessening payment by them upon our indebtedness to her, and the necessity will be the borrowing of more gold from her. Her domination in foreign lands is largely the power of her gold, and the people will not forget that but yesterday, when the whole country, without regard to political party divisions, rang with applause for the President in his bold assertion of the intention of this Government to maintain and enforce the Monroe doctrine at all cost, he was unsparingly denounced by those whose indebtedness made them the dependents of the British money power.

But sentiment and national pride aside the enormous price that the American people are now paying for the privilege of retaining the single gold standard should cause it to be unhesitatingly condemned and discarded, and a return to the bimetallic standard accomplished by the speediest practicable route.

For the purpose of procuring gold there have already been three bond issues made by the Secretary of the Treasury, aggregating $162,000,000. In February, 1894, United States bonds to the amount of $50,000,000 were sold. In November, 1894, $50,000,000 more were sold, and in February, 1895, $62,000,000 more. On the authority of the President of the United States, I assert that these bonds were not issued for the purpose of raising revenue for the Government or for the purpose of extinguishing the indebtedness of the Government, but solely for the purpose of maintaining the gold standard. This enormous amount of indebtedness, which the people of this country must ultimately pay, and the interest upon which they must pay annually, has been incurred for no other purpose.

The President in his last annual message to Congress says of these three bond issues as follows. I will ask the Secretary to read the portion of the President's annual message which is marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

At no time when bonds have been issued has there been any consideration of the question of paying the expenses of Government with their proceeds. There was no necessity to consider that question. At the time of each bond issue we had a safe surplus in the Treasury for ordinary operations, exclusive of the gold in our reserve. In February, 1894, when the first issue of bonds was made, such surplus amounted to over $18,000,000; in November, when the second issue was made, it amounted to more than $42,000,000, and in February, 1895, when bonds for the third time were issued, such surplus amounted to more than $100,000,000. It now amounts to $98,072,420.30.

Besides all this, the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority whatever to issue bonds to increase the ordinary revenues or pay current expenses.

Mr. BACON. Within a few days $100,000,000 more of bonds is to be issued, not for the purpose of revenue and not for the purpose of extinguishing the public debt, but solely for the purpose of maintaining the single gold standard. This $100,000,000 of bonds is to be issued now when there is in the Treasury in round numbers $180,000,000, and when, according to the Treasury reports, the public revenue is flowing into the Treasury at the rate of nearly $1,000,000 a day. This makes, with the previous bond issues, the enormous amount of $262,000,000 of indebtedness incurred in two years for this purpose alone.

Here is an object lesson for the people at which they should not fail to look with care. Here is, in tangible form, a presentation of a part of the bill they must pay for the privilege and honor of maintaining the gold standard. In addition to this enormous issue of bonds, the President plainly says in his annual message that more bonds are to be issued if required for this purpose. Let no man be deceived as to the question whether he must contribute his part to the payment of these bonds and of the annual interest thereon. From the richest to the poorest, the people of every State and section must pay their proportion, and under our system of revenue the poor will pay almost if not quite as much as the rich.

What benefit has the single gold standard been to the plain people of this country, those who make up the great masses of the people engaged in the ordinary avocations of the country? How much more of cotton and wheat and other agricultural products has it enabled our farmers to make each year, and how much increased price has it brought them for such products? How has it benefited the man who stands behind the counter, or in the office, or those who toil in the workshops and in the fields? How has it been such a great blessing to the country that the sweat of an unborn generation should be mortgaged to pay for the privilege of its enjoyment?

Conceding these bond issues to be in accordance with law and in obedience to law, how long a time must be required before Congress will, in the performance of a duty, sweep such a law from the statute book?

Respecting most profoundly the opinions of the distinguished men who think otherwise, for myself I am most unhesitatingly of the opinion that there is no authority in the present law for the issuance of these bonds. However this may be, if the law authorizes the continuous and enormous increase of the public debt simply to maintain the gold standard it ought to be repealed. If the law does not authorize it, but is susceptible of a construction by which the power is claimed under it, there is none the less reason why it should be repealed.

I do not forget that it is urged by many that these bonds have been in fact issued to make good the deficiency in the revenue. I will not stop to discuss what disposition has been made of the proceeds of the sale of the one hundred and sixty-two millions of bonds, or the legality of such disposition. Be this as it may, the fact can not be successfully controverted that but for the purpose of maintaining gold payments these bonds would not have been issued, nor would this additional one hundred millions be issued next month.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly; I have no objection to an interruption.

Mr. HILL. I am very much interested in the Senator's very able speech, and wish to ask him a question for information simply.

Mr. BACON. I shall be glad to give any information I can to the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. I ask whether it is quite fair to charge to the maintenance of the gold standard the whole amount of the bond issues. For instance, the greenbacks will have to be redeemed in something—either gold or silver—unless they are wholly irredeemable, and therefore is there not to be charged to the maintenance of the gold standard simply the difference between the gold and silver, whatever that difference may be?

Mr. BACON. I think not, and for the simple reason I shall state. There is in the Treasury now, and there was in the Treasury at the time of each of these successive issues, more than sufficient of that which the law in plain terms says is the legal-tender coin of this country to pay the amount of the greenbacks when presented, if it had been in accordance with the view of the Administration to use the money for that purpose.

Mr. PEFFER. Even more than enough of the gold.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, I wish simply to say that the bullion not used still belongs to the Government. I thought the point you were making was that it would make an additional debt. If you simply have a fund on hand and do not use it, it is merely substituting one fund for another, is it not?

Mr. BACON. It is true, as the Senator from New York says, that the money is still on hand; but it is the same as if a man had his money locked in a safe and allowed it to remain locked up while he went out and contracted an interest-bearing debt instead of using the money that was in his safe.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, that, of course, is one way of stating it. Therefore it would be a mere question of interest.

Mr. BACON. That may be the ultimate result, but if the Senator from New York will follow his argument to its legitimate conclusion I shall be most happy. The present construction of the law is that the money which is still in the Treasury, and which I say respectfully, differing of course from those who think otherwise, ought to be devoted to that purpose——

Mr. LINDSAY. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BACON. Let me complete the sentence, when I shall be most happy to hear the Senator from Kentucky. I say that money is still there. According to the present construction it will remain there. If it remains there it is the same as if it were not there at all; it is dead. The effect is to increase the debt and place that upon the people, when its creation could have been avoided by the use of this money.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Kentucky has asked leave to interrupt me, but I shall be most happy to hear the Senator from New York.

Mr. HILL. We are not so far apart possibly upon that question; but would it not be a more accurate statement to say that this indebtedness is incurred to maintain a paper currency, namely, a greenback currency?

Mr. BACON. I think not, Mr. President. There is no doubt that the greenback currency is a charge upon the Treasury, a demand charge. There is lawful money, money made lawful by the statute of the United States, in the Treasury sufficient for the payment of this demand debt when presented. Therefore, if that were used it would not necessitate the contraction of an additional debt. It is, however, not used for that purpose, but, on the contrary, it is held to be a necessity to pay the greenbacks in a certain coin, to wit, the gold coin, and if it were not for that necessity the debt would not be contracted. Now I shall be most happy to do what I can to answer the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LINDSAY. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the gold that has been bought has been bought for the purpose of meeting demands made upon the Treasury by the holders either of greenbacks or of notes issued in payment of bullion under the Sherman Act.

Mr. BACON. Exactly.

Mr. LINDSAY. Those greenbacks are payable in either gold or silver.

Mr. BACON. Yes, under the law.

Mr. LINDSAY. And not resolvable in other greenbacks.

Mr. BACON. Most undoubtedly not.

Mr. LINDSAY. The resumption act provides that the money to be used for resumption shall be acquired by the sale of bonds or else be taken out of the surplus revenues of the Treasury.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. LINDSAY. Now, during the last two years, the present Administration taking the Treasury with over $3,000,000 of deficit, has there been any free silver in the Treasury that could have been used for the redemption of the greenbacks?

Mr. BACON. I will answer the distinguished Senator from Kentucky in the words of the President of the United States, which have been read at the desk, that the purpose of the issuing of the bonds was for the maintenance of the gold standard. I do not desire to say anything which shall be disrespectful to the Administration. Like the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], it is with the greatest reluctance that I express any difference. But I do say that my conviction is very strong that so long as the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, who in the issuance of bonds are but the agency of Congress, have within their control legal funds for the payment of the demand obligations, it is beyond the authority of law to create additional obligations for the purpose of raising additional money.

Mr. LINDSAY. The question I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia is, whether there has been at any time since the present Administration commenced free silver in the Treasury which could have been utilized for the redemption of greenbacks?

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to answer that question?

Mr. BACON. I shall be most happy to hear the Senator from Nevada. Go ahead.

Mr. STEWART. Ever since the present Administration came in there has been over $50,000,000 of silver bullion, which the law made it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to coin, over and above all that is pledged for paper issue, whether silver certificates or Treasury notes. That $50,000,000 would have been sufficient for all the redemption which would have been required for the next fifty years, because there is no object in asking for the redemption of greenbacks except for gold for speculative purposes. The people have never asked for one dollar. It has been the duty of the Administration to have $50,000,000 there. Furthermore, that having been made the duty of the President by law, the last Congress undertook to impress that duty on him, and both Houses passed an act making it mandatory for him to coin it. The President vetoed the bill. So he is not laboring very assiduously to get silver coined for the purpose of redeeming Treasury notes and greenbacks. It is because the gold gamblers do not want that, but they want gold. He says in his message that the whole object of selling bonds is to buy gold to sustain the gold standard, and for no other purpose; that we have revenue enough.

Mr. BACON. There is still another answer which is entirely sufficient to my mind—it may be an illogical one—which I submit to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. It is the duty of the Executive as far as possible to discharge the indebtedness of the Government without contracting an interest-bearing debt. Am I not correct in that?

Mr. LINDSAY. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Suppose there is $100,000,000 of greenbacks in the Treasury and no silver, I agree with the distinguished Senator from Kentucky that those greenbacks can not be used to redeem other greenbacks when they are presented; but does any man question the ability of the Executive to take that $100,000,000 of Treasury notes and any day he wants, if that much silver is on the market, buy it and use that which is the legal coin for the purpose of redeeming the demand obligations of the Government? If there were $50,000,000, say, of greenbacks in the Treasury, and $50,000,000 of greenbacks were presented for payment, would it be proper for the Executive to decline to take the $50,000,000 of greenbacks and go on the street and get $50,000,000 of silver, which he knows he can get upon the mere intimation of a desire for it, and to issue an interest-bearing bond for the purpose of raising money which could be gotten without the contraction of any such interest-bearing debt?

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator in reply if there has been any time when silver dollars could have been bought on the market during the present Administration cheaper than gold dollars could have been bought?

Mr. BACON. I think possibly that could not have been done; but I do think the Senator will say that there has never been a time, except in 1893, when there was such a severe stringency, when anybody could fail to get silver in exchange for greenbacks, if he desired to do so. Certainly the power of this great Government could accomplish it; and if so, I respectfully submit in all deference——

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Kentucky will look at the reports that come every day to our tables, he will find that there has been no time when the Government did not have enough silver to make a tender if it had designed to use silver. On the 24th instant the Government had $12,000,000 of silver certificates lying in the Treasury. Of course that means that the Government has $12,000,000 of silver at its disposal if it chooses to use them.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator from Colorado if that represented surplus revenue, and if any other money can be used for redemption except surplus revenue?

Mr. TELLER. It represented nothing of the kind. It simply represented so much silver in the Treasury independent of the silver that is held to redeem the Treasury notes, for which it is never used.

Mr. BACON. Whatever might be true of the former bond issues, it is certainly not true that there is now any lack of Treasury notes and greenbacks in the Treasury for the purpose of making the exchange which I suggest. There are now, according to the report which the distinguished Senator from Colorado has alluded to, about $100,000,000 of greenbacks and Treasury notes in the Treasury, besides the money to which the distinguished Senator from Nevada has made allusion, and which it was within the power of the Administration to have put into coin under the law now existing.

We not only have the authority of the President in the extract which I had read for the statement that the bonds already issued were issued solely for the purpose of maintaining gold payments, but the additional statement by him that "the Secretary of the Treasury had no authority whatever to issue bonds to increase the ordinary revenues or pay current expenses." There can be no possible contention that the $100,000,000 of bonds to be issued next month are to supply any deficiency, because we now have $180,000,000 surplus in the Treasury. So that I repeat, this $162,000,000 of bonds already issued and the additional $100,000,000 to be issued within a few days constitute a direct money payment of $262,000,000 for the privilege of maintaining the single gold standard, not one dollar of which would have been paid if we were in practice, as well as in law, on a bimetallic basis, paying out at the option of the Government either gold or silver upon all demands presented. It is the money payment the people of the whole country are forced to make to prevent a return to bimetallism and to maintain the single gold standard, whether they wish it or no. It is well for Senators to count the cost to the people of their several States of this debt which has been incurred in order that silver shall remain demonetized.

The proportion of this indebtedness which falls upon the people of Georgia is not less than $8,000,000, and the annual interest which must be paid by the people of that State on this portion of the debt is more than $300,000. While this principal and interest are to be paid by them through indirect taxation, it is none the less to be actually paid by their money. The miasma which floats in the air is none the less poisonous because unseen, and this principal of $8,000,000 and this annual interest thereon of over $300,000 are just as certain to be paid in money by the people of my State as if the taxgatherer called at the door of each citizen and demanded and received from him his part of this immense payment as the price for the privilege of remaining for two years on the gold basis. We can not close our eyes to the fact that under existing law, if the same construction shall continue to be put upon it, the experience of the past two years is to be repeated again and again, and bond issue after bond issue is to be made, piling up debt upon debt to maintain the gold standard.

True the advocates of increased tariff rates contend that when such increased tariff shall bring a greater revenue into the Treasury the flow of gold from the Treasury will cease. However full our Treasury may be, the demand for gold to go to England will not cease so long as we are due her each year $150,000,000 in interest on debts and in dividends on investments her people have in America, and so long as the greenbacks and Treasury notes are outstanding and are recognized as payable at the Treasury in gold at the option of the holders, so long will those desiring gold go to the Treasury of the United States as the most convenient place to get it. Increased revenue can prevent it in one way only, and that way is found in such an abundance of revenue as will enable the Government, by continuing to issue bonds, to lock up all the greenbacks and Treasury notes in the Treasury.

If it can accomplish that, which is practical contraction of the currency to the extent of $500,000,000, it can stop the use of greenbacks and Treasury notes for the purpose of drawing gold out of the Treasury.

I presume there are very few Senators on either side of the Chamber who would favor any system which would result in such violent contraction of the currency of the country.

There is another way, and in my opinion the proper way, to stop the flow of gold from the Treasury and to entirely destroy the necessity or excuse for the issue of bonds. That way is for the Government, in reply to everyone who presents a demand for payment at the Treasury, to say as follows:

> The law makes both gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts, both public and private. This Government, under the law, receives either gold or silver from its debtors, at the option of its debtors, and this Government will pay to you as its creditor either gold or silver as may be most convenient for it to do.

That such position is strictly in accordance with the laws of the United States I have no doubt. I am equally assured in my convictions that if this position had been taken by the Secretary of the Treasury in 1893 the troubles which have afflicted the Treasury would have been averted. The issue of $262,000,000 of bonds in two years would have been made unnecessary by simply recognizing silver as lawful money in the payment of the demand obligations of the Government. And I confidently predict that, with existing laws, unless silver legal-tender coin is recognized, and used as well as gold, at the option of the Government, as lawful money in the payment of obligations, there will necessarily be an annual issuance of over $100,000,000 of bonds to procure gold with which to maintain gold payments, and that such will be the result whether the revenues of the Government be great or small.

Mr. President, I can not doubt that the people will compel the remedy whenever they fully understand and realize the enormity of the cost at which the gold standard is maintained. I must believe their eyes will be opened to the truth when they learn that in a State of the population and business of Georgia, because the Government does not use silver as standard money, there is to be added each year the amount of four millions or more of dollars as the proportion of the increasing debt to be paid by the people of that State, and amounts in like proportion by the people of other States, according to their population and consumption of articles upon which revenue is raised. This issue may be beclouded, the people may be deceived and misled to their own hurt; nevertheless, the truth will ultimately be known to them that to maintain a gold standard there is not only loss of untold wealth in the paralysis of enterprise and in the stagnation of business, but that hundreds of millions of indebtedness must be directly incurred, every dollar of which they must ultimately pay in money.

Mr. President, there is another effect in the practical operation of this effort to maintain the single gold standard which is entitled to the serious consideration of Senators and of the country at large. There is now in the Treasury in round numbers $180,000,000 surplus. Of course that includes the $100,000,000 held for redemption, but there is in the Treasury to-day, I should say, $180,000,000, or, speaking with more accuracy, about $177,000,000 of money of all kinds; and recognizing that $100,000,000 of that is held as redemption money, there is an absolute surplus in the Treasury to-day of $77,000,000. When the $100,000,000 bonds are sold next month there will be in the Treasury $280,000,000 or more, of which amount about one hundred millions will be greenbacks and Treasury notes; and if the revenues are hereafter equal to the expenditures, as is anticipated by the Secretary of the Treasury, this amount of $280,000,000 will remain locked up in the Treasury. There will be nothing for which to pay it out, the revenues being equal to the expenses of the Government.

The only possibility of any device, so far as I know, by which it can be paid out is by the purchase of bonds, which would, of course, necessitate their purchase at a very high premium and at a very rapidly increasing premium. This would result in the bonds sold at a low premium being exchanged for bonds purchased at a very high premium, and there would be an unnecessary increase of debt upon the people. The difference between the two rates would be but a temporary relief, because as soon as the Treasury notes were out of the Treasury these persons would again have an opportunity of presenting them for payment, and the same process would be gone through with again.

The only change in the $280,000,000 thus locked up in the Treasury will be that a large part of so much of it as is gold, say $100,000,000, will, in the course of a year, be drawn out and its place taken by an equal amount of greenbacks or Treasury notes. As soon as this occurs, $100,000,000 more of bonds are to be sold and the proceeds in gold again put into the Treasury. This will increase the amount locked up in the Treasury to $380,000,000, of which about two hundred millions or more will be in greenbacks or Treasury notes.

Mr. HILL. Assuming, as I think the Senator does, that hereafter the receipts of the Government will be equal to the expenditures, would not the one hundred extra millions still be in the Treasury subject to be exchanged for gold?

Mr. BACON. Greenbacks for gold?

Mr. HILL. Yes.

Mr. BACON. If it is possible to exchange greenbacks for gold, why is it that bonds are issued?

Mr. HILL. The Senator will understand that if we have plenty of money we can to some extent do that very thing now, can we not?

Mr. BACON. It seems not. There is in the Treasury $177,000,000 of money. It is not in gold. As the Senator says, if you have the money you can make some arrangement. If that is true, the bonds ought not to be issued, and this $177,000,000, $100,000,000 of which is set apart for the redemption fund, ought to be used for the purpose, if it can be done, of getting gold without the issuing of bonds bearing interest for that purpose.

Mr. HILL. The Senator comes right back to the question of a deficiency. Then assume that there had been no deficiency of receipts over expenditures for the last year and a half, and there would then be in the Treasury something like one hundred and some odd million dollars more than now, would there not? Would not that money still be on hand? And if the parity of gold and silver is maintained, would it not maintain the gold? To that extent is not the argument of the Senator something like this——

Mr. BACON. The situation which the Senator supposes is the exact present situation. There is in the Treasury, according to the Treasury reports, over $177,000,000 of money, made up of gold and silver and greenbacks.

Mr. HILL. And so long as that remains unused for the current expenses of the Government the present situation will be maintained.

Mr. BACON. That money is there, and it is not being used. Each day shows practically a maintenance, in spite of the expenditures, of about the same amount of money in the Treasury, and so far from what the Senator from New York says being true, in the presence of the fact that there is $177,000,000 in the Treasury, we are about to have another issue of $100,000,000 of bonds. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the hypothetical case of the Senator from New York is answered by the present situation.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. I have not got through. I only deferred to the Senator because he had sought to interrupt me and I was willing to be interrupted.

Mr. HILL. I will ask the Senator, assuming now that the receipts are going to meet the expenditures, and assuming that gold and silver are to remain substantially at a parity for the next six months, has the Government lost anything or will it lose anything? Will there be any occasion for any further borrowing of money?

Mr. BACON. As long as the greenbacks are out and as long as the Executive takes the position that he must pay gold whenever they are presented, it only depends on whether these gentlemen will present greenbacks or not.

Mr. HILL. We shall have nearly half of the first lot of greenbacks in the Treasury locked up.

Mr. BACON. Exactly. That is what I am saying.

Mr. HILL. And there will be no occasion to get them out of the Treasury unless for some purpose of expenditure, or to exchange them for coin.

Mr. BACON. There will be nôt only no occasion, but no possibility of getting them out of the Treasury. That is exactly the point I am on. I am speaking of the fact that the natural, necessary consequence of the enforcement of the present law as it is at present construed, if we have a sufficiency of revenue, is to lock up in the Treasury all the greenbacks, all the Treasury notes, and all the paper currency issued by the Government. The distinguished Senator from New York asks me whether or not, if there is a deficiency of revenue, this will occur. I say that that is the only condition under which it will occur. If there is a deficiency of revenue, of course money will be paid out; but if there is a sufficiency of revenue which meets all demands, and the money is in the Treasury, there is no way to get it out, no way to unlock it. Do we not agree on that?

Mr. HILL. I think we do; not entirely, but substantially.

Mr. BACON. That is the point I am on.

Mr. HILL. I think the Senator hardly understood the point of my suggestion.

Mr. BACON. I think the distinguished Senator from New York certainly did not understand the proposition I made at the time he first interrupted me, because that was the exact proposition. I certainly could not have made any mistake in the expression of it. The exact proposition I made was, if the future revenues of the Government equaled the expenditures, that the necessary consequence of the issuing of bonds for the purpose of getting gold every time the gold reserve was depleted, and taking that gold and redeeming Treasury notes with it, would be to put that much additional in the Treasury, to remain there, and which could not possibly be gotten out unless the Government used it for the purpose of purchasing bonds, and if it were used for the purpose of purchasing bonds, that much of greenbacks would be again put upon the market, and those greenbacks would again be brought back to the Treasury and the same process gone through with again. So the result would be that the greenbacks and Treasury notes would be locked up in the Treasury under this system.

Mr. HILL. We come back to the point where we started, and that is, that all the Government loses in the matter is the interest.

Mr. BACON. It may be, Mr. President, that the Government books will balance, but does the distinguished Senator from New York dispute the fact that with the $500,000,000 of greenbacks and Treasury notes we lock up in the Treasury there would not be a contraction of the circulating medium of the country to the extent of $500,000,000? That is the point I am on now.

Mr. HILL. Did the Senator state that?

Mr. BACON. Certainly. I have stated it, and I am sure the distinguished Senator from New York was not listening, or he would certainly have understood it. I was speaking of the effect, not of increasing the indebtedness, but the effect of locking up the currency in the Treasury. That was the point I was on at the time.

The same process will be repeated the succeeding year, and the amount of greenbacks and Treasury notes locked up then will be three hundred millions. It may be that the locking up of the greenbacks and Treasury notes may not proceed as rapidly as I have suggested. But, although it may proceed more slowly, there can be no successful answer to the proposition that with receipts from revenues equal to expenditures, if the Government persists in ignoring silver as lawful money for the payment of its demand obligations, and continues to redeem such obligations only in gold, the continued issuance of bonds to replenish the gold thus paid out will necessarily at each succeeding operation lock into the Treasury an amount of greenbacks and Treasury notes equal to the amount of gold thus withdrawn. I understand that to be the proposition of the Senator from New York, and I am glad we agree on it.

If the law remains as at present and is acted on as at present by this and succeeding Administrations, it is but a question of time when the entire outstanding issue of greenbacks and Treasury notes, aggregating about $500,000,000, will be finally locked up in the Treasury, contracting the currency to that amount. While it may not proceed so rapidly, it is nevertheless possible for it to proceed more rapidly. If the Secretary of the Treasury continues to pay gold alone on the demand obligations of the Government, and will each time promptly issue bonds to restore the gold in the Treasury as often as the gold reserve is reduced to a low limit, it is entirely within the power of the great financial syndicates of the day to lock up in the Treasury in one year the entire five hundred millions of greenbacks and Treasury notes. One hundred millions is all the capital which would be required to accomplish it. It is not to be anticipated that such a drastic measure will be undertaken, but it is beyond successful dispute that with, as there should and probably will be, a revenue equal to expenditures the process of locking up the greenbacks and Treasury notes will steadily go on, and the currency be contracted in the same proportion.

The contention that the gold will not be drawn from the Treasury when the revenues are adequate and there is no deficiency is not sustained by experience. In 1892, when there was a surplus of revenue, there was drawn from the Treasury in gold $36,250,560, and over $32,000,000 of this amount was drawn out in the last six months of that year. Other influences evidently induce the withdrawal of gold from the Treasury, influences which will continue after the deficiency in the revenue shall have disappeared. One of these continuing influences is readily found in the $150,000,000 which must be remitted every year to Europe in payment of interest and dividends; and still another influence in the constant struggle of the European governments to increase their stock of gold. The withdrawal of over $100,000,000 in gold from the Treasury in the year 1895 was not to equalize the balance in trade, for in that year our merchandise exports exceeded our merchandise imports by more than $23,000,000.

Mr. President, in the year 1894, when there was a very large withdrawal of gold from the Treasury—I am not prepared to say how much, because I failed to get the exact figures, but certainly there was a very large withdrawal of gold from the Treasury that year—the excess of exports from this country over imports to it was $237,145,194. That plainly shows that the withdrawal of gold from the Treasury is not to be attributed solely to the failure of our country to export as much as it imports, because when it exports in greater quantity the gold is still withdrawn from the Treasury.

With good reason, then, to anticipate continued withdrawals of gold from the Treasury, the locking up of the greenbacks and the Treasury notes must necessarily follow under existing laws and practices.

Neither of the great political parties favors the retirement of the greenbacks without other currency substituted in lieu thereof. Neither of the parties would dare go before the country on such an issue. But in what manner will they be less responsible if they refuse to enact the only legislation which can prevent the greenbacks from being either in whole or in part locked up in the Treasury and practically retired from circulation? If in the course of a few years and in the regular progression of events as they are now occurring the greenbacks are thus finally locked up, the result will be the increased bonded debt of $500,000,000 and the retirement of that amount of currency from circulation—another practical presentation to the people in tangible shape of the fearful cost to which they will have been subjected, solely to insure the continued demonetization of silver and to maintain the gold standard. This great disaster can certainly be averted by simply restoring silver as standard money and making it the duty of officers of the Government to recognize it as such and to pay to the holders of demand obligations either gold or silver, at the option of the Government, as may be most convenient. No one can doubt that the effect would be instantaneous in stopping the withdrawal of gold from the Treasury and in putting an end to this piling up of debt on the people by the continued issuance of bonds to maintain the single gold standard.

It is said by those who favor gold monometallism that to do so would drive all gold out of the country, would put us upon a silver monometallic basis, and cause us to part company with all the enlightened and progressive nations of the world. However plausible these objections may be in theory, they are all completely overthrown by the fact that France pursues exactly this plan, and in years of its practical operation there have been none of these results. As I have previously stated, France pays out to her creditors at her option either gold or silver, and in the exercise of that option she pays out little or no gold. Anyone who wishes any large amount of gold can only get it from the Bank of France by paying a premium for it as he would buy exchange. This refusal to pay gold at the option of the creditors has not debarred France from the company of all the enlightened and progressive nations of the world. On the contrary, she continues to be herself one of the recognized leaders among the enlightened and progressive nations of the world. Nor does such refusal to pay gold have any influence to drive gold out of the country. This is shown by the fact that in addition to more than $300,000,000 of gold held by the Bank of France there is about four hundred millions of gold in France outside of the Bank of France. I am speaking here in dollars, not in francs.

With this large amount of gold, France has in active circulation $700,000,000 of silver, $650,000,000 of which is, in practice as well as in name, full legal-tender standard money. This $650,000,000 of legal-tender coin is full standard money in the fact that it is a standard of value by and through its own strength. It in no manner depends upon gold payments to sustain it. It is neither directly nor indirectly, by law or practice, redeemable in gold. On the contrary, it stands on an exact equality with gold, in the hands of either the Government or of the citizen, in the payment of all debts, public or private. I have seen it stated in the gold-standard publications in this country that France has $800,000,000 of primary gold coin and $700,000,000 of secondary silver coin. This is not correct. On the contrary, $650,000,000 of her silver is in every sense as strictly primary standard money as is her gold coin. The consequence is that, with a population of 39,000,000, she has $1,450,000,000 of standard coin, all of which is money of ultimate redemption. The $650,000,000 of silver is no burden upon the gold. On the contrary, to its full amount it assists the gold in bearing the burden of money of final redemption, and actually protects the gold from being drained from the country.

The wide difference between this and the situation in the United States is this: With a population of 70,000,000, we have nominally, say, $650,000,000 in gold and $500,000,000 of silver. This silver, although by law a legal tender, and intended as standard money, is by the practice of the Government not standard money. By the Government refusing to exercise the option to pay silver as well as gold to its creditors, the silver coinage is discredited, and becomes in effect only representative or token money. It does not to the extent of its amount assist the gold in bearing the burden of money of final payment. On the contrary, it adds to the burden in this regard resting upon the gold supply, for by the act of discrediting the silver coin we are practically upon the single gold standard, and that in effect bears alone all the burden. Being thus discredited and its assistance refused and discarded, the silver coinage of the country to the immense extent of $500,000,000 is no more protection to the gold in preventing its being drained from the Treasury than are the notes of the national banks.

From this simple difference between the two countries, that in France the Government exercises the option whether, according to its convenience, it will pay gold or silver to its creditors, and that on the contrary in the United States the Government permits its creditors to exercise their option whether they will demand and receive either gold or silver, follow the widely differing results and conditions in the two countries. France, with $800,000,000 of gold and $650,000,000 of standard silver, has $1,450,000,000 of coin which is standard money of final redemption. The United States, with nearly double the population, having $650,000,000 of gold and $500,000,000 of silver, has only $650,000,000 of coin which is full standard money of final redemption. France has about $40 per capita of coin standard money. The United States, by practically limiting it to gold, in effect has about $9 per capita of coin which is standard money of final payment. France has ample money for the industries of her people, and keeps all of her gold coin at home without piling up debt to enable her to do so. The United States is, by a contracted and still further contracting volume of standard money of final payment, strangling the industries of the country, and loading the people with an ever-increasing debt in the vain effort to keep gold in the country.

It is a most interesting and instructive fact that the French 5-franc piece is in current business on an absolute parity with gold, although its bullion value is only 50 per cent of its coin value, and although there is no law in France and no practice in France by which the silver coin is either directly or indirectly redeemable in gold, and although the Government in no manner undertakes to keep the silver coin on a parity with the gold coin. Ask a French financier the explanation of this remarkable fact and he will tell you that it is because the silver coin is good for the payment of all debts, public and private, and the further fact that the option to use it equally with gold is constantly exercised by the Government and by the citizens in the payment of all debts due by either to the other. Say to him in reply that that is quite simple as regards debts due within the territory of France, but ask him further how it is that the interest coupon on a French rente (or bond) will command par in gold in single gold standard England, when that same interest coupon when presented for payment will only command silver in France. He will answer that it is because the holder of that interest coupon, while it probably will be only paid in silver, can convert that silver into goods which, at the same price, are worth gold in England. What is true of the interest coupon which can only command silver when carried to France would be equally true of the silver 5-franc piece, less only the cost of transportation and ordinary exchange, if it should be carried to England.

Mr. President, time will not permit me to pursue this branch of the argument. But the fact of the parity of silver coins with gold coins in France under the circumstances mentioned are exceedingly suggestive of the ability of this growing country, with its immense products more than twice as great as that of either France or Germany, and 25 per cent greater than that of Great Britain, to safely use a corresponding per capita volume of silver coin, not as secondary or token money, but as standard money of final payment. The essential thing to accomplish it is that the Government as well as the people should ridgidly exercise the option to use either gold or silver in the payment of all debts, public and private, and that the option to the public or private creditor to demand and receive gold should be denied to him.

The reply will be made by the opponents of free coinage that France has stopped free coinage and that this remarkable silver and gold parity is under limited coinage. This is true, but the fact can give no possible support to the gold monometallists or to those who regard the question of bimetallism as settled in this country, who refuse to consent to any remedy proposed by others and fail themselves to propose any. As I have said, the great object to be attained is the restoration of bimetallism—not that pretended bimetallism where, while there are coins of both metals, the gold coin is the standard and the silver coin only a secondary, representative token, but real bimetallism, where the silver and the gold coins are each primary standard money. The French system proves incontestibly that in the hands of those who are really friendly to silver such real bimetallism can exist with limited coinage. But the essential element of true bimetallism under limited coinage, and without which it can not exist, is that the coin of the metal thus limited shall be an unlimited legal tender, which the Government and the citizen must fully recognize as such in exercising, at its will and convenience, the option of paying in the settlement of all debts.

Good faith and sound finance will always require the exercise of such option in favor of either metal to prevent the undue withdrawal of the other. The French system of limited coinage gives to the people of France about $18 per capita of legal-tender standard silver money. If our legal-tender silver coinage were authorized to the same per capita amount it would be about $1,260,000,000, a larger amount than would be coined at the mints by free coinage in the next ten years, even allowing for the $500,000,000 already coined. But neither this amount of silver coinage nor any other amount would bring the needed relief which can alone be found in true bimetallism, unless it was in practice as well as in name standard money. There is no benefit in coining token money except for small change. Token money had just as well be made at the printing office as at the mint, and is just as potential, and just as powerless, for the accomplishment of good in the one case as in the other.

Personally I am in favor of unlimited coinage of silver, not as a sentiment and not in deference to a popular cry. Upon what I think to be sound reason I believe in unlimited coinage as the best means to an end, viz, true bimetallism. There are many arguments in favor of it, but the controlling reason is this: The best form of bimetallism will undoubtedly be found where the bullion value is the same as the coin value. It is the only safe and permanent basis for bimetallism. This equality of bullion and coin value will never exist under limited coinage. That portion of silver which is denied coinage will, as the surplus, always fix the bullion price. As that surplus can only be used for the baser purposes of the arts, its price will always be less than the coin value. Besides this, a money metal which is denied right of coinage can not hold its proper place in the public estimate as the material for standard coin, clothed with the power of final payment.

I do not favor a depreciated silver dollar, nor does any other true bimetallist, and I believe the surest way to secure the parity of the silver dollar with the gold dollar is to give it the franchise of unlimited coinage.

The basis of the argument against unlimited coinage is the alleged danger that with our mints open we would be flooded with the silver of the world. How could this occur? Whenever the value of silver rose here because of unlimited coinage, it would rise correspondingly in every market in the world. The world has no silver to spare to us. On the contrary, the remainder of the world needs more than is made outside of the United States. The remainder of the world would not leave us all of our own product for our own mints. The proof of this is incontestibly shown in the fact that there has never been a single year since 1864 when our exports of silver did not largely exceed our imports, showing that the product of silver outside of the United States is not sufficient for the remainder of the world's requirements. In one year the excess of exports of silver over imports exceeded $37,000,000, and even when the coinage under the Bland-Allison Act was in full blast there was one year when the excess of exports of silver over imports was more than $18,000,000 and another year when such excess of exports was more than $17,000,000.

There is great misapprehension as to the world's supply of silver and as to the world's annual product of silver. There has been such an outcry about the great production of silver that many suppose that the supply is practically limitless. This is very far from the truth. I can not lay my hand at this moment on the statements of the product for 1893 and 1894, which I assume was some greater than in previous years. But, taking the report ending with 1892, we have the following significant statements of the product of silver and of the relative products of silver and of gold:

According to official reports, in the one hundred years ended in the year 1892 there was nearly twice as much gold produced in America as there was of silver. The gold produced was $1,937,881,769, and the silver produced was $1,146,869,000.

In the same period, from 1792 to 1892, taking the production of the whole world, there was produced $550,000,000 more of gold than of silver. The figures are: Gold, $5,633,908,000, and silver, $5,077,961,000.

According to the official reports of the United States Government of the product of silver in 1892, if every ounce of silver produced in the United States in that year were coined, leaving none for the arts or for export, it would only make a very small fraction more than $1 per capita to the people of the United States. And yet the product of that year was greater than it had ever been in any previous year excepting one.

According to the same report of the product of silver in the whole world for that year, if every ounce produced that year in the whole world were brought to America and coined, leaving not an ounce for the arts or for coinage by other nations, such entire product of silver of the whole world for that year, would, when coined, make considerably less than $3 per capita to the people of the United States. The total amount produced in the world in 1892, was $196,605,000, and that was a larger annual world's product of silver than there had ever been in the hundred preceding years.

Although somewhat out of its order in this place, I can not forbear, before leaving the question of free coinage, to notice briefly one argument against it, which is drawn from the comparison between the Mexican silver dollar and the American silver dollar. The same argument was repeated by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] who preceded me. It is a stock argument with many, based on the fact that an American silver dollar bearing the stamp of a government which prohibits free coinage is worth two Mexican silver dollars stamped by a government where there is free coinage, although the latter has more silver in it than the former. Well, what does that prove? What is true of the American silver dollar is true of the American paper dollar. The American paper dollar is also worth two Mexican silver dollars, and the fact simply proves that neither the American silver dollar nor the American paper dollar is in fact a standard dollar, but that each is only a token dollar, a representative of the American gold dollar, which is so artificially appreciated in value that American products must be sold in it at half their former value.

Mr. President, as a contribution to the history of this struggle in this country between gold monometallism and bimetallism, I will attach as an appendix to my remarks a copy of a circular which I have here for the inspection of Senators who wish to see it, or to be read if anybody desires it. It is a copy of a circular recently issued by the so-called "committee on sound currency" of the Reform Club of New York.

I regret that time will not permit me to comment on this effort of the single gold standard advocates to blind the plain people of the country to their true interest and induce them to place the fetters on their own limbs. It may be interesting to them to note how patent outsides and plate matter have been furnished, in the language of this committee, to "papers the subscribers of which are in the main readers of no other periodicals." It may open the eyes of these people as to the motives of these advocates of the single gold standard when they read in this report that this single committee distributed among them through newspapers and otherwise 9,700,000 documents, and has expended in that time $54,403.74 in the disinterested work of trying to convert them to a financial system which will make them poor while it enriches their benefactors.

Nor, Mr. President, are some of the advocates of the gold standard, who disguise themselves under the name of sound-money men, content to resort to only argument and persuasion. In the arrogance of their power and in their impatience that any should oppose them, they openly announce their purpose to control the elections of Senators in other States, so that those chosen may be in accord with their interests. In a recent issue of one of the leading newspapers in New York there appeared a publication looking to the overthrow of 24 United States Senators by the exercise of the power and influence of the gold-standard advocates in other States. Among those named who are destined to the sacrifice is my humble self. I will ask the Secretary to read the extract from this article which I send to the desk.

Mr. HILL. From what paper is the extract taken?

Mr. BACON. It is stated at the head of the paper that it is from the New York Sun, published on the 28th day of December last.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLANCHARD in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Extract from the New York Sun, December 28, 1895.]

The bankers and merchants of New York City having extensive business relations with the bankers and merchants of other States believe that the time has come when at least 24 United States Senators should be called to account by their constituents for misrepresenting them in matters of financial legislation at Washington. Of these 24 Senators, 16 were elected as Democrats and 8 as Republicans.

The New York business men said they believed that the constituents of the 24 Senators who have joined hands with the silver men should, either through the legislatures of the States they represent, or through the boards of trade and the chambers of commerce in the cities of these States, demand of these 24 that they cease misrepresenting them in matters of financial legislation at Washington and come out hearty and strong for sound money. It is declared that some such line of action should be adopted at once in order to bring these 24 Senators to their senses, and it is even said that this must be done if the merchants and others represented by these 24 men are to be considered in the matter of credits with New York and Eastern merchants generally. The false light in which these 24 Senators have put the business men of their States has deterred Eastern manufacturers and business men from extending lines of credit, even though they are convinced that these Senators do not rightly represent their constituents.

Mr. BACON. I will say, in justice to the newspaper from which that article is copied, that it does not appear on the editorial page, nor does it appear as a dispatch, but is simply published without headline or signature. It covers a column and a half, and, of course, it is therefore impracticable for me to burden the RECORD with the insertion of the article in its full extent; but I have given the date of it, and any Senator can see the full article in which the names of the 24 Senators are given who are to be controlled by the withholding of credit by New York merchants. I present this remarkable utterance without further comment than that it is a most significant indication of the absolute domination of the entire Government in all of its branches to which the gold power evidently aspires.

Mr. President, the gravity of the situation is not to be put aside with the suggestion, as recently made in this Chamber, that this is a moot question and an idle academic discussion. It is a situation which, if the law remains unchanged, involves the prospect of a continually increasing bonded debt, the steady decrease in the per capita standard coin, and the practical retirement of the greenbacks and Treasury notes. Are Senators who oppose the measure reported by the Finance Committee prepared in view of this situation to say they are content for the law to remain as it is, and that they have no remedy which they favor?

In the presence of the insufficiency of gold the scramble among the nations for gold will continue. With this as a fact, our financial troubles must continue so long as we remain on a gold basis and have outstanding the greenbacks and the Treasury notes. I believe the remedy is in getting entirely off the gold basis, and on the true bimetallic basis, and at the same time retiring all paper currency of the Government. I say, at the same time, because all idea of retiring the greenbacks and Treasury notes may as well, in my opinion, be dismissed, unless in the same law there is provision for a return to true bimetallism, involving as a necessary feature the unlimited coinage of silver.

As an original proposition I would be opposed to greenbacks or any other form of Government paper currency, but as such currency now exists to the amount of $500,000,000, I am opposed to any retirement of the same by any means, direct or indirect, until by the same law provision is made for a return to a hard money, bimetallic currency. I believe in hard money and in a sufficient supply of it—a supply which it is impossible for gold alone to furnish. I do not believe that the Government should issue any form of currency excepting only the coin which is stamped at the mints. I regard Government paper currency as a foe to true bimetallism; and an adequate supply of standard coin is none the less the enemy of such paper currency. Whenever those who wish to retire greenbacks and Treasury notes will meet us on this basis, it is probable that a plan can be devised which will relieve the Government and the people from the present financial ills. There is no reason in sound finance why the entire proper per capita supply of currency in the country should not consist in standard coin of both gold and silver, and there is no reason to anticipate that the unlimited coinage of silver would, when added to the gold coinage, swell the supply beyond this amount. The effort to restrict standard money of final redemption to gold alone, and also to retire the Government paper currency, must certainly fail.

The danger is that the single gold-standard advocates, who boastfully call themselves "sound money" men, in their efforts to restrict the coinage of standard money to gold, may place in power those who will sweep away all standard coin money and put the country on the basis of irredeemable paper currency.

The effort to unreasonably control the great political and social forces is frequently attended by the same results as are the efforts to control great physical forces. The higher the dam is built to stay the stream, the more certain is the mighty power of the gathering waters to finally sweep away the barrier and carry destruction, mayhap, to those who seek to turn back the course of nature.

ANNUAL REPORT.

52 WILLIAM STREET, New York, December 3, 1895.

To the Reform Club:

Your committee on sound currency submits the following report:

November 22, 1894, the committee adopted plans for work in 1895. We commenced at once a canvass for funds. Subscriptions have been liberal, and in large measure from those who had not hitherto contributed to the club's work.

Early in the year our expenditure increased at such a rate that we were compelled to confine ourselves to the few more promising of the lines along which work could be economically done, and to decline even to consider sound-money propaganda in more than one direction where the field seemed inviting. In accord with our rule, we have accepted funds only for expenditure the details of which we could direct; and have declined to supervise the work or audit the accounts of outside individuals, committees, or organizations. We are thus able to cooperate to the fullest extent with local friends and organizations, while keeping free from embarrassing relations or unpleasant responsibilities.

The following is a summary of the work of the committee for the year ended November 30, 1895:

I.—Meetings and speakers.

In the way of local meetings for discussion:

(1) On the occasion of the annual dinner of the club, December 8 last, after an introductory address by Mr. Fairchild, an address on the problem of currency reform was delivered by Mr. C. C. Jackson, of Boston, followed by Mr. Henry W. Cannon, Hon. A. B. Hepburn, and others.

(2) At a club dinner on December 29 the principal address was delivered by Mr. William C. Cornwell, president of the New York State Bankers' Association. Mr. Fairchild, Mr. Alfred S. Heidelbach, Mr. Henry Hentz, and others also spoke briefly.

(3) On the evening of March 2 Mr. Horace White delivered an address at the clubhouse on the "Relations of public opinion to banking."

The general interest in sound-currency questions had by this time so increased as to make it unnecessary to incur the trouble and expense of continuing the series of meetings at the Reform Club, the invitations from various quarters of organizations ready to bear the expense and trouble of meetings being so numerous as to make the question simply one of providing speakers; and in a score of instances speakers were furnished from the committee to meetings—political, business, and economic—that offered appreciative audiences.

With the advancing season, however, the engrossment of our funds in other urgent work made it impossible for us to meet peculiarly inviting opportunities that were offered for sound-currency meetings, especially in several of the Western States. In one, however, Indiana, the expense involved was so moderate and easily limited, and the call so urgent, that it was decided to cooperate with friends there. Under this arrangement a series of some forty meetings was arranged, all addressed by Hon. William D. Bynum, to whom the cause and the committee is thus peculiarly indebted. The programme as a whole proved such a success that nothing but the lack of funds prevented its extension into other States.

II.—"Sound-currency" periodicals.

The following table summarily indicates the progress of our "Sound-currency" series and the extent and distribution of its several numbers:

	Number printed.

24. United States Currency Statistics, 32 pages	20,000
	1,637,000

The extent to which these pamphlets have been favorably noticed by the sound-money press and the orders received for single copies are proof alike of the general interest in the questions mooted and the effective way in which they have been treated.

A subscription list of some 15,000 has justified our securing second-class postal rates, which has greatly cheapened distribution.

III.—General newspaper cooperation.

(a) From the beginning we have adopted the plan of sending out advance copies of "Sound Currency," together with a tersely written synopsis of each number, to the principal newspapers of the country. This plan has proved peculiarly effective.

(b) Encouraged by the favorable notice of the press, we suggested to leading newspapers to advertise their offices as supply points for sound-currency literature, we furnishing them a limited supply for distribution free of charge. Over 100 papers in different parts of the country accepted this offer, and we thus secured that number of most effective distributing centers.

IV.—Broadside supplements.

In April last we commenced supplying broadside supplements sufficient to accompany the full editions of cooperating local papers in every part of the country. In this way sound-currency literature was carried direct to the homes of rural voters.

This branch of our work has steadily grown in extent and importance, and in the opinion of your committee is, perhaps, of all the branches of our propaganda work, the one by which the greatest permanent effect is secured, at the least expense, in just those quarters where educational propaganda is most needed. It is an unrivaled means of putting into the hands of rural voters—in the most sparsely settled counties of the most critical States, in just the shape in which it will be welcomed and read by them—a full supply of sound-currency argument and illustration. How effective is this may be somewhat appreciated when it is remembered that it is just these papers the subscribers of each of which are in the main readers of no other periodical.

Finding that the broadsides were in general better adapted to papers of smaller circulation, a constant effort has been made to extend this work among the smaller local papers in the South, the West, and Southwest.

The newspapers thus supplied by us have been as follows: In New England 21, with a circulation of 26,600; the Middle States 88, circulation 83,100; Southern States 215, circulation 169,900; North Central States 78, circulation 116,800; Northwestern States 67, circulation 55,200; Southwest 137, circulation 94,300; Pacific States 15, circulation 17,900—making a total of 621 papers, with aggregate circulation of 563,800. Through these papers some 2,650,000 printed sheets have been distributed.

V.—"Plate" matter.

In March last we arranged to compile and edit sheets of sound-currency literature, to be circulated by so-called "plate-matter" agencies. In this line the expense to us was not great, the main item being the expert editorial service and tact necessary to collect and adapt available matter for the purpose indicated.

This matter goes out, a full newspaper page at a time, to papers in the main of from 1,000 to 10,000 circulation, which, though ready to do all possible for sound currency, wish to have more latitude as to the amount of space which can be given to this matter and the time at which it shall be published than is possible on the "broadside" system. We have been surprised to note, however, the extent to which papers receiving our "plate" matter have in general promptly utilized either the whole or nearly all that was sent them.

The following indicates the field covered, which could have been more than doubled had our funds permitted: New England States 22 papers, with a circulation of 54,925; Middle States 101 papers, circulation 208,316; Southern States 139 papers, circulation 165,768; North Central States 78, circulation 156,368; Southwestern States 138, circulation 192,990; Northwestern States 159, circulation 136,600; Pacific Coast 11, circulation 10,050—making a total of 648 papers, with an aggregate circulation of 925,017.

For some two months prior to election the engrossment of papers and their readers in the issues of local elections was such as to make less frequent supply of this matter advisable, and the former biweekly issues of both plate and broadside matter were supplanted by a monthly issue. Arrangements are now being made to offer a more frequent supply whenever popular interest in currency questions shall justify it.

VI.—Special bureau.

Another branch of work developed during the year is what might be called a "special bureau," by which a corps of contributors was organized, furnishing special series of articles for the propaganda work of papers of the very highest grade, and special articles to groups of papers. In this field, however, we were glad some time since to report a total cessation of work. The extent to which the urgent need of the articles supplied was being met by developing research and writings of independent editors and writers in all parts of the country was such that we did not feel justified in further expending the energies of this committee in work which was, on the whole, becoming so well done by others. Under this head should also be mentioned the issue or reprint of monographs, speeches, or special discussions, which, though not appropriate for either of the series noted under II, IV, or V above, was of use in our general work, and handled through the supply bureau below referred to.

VII.—Sketch and cartoon bureau.

In accordance with plans outlined in April last, the committee established a sketch or cartoon bureau, the object of which was to furnish designs for cuts, sketches, cartoons, posters, etc., both for our own publications (especially plate and supplement matter) as well as for use by others in every shape in which they might be found effective. From every available source—mainly from members of the committee and club—we secured designs and suggestions, upon the basis of which were supplied by our corps of artists, headed by Mr. Dan Beard, more than a hundred cuts and sketches. Extensively used in our "broadside" and "plate" matters, these have been perhaps the chief factor—outside of the strong general interest in currency matters—in producing the great and increasing demand for our literature. Those who have seen even the preliminary catalogue do not need to have explained the extent to which the Bible, Shakespeare, Mother Goose, Pilgrim's Progress, and a score of other sources have been liberally drawn upon. The continually increasing demand for "more" from every direction in which our illustrations have been so far supplied leaves no question as to their popularity.

VIII.—Sound-currency supply bureau.

Our supply bureau, organized in June last, was promptly perfected until our semimonthly catalogue of sound-currency publications, forwarded on receipt of price, included not only those regularly issued by ourselves, but practically everything worth seriously considering under each of the following heads: (a) Standard works, such as those of Laughlin, McLeod, Nelson, Trenholm, Shaw, White, and others; (b) Popular monographs and special discussions, such as the various replies to "Coin's Financial School"; (c) Speeches, leaflets, etc., mainly such as it has been found necessary to reprint—in all, some ninety different titles. For purposes of convenience, not merely to ourselves, but to our friends, a duplicate stock, with clerk in attendance, was kept during the summer at the Reform Club's office at Washington.

It should be understood that this bureau had no connection with gratuitous supply of literature, but was established simply for the convenience of friends in all parts of the country, who were thus enabled to secure any assortment of sound-currency literature without the delay and trouble otherwise necessary.

IX.

Two items of work now practically closed deserve special mention.

First. The late political conventions in the different States caused calls to be made upon us for special work in supplying literature to delegates and local committeemen. Kentucky, Georgia, and Ohio were the States most thoroughly and systematically covered by this work.

Second. The circumstances attending the Memphis, Springfield, and Louisville conventions, and the speeches of Mr. Carlisle in Kentucky and of Mr. Hoke Smith in Georgia, caused such a demand for these speeches that we promptly went as far as possible in meeting it, though we felt this particular work to be one the expense and labor of which should ultimately be otherwise arranged for, as in fact has already been done. Before this, however, the club had expended some $2,000, mainly in printing and forwarding in bulk for local distribution by others some 280,000 copies of the speeches referred to.

X.—Currency Red Book.

In view of the success of the Tariff Reform Red Book, issued by the club in each of the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, we early commenced the compilation of a Currency Red Book. This is now in press and will contain as full a collection as possible of statistics and argument, digested and indexed for handy use by writers, speakers, and others, on every phase of the currency questions now pending or likely to be mooted in the near future.

XI.—Extent literature distribution.

Counting "plate" matter supply (for which some, though, as explained above, very little, deduction should be made from the gross figures given below), the number of documents issued, either as pamphlets or "broadsides," or otherwise printed to an equal extent, to which the committee has given circulation since the beginning of its work for the year is approximately as follows:

Sound-currency pamphlets	1,637,000
Broadside newspaper pages	2,650,000
Plate matter, newspaper pages	5,000,000
Reprints and miscellaneous documents through supply bureau	125,000
Speeches, Carlisle, etc., (not including the much greater number lately furnished at expense of others)	300,000

Making a total of over 9,700,000, the current average, on the above basis, of documents issued being about 950,000 per month. The majority of these have been illustrated; and less than one-fourth of them have been those of statistical and literary character, which our friends have too frequently assumed to be the only ones issued by us. Taken as a whole, indeed, there could scarcely be a more thoroughly "popular" assortment of literature.

XII.—Cooperation.

Cooperation has not developed as fast as we had hoped, though this is partially due to the fact that the extraordinary success of and demand for our "plate" and "broadside" supply has too much engrossed our means to permit of exploiting promising fields for cooperation in other items of work.

We note, however, that at Fremont, Neb., at Corsicana, Tex., at St. Louis, at Boston, and at Philadelphia associations have been doing important and extensive work to such an extent as in large measure to relieve us from responsibility and permit us to offer instead of ask assistance. From the committee and members of the Boston Merchants' Association alone the direct contributions to our work have aggregated some $16,000. The expense of our cartoon bureau has been lessened some $400 by sharing with the Chamber of Commerce committee the expense of the preliminary work, and the expense of our plate and broadside supply in Pennsylvania has been met by the Sound Money League of Pennsylvania.

Our total expenditures, including unsettled liabilities, to date are $52,779.05, as shown in statement appended.

The rate of expenditure has varied from $700 per month to $10,000 per month, the highest rate being reached in June, 1895. In spite of the at first rapidly increased rate and scope of expenditure, and the later necessity for scarcely less rapid retrenchment, and the fact that our force has varied from 3 to 35, our office arrangements have worked without friction and our business, as well in expenditure and full accounting therefor as in the prosecution of our propaganda work, has been constantly kept well up to date, a full accounting, with vouchers, having been filed by the executive committee each week for the criticism of auditors appointed by the full committee from its general membership.

XIII.—Progress and plans.

In March last, after a full discussion both in the executive committee and the general committee, the following platform was adopted as that upon which the Reform Club's sound-currency committee should ask for support and plan its work:

"Pledged to oppose all fiat money, we recognize in the legal-tender greenback the worst form of such currency, and urge the payment by Government of its demand notes and their final withdrawal from circulation as the financial reform first in importance.

"We appreciate that attempts to secure forced currency for depreciated silver, or to regulate by law the value of silver as compared with gold, are most virulent phases of fiat-money agitation; and we consider provisions for a safe and elastic bank-note currency as not merely a desirable adjunct of greenback retirement, but a proper means to obviate any fear that our currency may become too restricted."

Even at the time when this was adopted it was apparent that the issue of free coinage at 16 to 1 was being forced to the front in many parts of the country. It was appreciated, however, that this issue was but incidental to the main one—that of fiat money; and hence it was not thought best in any way to narrow what it was unanimously agreed must be the ultimate scope of our work.

Events have justified this decision. During the six months last past the free-silver issue has been aggressively pressed as never before, but has been so successfully met through this organization and other sound-money agencies, political and otherwise, as not merely to have roused and rallied the hitherto timid opposition to free silver, but to have so defeated the free-silver movement at every important point as to have given it the first general setback which its friends have appreciated as such. The way has been cleared for an aggressive movement upon our part in favor of sound finance, the withdrawal of our Government from the banking business, and the renunciation by the United States of the fiat money heresies by which for a generation our politics and finances have been cursed.

This committee proposes to agitate for the prompt payment and final retirement of our legal-tender notes. It proposes to do this without reference to what, if any, new plan of bank-note currency shall be adopted. We are confident that, with our present banking and credit facilities, any possible unfavorable result from the retirement of our legal-tender paper as fast as it could be withdrawn by redemption would be more than compensated by the accession of business confidence which such a programme would assure. The committee recognizes that our bank-note system is rigid, inadequate, and fatally vicious in its entanglement of political with financial considerations, and it therefore hopes and expects that a safe and adequate system will be promptly developed; but it considers the adoption of some definite plan for the retirement of our legal-tender notes as the aim first and foremost to be kept in mind; and to this work invites the cooperation of every friend of sound currency.

The outlook is most encouraging. Never in so short a period have we seen so great a revulsion of feeling as that which has developed within the last few months upon currency questions, though we fully appreciate that the present setting of the tide toward sound currency is as little indicative of great change in popular conviction as was the late apparent yielding of a great part of the country to the silver craze a sign that lunacy was then epidemic.

There can be no question, however, of the deep interest now roused among all classes of people in all parts of the country. Nor can there be any question as to the ability of the American people to honestly and intelligently settle the problems involved, provided the facts are placed before them.

SOUND CURRENCY COMMITTEE.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, as there seems to be a desire for an executive session this evening, I shall now take the floor, but will yield for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. I desire merely to give notice of an amendment which I propose to move at the proper time to the bill now pending before the Senate. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. LODGE to the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiences of revenue.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue bonds to a total amount of $100,000,000 at such times and in such amounts as may be required to carry out the purposes of this section as hereinafter described. Said bonds shall be payable in coin twenty years from the date of their issue. They shall be offered at par to the people of the United States in denominations ranging from fifty to one thousand dollars and shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. The subscriptions to the loan, or to such portion of it as may then be required, shall be opened on July 1, 1896, and at such subsequent dates as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine at all subtreasuries of the United States and at all national banks, and the subscribers shall have the right to pay for the bonds in lawful money of the United States.

The sum of $3,000,000 shall be annually set aside from the revenue of the Government for a sinking fund to pay the bonds issued under this act at maturity, and the $3,000,000 thus annually appropriated shall take precedence of all other appropriations except those for the sinking fund, now established by law, and for the payment of the principal and interest of the public debt.

The bonds authorized by this act shall constitute a loan, to be known as the "coast defense loan," and the proceeds of said bonds shall be kept in the Treasury as a fund apart, and shall be used only for providing for the defense of the seacoasts and lakes of the United States and for the manufacture of guns, the purchase of sites, and the erection of forts and batteries for that purpose, in accordance with plans prepared by the War Department, as authorized by existing law or by laws hereafter passed by Congress to provide for coast defenses.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire merely to say in regard to the amendment that it has no reference to the gold reserve, nor to the question of currency, nor to the question of gold and silver. It is simply to provide a method for placing in the Treasury a fund immediately for the construction of coast defenses, instead of leaving the coast defenses to be provided for from year to year, which renders a comprehensive and efficient plan impossible. The sensible thing to do is, by a loan, to place in the Treasury from time to time sums of money sufficient to carry out a comprehensive plan, and to carry it out at once. It is the most economical way; it is the proper way. I believe that it is the wish of all the people of this country, whatever their differences may be on other subjects, to have their coasts, both on the lakes and on the ocean, properly defended. As I say, it does not interfere in any wise with any currency question; it is simply introduced by me in the hope that we may take this step toward the protection of our coasts, and at the proper time I shall move the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator before he takes his seat——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the amendment is offered to the pending bill?

Mr. LODGE. It is intended to be moved to the bill now pending.

Mr. STEWART. I am in sympathy with the objects proposed by the amendment. I believe that we need coast defenses and that ample provision should be made for them; but if we provide for them in this way, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts by what means we are going to get the $200,000,000 which is put in the Treasury by the bonds which are now proposed—$100,000,000 immediately and another $100,000,000 later? If we do not have some way of getting the money out again, what will the people do for money during the current year? Why not use the money which is accumulated by the selling of bonds? Are there not bonds enough being sold, with the $100,000,000 now being negotiated and another $100,000,000 proposed to be negotiated? That will tie up pretty much all the circulation we have, and if we do not have some way of getting it out what are we going to do for money?

Mr. LODGE. I do not think the Senator understands exactly the way in which the amendment is framed. It provides that the bonds shall be issued from time to time in order to meet from year to year the amounts required for the expenditures in coast defenses for each particular year; so that the money as soon as it is taken into the Treasury will immediately go out to meet the cost of the defenses. It is made large enough to cover the estimates now before the Senate for a comprehensive scheme of coast defenses. My desire is simply to put the amendment on that plane where it can be dealt with at once. It is not to get money into the Treasury and to hold it, but to give the Treasury a means of getting money without being dependent on the varying needs of the revenues from year to year.

Mr. STEWART. I will state my point. The Senator does not quite comprehend me. We have the Treasury full to overflowing now, and it is liable to create great distress. The money that the people need for surplus is to be bought up with bonds and kept in the Treasury, unless we have some means of getting it out. This is a very worthy object, and it being also a worthy object to get that money out of the Treasury so that the people can have something to do business with, why not utilize the conditions that are upon us? It is not a theory at all; it is a condition that confronts us now, a condition of universal distress and contraction from the buying up of the circulating medium and piling it in the Treasury by the sale of bonds. It seems to me that it becomes rather a duty to avail ourselves of this opportunity to provide for coast defenses. There is an abundance of money to be out of the Treasury that the people need.

Mr. LODGE. I still think the Senator does not understand the purport of the amendment. It has nothing to do with the question of money in the Treasury. I am not undertaking to deal with the gold or silver question. There is a deficit in revenue at this moment, as we all know. We need money for coast defenses. We can not take it out of the revenue, for our revenues are now overdrawn. The object is, instead of by taxes, to supply the Treasury by loan with sufficient money to deal with the coast defenses in a quick and comprehensive manner. I do not desire to detain the Senate at this late hour by trying to get a vote upon the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. It is not revenue that is injuring us now. It is an accumulation of money brought about by the sale of bonds that we want to get at; and we want to make use of the necessity for coast defenses as a means of getting some of that money out of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have intended from the first to say something on the pending financial question, but I did not desire to intrude on the dignity of the Senate by pressing forward too early in the debate. I wish to give notice that if the Senator from Arkansas expects to get a vote on the bill upon Thursday I shall occupy the floor, with the consent of the Senate, at the expiration of the morning hour on Wednesday.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE HEARING.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to submit a report from a committee?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] on the 22d instant, to report it without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Committee on Woman Suffrage be authorized to employ a stenographer to report the proceedings at the hearing of the delegates of the woman's suffrage convention.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Is there a request for immediate consideration?

Mr. CALL. This resolution was introduced by me in pursuance of a request from the delegates to the woman's convention here that they may have a hearing. A hearing has been accorded to them for many years at their annual conventions here by the Committee on Woman Suffrage, and it has been accorded to them on the present occasion. The resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and is reported back favorably.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If I could have information as to whether present consideration is asked for the resolution I should be obliged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been reported.

Mr. CALL. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that the hearing is to be had to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOAR. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 28, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 27, 1896.

POSTMASTERS.

Adam Uhl, to be postmaster at Montowese, in the county of New Haven and State of Connecticut, in the place of George H. Cooper, whose commission expired January 6, 1896.

Franz F. Metschan, to be postmaster at National Military Home, in the county of Leavenworth and State of Kansas, in the place of Edward Colbert, whose commission expired January 21, 1896.

John R. Andrews, to be postmaster at Redlodge, in the county of Carbon and State of Montana, in the place of Alice Shannon, whose commission will expire January 27, 1896.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate January 27, 1896.

POSTMASTER.

Lewis W. Reed, to be postmaster at Beaver, in the county of Beaver and State of Pennsylvania.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 27, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, January 23, was read and approved.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS, MINNESOTA.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill (H. R. 1442) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," as reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and that it may have immediate consideration.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That the fifth section of the act of Congress passed January 14, 1889, providing for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, be, and the same is, amended, so far as the same relates to the White Earth and Red Lake reservations, and as to the other reservations mentioned in said act whenever all the allotments of land in severalty shall have been made to the Indians of each reservation, respectively, therein provided, so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That whenever, and as often as the survey, examination, and appraisal of 100,000 acres of said pine lands, or of a less quantity, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, have been made, the portion so surveyed, examined, and appraised shall be proclaimed as in market and offered for sale in the following manner: The Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall cause notices to be inserted once in each week, for four consecutive weeks, in one newspaper of general circulation published in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth, Stillwater, Taylors Falls, St. Cloud, Brainerd, Crookston, and Thief River Falls, Minn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Detroit, Mich.; Philadelphia, Pa.; and Boston, Mass., of the sale of said land at public auction to the highest bidder for cash at the local land office of the district within which said lands are located, said notice to state the time and place and terms of such sale. At such sale said lands shall be offered in 40-acre parcels, except in case of fractions containing either more or less than 40 acres, which shall be sold entire. In no event shall any parcel be sold for a less sum than its appraised value. The residue of such lands remaining unsold after such public offering shall thereafter be subject to private sale for cash at the appraised value of the same, upon application at the local land office: Provided, That no timber upon sections numbered 16 and 36 in each township so surveyed shall be sold until the claim of the State of Minnesota to the ownership of said sections, as part of the school lands of said State, shall have been determined."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota to make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the Clerk read the report of the committee. It is brief, and explains the bill as fully as could be done in any other way.

Mr. CRISP. As far as I am concerned, I do not ask to have the report read. I understand this is substantially the bill that was passed at the last session.

Mr. TOWNE. It is exactly the bill that was passed at the last session, with two exceptions, one comparatively slight and the other to meet an objection that was made in the Senate.

The first change merely enables the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to sell the pine-timber lands in lots of less than 100,000 acres, instead of limiting the disposition to exactly 100,000 acres, as in the original bill. The advantage of that is obvious, because not all of the salable timber is contiguous, and for various reasons he might find it more advantageous to dispose of some of the timber in smaller blocks. That change was made at the suggestion of the Secretary of the Interior.

The other change from the bill of the last session is in the proviso at the end of the bill, which was placed there for the purpose of obviating the objection that was raised in the Senate, namely, that the State of Minnesota had certain interests in the school lands in sections 16 and 36 in each township, which it was not clear were taken care of in the other bill. Accordingly, the bill as now drawn adds a proviso that before the sale shall take place of any of the lands in the school sections, the rights of the State of Minnesota, if any, to those lands shall be determined.

Mr. CRISP. The bill, as I understand, is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. TOWNE. The bill is recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Indian Commissioner.

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to ask whether this bill is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and also the Indian Office?

Mr. TOWNE. It is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Have you the letters of the Department recommending this bill with you, so that they can be put into the RECORD and make the case complete?

Mr. TOWNE. My associate from Minnesota has the letters.

Mr. EDDY. I visited the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and also the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and they informed me personally that where they had recommended a similar bill the previous year they did not make a formal recommendation again. They assured me that they concurred in the recommendation of the bill last year, and that they even more strongly approved it now.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then these recommendations accompanied the bill last year, and it was substantially the same.

Mr. EDDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Can not you put them in the RECORD, so that they may be a part of the case?

Mr. TOWNE. There can be no objection to that. It can readily be done.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that this is a change in the act of 1889, so that the pine lands may be sold in smaller lots than were provided for by the act of 1889, and that in other respects, as to notice of sale and other conditions, it is the same as the act of 1889.

Mr. TOWNE. Exactly so; and I will say that the act of 1889, as construed by the Department, compels the examination and appraisement of all these lands before any of them can be disposed of. Now, anybody who knows anything about the sale of timber land knows that an appraisement more than two years old is valueless as a basis for the disposal of the land. This bill is simply for the purpose of enabling the land to be sold in blocks of 100,000 acres or less upon an appraisal that is of subsisting value at the time of the sale.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman will put the letters of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Commissioner of the Land Office and also of the Indian Office in the RECORD, then we shall have the whole case completed.

Mr. TOWNE. That can be done. The report accompanying the bill of the last Congress can be put in.

Mr. LACEY. What is the present condition of the title of these lands?

Mr. TOWNE. The lands covered by this bill have been ceded, under the act of 1889, to the General Government.

Mr. LACEY. Why ought not this bill to have gone to the Committee on the Public Lands, instead of to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. TOWNE. The gentleman will see that this matter comes up under the act of 1889, entitled "An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in Minnesota."

Mr. LACEY. It is a part of the public domain, is it not? It is not an Indian reservation at the present time. It is public land, is it not?

Mr. TOWNE. Yes; it is public land, under the condition provided for by the act of 1889, for the civilization of the Chippewas. The proceeds of the sales of these lands go to a fund for the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The lands sold belong to the Indians, and are sold for their benefit.

Mr. TOWNE. Yes; the lands are sold for their benefit.

Mr. LACEY. I understand the gentleman to say, Mr. Speaker, that this land has already been ceded to the Government, and is therefore a part of the public domain; and if so, the Committee on Indian Affairs would not have jurisdiction over it, so that the matter could not be properly before the House.

Mr. TOWNE. It is ceded only for the purpose of the act of 1889, Mr. Speaker, and the disposition of the land is for the benefit of the Indians. The proceeds of the sale of these lands go to the General Government, in trust for the Indians, upon which they are paid interest.

The following is the report accompanying H. R. 5103, second session Fifty-third Congress:

Mr. Hall of Minnesota, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5103) entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,'" hereby report the same back to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that the said bill be amended as follows, to wit:

First. Insert after the word "amended" and before the word "so," in line 6 of the printed bill, the words, viz, "so far as the same relates to the White Earth and Red Lake reservations, and as to the other reservations mentioned in said act whenever all the allotments of land in severalty shall have been made to the Indians of each reservation, respectively, as therein provided."

Second. After the word "Duluth," in line 16 of the printed bill, insert the words, viz, "Stillwater, Taylors Falls, St. Cloud, and Brainerd."

And that as thus amended the bill do pass.

The act of January 14, 1889 (chapter 24, page 642, volume 25, U. S. Stat. L.), entitled "An act for the civilization and relief of the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota," provides, among other things, for the cession of the Indian title to lands occupied by the different bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota, the survey thereof, the separation of the same into "pine lands" and "agricultural lands," and the appraisal and sale of such "pine lands."

Under said act such sale can not be made until the entire area of such lands, some 4,000,000 acres, shall have been thus surveyed, designated, and appraised.

The pending bill amends the original act to the extent of allowing such sales to be made as fast as tracts of not less than 100,000 acres have been surveyed and appraised.

The amendments proposed to the bill limit its application to the Red Lake and White Earth reservations only, for the reasons set forth in the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, hereto attached, and also provide for the publication of notices of sale at four additional lumber centers tributary to the said reservations, as recommended in the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, hereto attached.

The propriety of selling these pine lands as rapidly as they are in condition to be sold, instead of keeping them unsold for many years until all are ready for the market, can not be reasonably questioned. The growing timber is subject to deterioration and destruction by fire and trespassers, and it is believed also that better prices can be obtained from these sales if they are made at different times and in smaller quantities than the entire area.

The letters of the Commissioner of Public Lands, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and the Secretary of the Interior, all approving of the passage of this bill with the amendments proposed, are hereto attached as part of this report.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 24, 1894.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of 12th instant and accompanying H. R. 5103, "To amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota.'"

In response thereto I transmit herewith copy of a communication of 16th instant from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and of 22d instant from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, to whom your letter was referred.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs expresses the opinion that the provisions of the amendment should be limited to the Red Lake and White Earth reservations, or that the appraisals with a view to sale on the other reservations should not be commenced until all the allotments on that particular reservation shall have been made, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends that for greater publicity there should be inserted among the cities in which public notice is to be published the names of Stillwater, Taylor Falls, St. Cloud, and Brainerd.

Very respectfully, HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

The CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1894.

SIR: I am in receipt, by your reference of the 18th instant for report, of a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office upon a communication from Hon. THOMAS C. MCRAE, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives, dated the 12th instant, inclosing a copy of House bill 5103, Fifty-third Congress, second session, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota,'" with the request that the committee be furnished with the opinion of the Department as to the necessity and propriety of passing the same.

In reporting on this matter I have the honor to say that, so far as I can see, the bill in question amends the original act (the act of January 14, 1889, 25 Stats., 642) only so far as to permit the sale of the pine lands embraced in said act in 100,000-acre lots, as fast as the surveys, examinations, and appraisals of areas of this size shall have been completed, while the original act provided for such sale only after all the lands embraced within the act shall have been surveyed, examined, and appraised.

The Commissioner of the General Land Office reports in favor of the passage of the bill, for reasons stated by him. In this recommendation this office fully concurs.

I desire to invite your attention to the fact, however, that as the bill now reads the pine lands on any of the reservations embraced in the original act may be sold as fast as areas of 100,000 acres are surveyed, examined, and appraised, while under the provisions of the original act it can not be ascertained or determined to what portions and how much of the lands within the boundaries of the several reservations, except the Red Lake and White Earth reservations, the Indian title will be extinguished, by and under the agreements entered into with the Indians, until the allotments provided for shall have been made. This results from the proviso to section 3 of the original act which provides "that any of the Indians residing on any of said reservations may, in his discretion, take his allotment in severalty under this act on the reservation where he lives at the time of the removal herein provided for is effected, instead of being removed to and taking such allotment on White Earth Reservation."

This would seem to make it necessary that the provisions of the amendment should be limited to the Red Lake and White Earth reservations, or that the appraisals with a view to sale on the other reservations should not be commenced until all the allotments on that particular reservation shall have been made.

It is known to this office through correspondence with the Chippewa commission that the Indians generally have indicated their desire and purpose to take their allotments under the original act on the reservations where they resided at the time the agreements were negotiated and entered into. In the full and free enjoyment of this right, it seems to me, they should be fully protected. It is true that the proposed amendment provides that the sales shall be made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and it would be within his province to prevent the sale of any of the lands on any given reservation until all the allotments in severalty shall have been made on that particular reservation.

If this does not afford the Indians the protection to which they are rightly entitled under the original act by virtue of the proviso to section 3 thereof, to which your attention has been invited, it is respectfully suggested that this omission could be cured by inserting in the bill after the word "amended" and before the word "so," in line 6 thereof, the words "so far as the same relates to the White Earth and Red Lake reservations, and as to the other reservations mentioned in said act whenever all the allotments of land in severalty shall have been made to the Indians of each reservation, respectively, as therein provided."

Unless you think your authority in the matter is sufficient to prevent the examinations, appraisals, and sale of any of the lands on the other reservations than the Red Lake and White Earth reservations until all the allotments in severalty shall have been made on each reservation, respectively, this office would respectfully recommend that the above suggested amendment or some other amendment that would cure the difficulty be inserted in the bill.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office and all its inclosures are returned herewith.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
D. M. BROWNING, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1894.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive from the Hon. THOMAS C. MCRAE, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives, a letter of the 12th instant, addressed to the honorable Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a copy of H. R. bill 5103, entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled an act for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota," with the request that you give the committee your opinion as to the necessity and propriety of passing the same.

In connection with the subject, I find that said bill proposes to enact as follows, viz:

"That the fifth section of the act of Congress passed January 14, 1889, providing for the relief and civilization of the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota, be, and the same is, amended so as to read:

"'SEC. 5. That after the survey, examination, and appraisals of at least 100,000 acres of said pine lands have been made, the portion so surveyed, examined, and appraised shall be proclaimed as in market and offered for sale in the following manner: The Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall cause notices to be inserted once in each week for four consecutive weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth, and Crookston, Minn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Detroit, Mich.; Philadelphia and Williamsport, Pa., and Boston, Mass., of the sale of said lands at public auction to the highest bidder for cash at the local land office of the district within which said lands are located, said notice to state the time and place and terms of such sale. At such sale said lands shall be offered in 40-acre parcels, except in case of fractions containing either more or less than 40 acres, which shall be sold entire. In no event shall any parcel be sold for a less sum than its appraised value. The residue of such lands remaining unsold after such public offering shall thereafter be subject to private sale for cash at the appraised value of the same upon application at the local land office. And from time to time, as fast as a quantity of 100,000 acres of the remaining pine lands, the disposal of which is provided for in this act, or a final residuum of a less quantity, shall have been surveyed, examined, and appraised, the same course shall be pursued for the disposal thereof until all shall have been disposed of as provided for herein.'"

The fifth section of the act of Congress passed January 14, 1889 (25 Stats., 642), as it now stands, provides for such a sale, but not until all the lands shall have been surveyed, examined, and appraised, and seems to contemplate the offering of the entire body of lands at one time and place.

The lands in question comprise a large area, some 4,000,000 acres, of which a large portion, the exact proportion not yet ascertained, are pine lands. Before this great body of lands can be properly surveyed and examined, and the pine lands segregated from the agricultural lands, as contemplated by the statute, a considerable time must elapse, at the present rate of progress from five to eight years from the present time, and the existing statute makes no provision for disposing of any portion thereof until the whole work shall have been accomplished.

The pine lands in question are not fit for agriculture, and are chiefly valuable for the timber thereon. The offering of so large a body of lands at once would be inconvenient in many regards, and there appear no compensating advantages likely to be attendant thereupon. There exists a present demand for the timber. While it continues in the possession of the Government, it is liable to injury at any time from the depredations of trespassers, from accidental or intentional fires, from storms, and perhaps other occurrences. As soon as sold the interests of the individual owners will be effectual to provide adequate protection therefor, the timber become available for business purposes, and the proceeds of the sale for the purposes of the law in the civilization of the Indians. A large portion of the pine lands, comprehending considerably more than 100,000 acres, have already been surveyed, examined, and segregated from the agricultural lands embraced in the cession, and might be offered for sale without delay, if there were legal authority for so doing. Such authority the present bill proposes to furnish, while providing for successive offerings in convenient quantities of the remaining lands as fast as they shall be brought into condition therefor.

The bill provides for giving proper publicity to the intended offering by publishing the notices thereof in newspapers of general circulation in the cities mentioned therein. I am of opinion that for greater publicity there should be inserted among them, after the name of "Duluth," where it occurs in the seventeenth line thereof, the names of "Stillwater, Taylors Falls, St. Cloud, and Brainerd."

Thus amended, I am of the opinion that said bill should be passed.

Mr. MCRAE'S said letter, with the copy of the bill inclosed therein, is transmitted herewith.

Very respectfully, S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KIEFER. Mr. Speaker, I desire, if this is the proper time to do so, to offer an amendment on page 2, line 22, after the word "Stillwater," to insert the words "Taylors Falls."

The SPEAKER. The Chair must first ascertain if there is objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. TOWNE. There is no objection to the insertion of the words "Taylors Falls," as well as the word "Fosston." The word "Fosston" was inserted because it was considered a more important point.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendments recommended by the committee.

The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 22, strike out the words "Taylors Falls," and insert the word "Fosston."

Mr. KIEFER. I must object to that, Mr. Speaker, in so far as striking out the words "Taylors Falls" is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is pending, and a single objection is not effective against it.

Mr. KIEFER. I have no objection to the amendment, except the striking out of the words "Taylors Falls." This city, in my district, is of importance sufficient to be one of the localities in which the advertisements should be published.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Speaker, I will now move to amend the amendment of the committee, which has just been read, so as to include the objection of the gentleman from Minnesota, my colleague, and provide that "Fosston" shall be inserted and "Taylors Falls" remain. I understand there is no objection to that on the part of the committee.

Mr. KIEFER. With the words "Taylors Falls" included I have no further objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota will put his amendment in writing.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment in line 22, page 2, so as to read: "Stillwater, Taylors Falls, Fosston, St. Cloud."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. EDDY] what is the smallest amount of these tracts that will be allowed to be sold under this bill?

Mr. EDDY. Under the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior he can sell such parcels as he may desire.

Mr. PICKLER. He can do that now under this bill as it stands?

Mr. EDDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the smallest amount he can sell?

Mr. EDDY. One hundred thousand acres, or less, may be sold at the discretion of the Secretary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, before we proceed further in the consideration of this bill, I would like to hear read the letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office which has been referred to, in order that we may fully understand the purposes and the necessity of this proposed legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can have the letter read as a part of his remarks.

Mr. LACEY. Yes; I will ask that the Clerk read it as a part of my remarks. I have not had an opportunity to read it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the letter is not in his possession.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] has informed the House that he has such a letter, and in view of the fact that this bill provides for the sale of 100,000 acres of these lands, or less, in a body, the matter is a very important one, which we ought to understand a little more fully than we do at present before we take final action. The Commissioner's letter will probably throw light upon the subject.

Mr. TOWNE. Mr. Speaker, I will say that I was under the impression that my colleague had a copy of the report which accompanied the bill two years ago, but I find that in some way it has disappeared. However, pending the obtaining of a copy of it, I suggest that the Clerk read the report of the committee. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that no light is thrown upon the provisions of the bill by the recommendations of the Secretary and of the Commissioner of the Land Office beyond that which is supplied by the report, the effect of their letters being simply to say that they indorse the provisions of the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Have you the act of 1889 at hand?

Mr. TOWNE. We have the act of 1889 here.

Mr. LACEY. Then I would like to hear so much of that act read as this bill proposes to amend.

Mr. TOWNE. I will hand it to the Clerk.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Iowa will permit me, I will say that I was one of the subcommittee having this bill under consideration, and I called upon the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and learned that the Department desired to have it passed; that they regarded it as necessary legislation. Under the Nelson Act, so called, they have no power to sell small parcels of these lands, but the passage of this bill would enable them to sell in 40-acre parcels, and they desire that it shall become a law.

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to hear read the section of the act of 1889 which this bill proposes to amend. I believe it is section 5.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That after the survey, examination, and appraisals of said pine lands has been fully completed they shall be proclaimed as in market and offered for sale in the following manner: The Commissioner of the General Land Office shall cause notices to be inserted once in each week for four successive weeks in one newspaper of general circulation published in Minneapolis, St. Paul, Duluth, and Crookston, Minn.; Chicago, Ill.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Detroit, Mich.; Philadelphia and Williamsport, Pa.; and Boston, Mass., of the sale of said lands at public auction to the highest bidder for cash at the local land office of the district within which said lands are located, said notice to state the time, and place, and terms of such sale. At such sale said lands shall be offered in 40-acre parcels, except in case of fractions containing either more or less than 40 acres, which shall be sold entire. In no event shall any parcel be sold for a less sum than its appraised value. The residue of such lands remaining unsold after such public offering shall thereafter be subject to private sale for cash at the appraised value of the same upon application at the local land office.

Mr. LACEY. Then, as I understand the proposition in this bill, it is simply this: Under the act of 1889 there could be none of these lands sold unless the whole 4,000,000 acres had been first appraised and got ready for sale, and this bill proposes to change the law so that whenever the Department gets a hundred thousand acres ready for sale those lands may be sold in parcels, as under the act of 1889. I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota whether that is the purport of the bill?

Mr. TOWNE. That is correct.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the second amendment of the committee, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 36, strike out the words "no timber upon"; so that the proviso will read:

"Provided, That sections numbered 16 and 36 in each township so surveyed shall not be sold until the claim of the State of Minnesota to ownership of said sections as part of the school lands of said State shall have been determined."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TOWNE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

W. W. ROCKHILL.

Mr. HANLY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Claims of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3886) to reimburse W. W. Rockhill for moneys erroneously paid United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to repay W. W. Rockhill, postmaster at Fort Wayne, Ind., the sum of $117.50, to reimburse him for moneys erroneously reported and paid as "key deposit forfeiture fund," when the same should have been reported "key deposit redemption fund."

Mr. HANLY. In explanation of this bill, permit me to say that the mistake referred to occurred in the accounts of the postmaster, he having reported as belonging to the "key deposit forfeiture fund" a sum that should have been returned as the "key deposit redemption fund." He was afterwards compelled to pay not only the $117.50 to the "key deposit redemption fund," but also the same amount to the "key deposit forfeiture fund." The Postmaster-General has sent to the committee a letter recommending the passage of this bill, which proposes simply to correct in this particular this postmaster's accounts.

Mr. SAYERS. At what time was this erroneous payment made?

Mr. HANLY. Within the last year or two. The bill proposes simply to correct the account, which has now been closed. The measure is a just one, about which there can be no question. I ask the Clerk to read the letter from the Postmaster-General.

Mr. LOUD. Has this bill been reported by any committee?

Mr. HANLY. It has been unanimously reported by the Committee on Claims. I ask that the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 22, 1896.

[Subject: Reimbursement, postmaster Fort Wayne, Ind.]

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor bearing date of the 21st instant, inclosing House bill 3886, entitled "A bill to reimburse W. W. Rockhill for moneys erroneously paid United States." The facts set forth in the bill are correct, to wit, that the postmaster at Fort Wayne, Ind., erroneously advised this Department that he had on hand $117.50 as key-deposit forfeiture fund, when in reality same was key-deposit redemption fund. Upon receipt of this information the postmaster was instructed to remit $117.50 to the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts, which was done. The money can not now be returned to him by reason of the fact that the accounts for that period have been closed. The key-deposit redemption fund should have been retained in the postmaster's possession, to be utilized for the purpose for which it was intended. The bill is a meritorious one, and should be passed. The key-deposit forfeiture fund at various offices in the United States has been turned into the Treasury.

Very respectfully,

WM. L. WILSON, Postmaster-General.

Hon. J. FRANK HANLY,
House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HANLY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution to print a paper entitled "Geology and mineral industries of the Cripple Creek district, Colorado."

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing the employment of a skilled architect to assist the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department in preparing the designs, plans, specifications, and other drawings for the public building at Chicago, Ill.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, upon the Hon. Marcus C. Lisle, late a Representative from the State of Kentucky, and upon the Hon. George W. Houk, late a Representative from the State of Ohio, be printed as required by law.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 88) authorizing the distribution of copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in Congressional districts where distribution has not been made; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 626) providing for disposal of lands on abandoned portions of the Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation in Montana, and for the relief of certain settlers thereon; and

A bill (S. 1297) to provide for the purchase of lands adjoining the United States naval station, Port Royal, S. C.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a resolution (in which the concurrence of the House was requested) relative to outrages in Armenia.

OUTRAGES IN ARMENIA.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, if I correctly heard the message just received, there has come from the Senate a concurrent resolution touching the situation in Armenia. I ask that the resolution of the Senate may be read, after which I shall ask its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the supplementary treaty of Berlin, July 13, 1878, between the Ottoman Empire and Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia contains the following provisions:

"LXI.

"The Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out without further delay the ameliorations and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds.

"It will periodically make known these steps taken to this effect to the powers, and will superintend their application.

"LXII.

"The Sublime Porte having expressed the wish to maintain the principle of religious liberty, to give it the widest scope, the contracting parties take note of this spontaneous declaration.

"In no part of the Ottoman Empire shall difference of religion be alleged against an individual as a ground for exclusion or incapacity as regards the discharge of civil and political rights, admission to the public service, functions, and honors, and the exercise of the different professions and industries.

"All persons shall be admitted, without distinction of religion, to give evidence before the tribunals.

"Liberty and the outward exercise of all forms of worship are assured to all, and no hindrance shall be offered either to the hierarchial organization of the various communions or to their relations with their spiritual chiefs.

"The right of official protection by the diplomatic and consular agents of the powers in Turkey is recognized both as regards the above-mentioned persons and their religious, charitable, and other establishments in the holy places;" and

Whereas the extent and object of the above-cited provisions of said treaty are to place the Christian subjects of the Porte under the protection of the other signatories thereto, and to secure to such Christian subjects full liberty of religious worship and belief, the equal benefit of the laws, and all the privileges and immunities belonging to any subjects of the Turkish Empire; and

Whereas by said treaty the Christian powers parties thereto having established, under the consent of Turkey their right to accomplish and secure the above-recited objects; and

Whereas the American people, in common with all Christian people everywhere, have beheld with horror the recent appalling outrages and massacres of which the Christian population of Turkey have been made the victims: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is an imperative duty, in the interest of humanity, to express the earnest hope that the European concert brought about by the treaty referred to may speedily be given its just effect in such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them both as men and Christians and as beneficiaries of the explicit provisions of the treaty above recited.

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate these resolutions to the Governments of Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia.

Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States, the House of Representatives concurring, will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] has the floor.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House agreed last Thursday upon certain resolutions with regard to the Armenian question, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] was authorized to report. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he proposes to substitute for those resolutions which the Committee on Foreign Affairs directed him to report the resolutions adopted by the Senate?

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the resolutions which I have been directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report, and I will send them to the Clerk's desk to be read; but there is so little difference between the resolutions agreed to by the House committee and the resolutions which have been sent to us from the Senate that I think the gentleman from Kentucky will agree with me that it would be desirable that the Senate resolutions, which have already been adopted by that body, be passed, and that our resolutions lie on the table. There is practically no difference between the two sets of resolutions. I have no wish to occupy the time of the House with unnecessary discussion on this question, and it does not seem likely that much argument will be required in advocacy of these resolutions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry. I have not understood that the resolutions which have been read are before the House.

The SPEAKER. The resolution read is not before the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. And that has not yet been given.

The SPEAKER. It has not. The question is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if it can be done by unanimous consent, I would like to hear read the resolutions reported or ordered to be reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House, reserving my right to object.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that can be done.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by Article LXI of the treaty between Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, Russia, Turkey for the settlement of affairs in the East, signed at Berlin on July 13, 1878, and duly proclaimed thereafter, it was provided that Turkey should without delay carry out "the improvements and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians," and should "guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds"; and

Whereas the powers signatory to the said treaty engaged to watch the steps taken in the progress of these reforms and to superintend their application; and

Whereas by Article LXII of the said treaty Turkey agreed to give the widest scope to religious liberty throughout her dominions and to protect all her subjects and all foreigners resident in her dominions in the free exercise thereof; and

Whereas by a conditional treaty between England and Turkey, dated June 4, 1878, it was provided that if any attempt should be made by Russia to take possession of any other Armenian provinces than those at that time occupied by Russia, England would assist Turkey in defending them by force of arms, and that, in return for this engagement on the part of England, the Sultan would surely reform the local administration of those other provinces, and would fully protect his Christian and other subjects there, and would assign to England the Island of Cyprus to be occupied and administered by England to the end that she might be in a position to perform her engagement to prevent by force of arms the Christian provinces of the Ottoman Porte from passing into the hands of the Christian government of Russia; and

Whereas it appears that these said improvements and reforms have not been carried out, and that the Armenian subjects of the Porte have not been secured against Circassians and Kurds, and that the free exercise of religion is not permitted in many places within the dominions of the Porte, and that under color of suppressing and punishing political disorder outrages have been perpetrated upon the Armenian Christians of a most cruel and malignant character: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the Governments signatory to the treaty of Berlin the profound regret of the American people and their Government that the engagements made in that convention for the security of the Armenian Christians have not been performed; and

Be it further resolved, That the Government of the United States expresses its sympathy for the Armenian people and its hope that the Government of the Sultan will at once extend to them full and adequate protection for the preservation of life, the security of property, and the free exercise of religion.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee be read.

There being no objection, the report was read, as follows:

Mr. QUIGG submitted the following report:

That the present Armenian troubles are religious in their origin admits of no reasonable doubt. Trustworthy information of their extent is not available, but it is more than probable that within the last two years as many as 30,000 Armenian Christians have been wantonly murdered, often with accompanying crimes of the most infamous description.

It does not positively appear that any American citizen, native or naturalized, has been killed or injured in these disturbances. The property of American citizens has been in some cases destroyed, but the Government of Turkey does not avoid its responsibility for such injuries.

Turkey gave spontaneous assurance at the Berlin Conference that she would reform the local government in her Armenian provinces, grant freedom of worship to the Armenian Christians, and fully protect them against the Circassians and Kurds. These assurances were accepted by the powers, who jointly agreed to see to it that they were carried out.

They have not been carried out and the powers have taken no efficient steps to require their performance. To these facts, without doubt, the terrible situation now existing is due.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolutions?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I understand the gentleman proposes to lay the House resolutions on the table and take up for present consideration the Senate resolutions?

Mr. QUIGG. That is what I shall ask permission to do.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. I have no objection to that, because there ought to be some action, and prompt action, in my opinion, on this Armenian question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate resolutions?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I think it will be admitted by everybody that something should be said by Congress concerning the deplorable state of affairs in Asia Minor, and I think a very brief statement of the situation and of the considerations that have led the two committees on foreign affairs of the two Houses of Congress to report these moderate resolutions will suffice to show the House that, however inadequate they may be to express our feeling of indignation and just resentment at the fearful atrocities that have been committed, they are better calculated to effect a good result than would be a more irritating declaration.

It will be conceded, Mr. Speaker, that our interest in the situation in Armenia is chiefly humane and but slightly political. Although newspaper dispatches from Oriental points have from time to time mentioned American citizens as having been killed or injured in the Kurdish-Armenian riots, our official information is to the contrary. And it gives me pleasure, in behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to accept the assurances of the State Department as to the zeal and activity that it has manifested in its efforts to protect the rights of American citizens throughout the Turkish Empire; and also to testify to the good work that has been performed by our minister to Turkey, to whose prompt intervention, supported by the near presence of three American ships of war, the fact is no doubt due that the perpetrators of these outrages have been so scrupulously careful to overlook those persons of American or Armenian birth who are known to be able to claim the protection of the American flag.

But however remote we may be, Mr. Speaker, whether by distance or political interest, from the scene of these shocking iniquities, the fact of their occurrence excites the profound grief of the American people, and imposes upon Congress the duty of uttering such a protest as will be heard by those who, of their own free motion, have given bonds to civilization for the good behavior of Turkey. We do not need to inquire too curiously into the motives of those Christian Sovereigns of Europe who uphold with one hand a Government that they constantly menace with the other. We are not interested in their jealousies, and have no part in their ambitions. But since they have chosen, sooner than take the risk and consequences to themselves of allowing events to follow their natural course, to assume the place of guardian and trustee of the Ottoman Porte, frankly professing the responsibility that thereby attaches to them—since they in the name of peace and humanity have pledged the Sultan to just and liberal policies toward his Christian subjects, since he has acknowledged their right of supervision, and he for them and they for him have given solemn assurance to the Christian world that liberty of conscience and freedom of worship shall exist in every part of the Turkish Empire, that the Armenian Christians shall be protected against Kurds and Circassians, and that the local administration of the Porte in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians shall be thoroughly reformed, we have the right to summon them into the high court of national honor and good faith and ask why these pledges have not been performed, and upon what excuse they stand idly and shamefacedly by while 10,000 Christian homes are being plundered and devastated, and while men are murdered, women dishonored, and children sold into unthinkable slavery, and all because they will not cry out that Mohammed is the prophet of God. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered, as the preamble to these resolutions recites, that immediately after the late war between Russia and Turkey the Government of the Czar appropriated certain provinces theretofore subject to the Sultan and inhabited chiefly by Armenian Christians. Those provinces border on these, where for the last six years disorder and wanton crime have displaced every semblance of civilized government.

The Armenians are a noble and intelligent race, who have preserved for three thousand years their language and their national characteristics. Those of them inhabiting the provinces that are now administered by Russia have resented and resisted every attempt that has been made to Russianize them, and a persistent attempt of that kind has been made; but they have been treated with such consideration and have been so respected in their religious rights and practices that during the entire eighteen years of their subjection to Russia not a hint of disorder has come from their villages. This fact is extremely important, for it is a sufficient answer to the allegations that come so constantly from Constantinople that the disorders in Turkish Armenia are political and not religious in their origin and revolutionary in their purposes. It helps also to fix the responsibility for their further continuance. For it will be remembered, certainly by every Representative in this House, that it was the intention of Russia to appropriate the entire Armenian country, or at least that she was suspected of such a purpose by the Porte, and that the Government of Turkey turned in prompt appeal to the Government of Great Britain. It will be remembered that just prior to the Berlin conference a secret convention was formed between Turkey and England, in which, Turkey having agreed to reform the local administration in her remaining Armenian provinces and to protect the Armenian Christians against the Circassians and the Kurds, England agreed to protect Turkey by force of arms against Russia in case a further effort was made to seize these remaining Turkish-Armenian provinces, and that in order to place the Government of Great Britain in a position the better to carry out this agreement the coveted Island of Cyprus was assigned by Turkey to be occupied and administered by the British.

These facts, Mr. Speaker, carry with them their own conclusion as to where the main responsibility lies for what has already occurred in Armenia and for what may occur there hereafter. I shall not seek to enforce that conclusion by any comment or argument. The Christian world is looking with intense solicitude and infinite compassion upon the unhappy people whom ten centuries of persecution have not sufficed to destroy. Their tears and sufferings are a charge against the whole of Christendom. They suffer for not what they do, but for what they think, and because they think as we think. The offense against them is an offense against Christian civilization. I can very easily say whose the duty is to put an end to it, but whose the duty is not involves a question far more difficult to dispose of. But this I know, and I submit it to the serious judgment of the representatives of the American people, that the time has gone by in the development of the human race when one nation can shut its eyes to the mighty transgression of another and indifferently ask, "Am I my brother's keeper?" [Applause.]

I dare say, Mr. Speaker, that the resolutions which have been read are probably inadequate to accomplish what needs to be accomplished upon the conscience, and perhaps upon the fears, of the rulers of the Turkish Empire; but if they shall succeed in showing that the American people are watching occurrences in Armenia, and watching them with solicitude and regret, it is possible that the protest and the warning they contain may not pass wholly unheeded.

Mr. MAHON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAHON. Have your committee any information of the murder of American citizens or the destruction of their property?

Mr. SAYERS. We can not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must recollect that they must address the Chair so that the House can hear.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman whether his committee has any information of the murder of an American citizen or the destruction of American property in Armenia?

Mr. QUIGG. The committee has no information of the murder of any American citizen or of physical injury to any American citizen during any of these riots. There was a bicyclist, about two years ago or less, who was journeying from Persia through Armenia, who was murdered, and he was an American citizen; but it does not appear that the attack on him related to these religious riots. Aside from that case there is no information before the committee as to physical injury to any American citizen.

The property of American citizens in several cases has been destroyed in these riots. The Government of Turkey, however, does not deny its responsibility in this matter.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if there was any evidence whatever before the committee which tends to show that there has been any neglect, however slight, on the part of the American minister at Constantinople to inquire into, and, so far as he could, meet the troubles which are occurring there in reference to the Armenian Christians and naturalized citizens of the United States?

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, there is no such information before the committee; but, on the contrary, such information as the committee has, which of course is derived from the State Department, is to the effect that the American minister has been uncommonly zealous, and has done his duty with efficiency, intelligence, and zeal; and I desire to add my personal belief, for what it is worth, having inquired into this matter very carefully, and inquired into it from other sources than official ones, that the American minister in Turkey has met the situation there and has performed his trust as well as anyone could.

Mr. SAYERS. I am very glad to hear the gentleman from New York say so. The American minister is a citizen of Texas, and of course we feel proud that he has discharged his duty in such a manner as to meet the commendation of the gentleman from New York and of gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. QUIGG. He is a citizen of Texas, and there can be no doubt that he has done his duty; and I do not feel any sympathy with the criticisms made with reference to our minister to Turkey.

Mr. BAILEY. Without intending to inquire into the secrets of the committee room, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York if the committee considered the propriety or impropriety of this Government requesting the enforcement of a treaty to which it is in no wise a party?

Mr. QUIGG. I do not think I quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. BAILEY. The treaty of which this resolution desires the enforcement is one to which the United States was not a party.

Mr. QUIGG. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. And my question is, whether the committee considered the propriety of expressing a desire for the enforcement of a treaty among European powers to which this Government is not a party?

Mr. QUIGG. The committee did not consider the impropriety.

Mr. BAILEY. Did the committee consider the question?

Mr. QUIGG. It considered the obvious propriety of the Government of the United States calling upon those Governments with which it is in friendly relations who had undertaken a certain duty, and who had published that duty to the world, to go ahead and do as they agreed.

Mr. BAILEY. The resolution assumes that they have not done their duty, of which they are to be the judges, and not we.

Mr. QUIGG. I will not accept that. Every nation must be its own judge.

Mr. BAILEY. I was going to suggest to the gentleman from New York that I entirely sympathize with that part of the resolution which deprecates the atrocities committed against the Armenians; but at a time when we are denying the power of European Governments to interfere on this continent, it seems to me unwise for us to assume a right to insist upon the enforcement of a treaty to which we are not a party.

Mr. QUIGG. We assume no such right. We do not undertake to do so. We do not do a single thing by the resolutions which can be criticised in the spirit in which the gentleman from Texas criticises them.

Mr. BAILEY. They either mean something or nothing.

Mr. QUIGG. They mean a great deal. They mean the request of a Government in friendly relations with certain other Governments that they perform the pledges they have undertaken to perform. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to speak to that point?

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Illinois and myself were to enter into a contract, it would be no part of the business of the gentleman from New York to demand that the gentleman from Illinois should keep his obligation or that I should keep mine.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. HITT. Will the gentleman permit me to make a statement on the question.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the measure which is before the House is a Senate resolution. The gentleman from Texas asks whether our committee had considered the precise point of our Government taking any part in the European combination.

Our committee had considered the propriety of the Congress of the United States, in pursuance of a humane purpose, appealing to the Governments of Europe who had direct right and power by treaty over this question, and adopted language which is analogous to that which is before the House now. That is an answer to that part of the gentleman's question which asked whether it had been considered. It was considered carefully, and the House committee adopted a resolution requesting the President to communicate to those powers the profound regret of the American people and Government that no measures had been taken to stay the long agony of the Christian world in the Turkish Empire.

Mr. CANNON. May I ask my colleague [Mr. HITT] a question?

Mr. QUIGG. I do not yield further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I remind the gentleman from New York that he has already yielded to me. I suppose he intends to retain the floor, and I ask him to yield me ten minutes of his time.

Mr. QUIGG. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has thirty-five minutes left.

Mr. QUIGG. Then I shall be glad to yield ten minutes of that time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY].

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I heartily indorse the resolutions adopted by the Senate. The cause of Armenia seems to me to be the cause of humanity and justice. The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives had under consideration certain resolutions on this subject and they have been reported favorably to the House, but as the Senate resolutions seemed to be appropriate and to be very much in the same line as the House resolutions, in order that there might be, at the earliest possible time, some expression by the Congress of the United States, it was agreed this morning that the House resolutions should lie upon the table and that we would ask the House to take up and consider the Senate resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, the civilized world is astounded and appalled at the outrages and the crimes that have been committed in the last few years in the Armenian provinces of Turkey. Men, women, and children have been murdered; property has been destroyed; devastation and ruin have been spread over those Armenian provinces. A Turkish army composed of Kurds and Circassians has invaded happy homes, peaceful cities and towns, sacred churches and colleges, and we have authentic information that within the last two or three years nearly 30,000 men, women, and children have been murdered in the Armenian provinces of Turkey; that near 300,000 Armenians are to-day homeless and destitute; that more than $3,000,000 worth of property has been destroyed within the last two years; and all this because of the religious sentiments of the Armenian Christians. The people of all Christendom should be aroused by the sufferings and piteous appeals of the Armenians. The responsibility should be placed where it belongs, and a just Providence will surely send retribution soon.

The Armenians are a peaceful and industrious, yet courageous people. About two millions and a half of them reside in Turkey; about one million and a quarter reside in Russia; in other parts of Europe there are perhaps 200,000 of them, and about 10,000 reside in the United States. These people have been conspicuous in history for many centuries. For sixteen hundred years they have stood up for Christian homes and for the Christian religion. They have maintained their religion through many centuries amid the persecutions of the worst kind, so that they have made themselves heroes and martyrs. Within these Armenian provinces we find Mount Ararat, where it is said the ark rested after the deluge. Near by is Bethlehem, where our Saviour was born, and history tells us that these Armenian people excel all the rest of the inhabitants of Turkey in education and in commerce. Mr. Speaker, our sympathies here in America go out to all persons that are oppressed and suffering. That has been the history of our country, and to-day there are more reasons why our sympathies should go out to these oppressed and suffering Armenians than to any other people on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, there is a treaty known as the supplemental treaty of Berlin, made July 30, 1878, between the Ottoman Empire, Great Britain, Germany, Austria, France, Italy, and Russia. That treaty contains the following provision:

> The Sublime Porte undertakes to carry out without further delay the ameliorations and reforms demanded by local requirements in the provinces inhabited by the Armenians, and to guarantee their security against the Circassians and Kurds.
> It will periodically make known the steps taken to this effect to the powers, and will superintend their application.
> The Sublime Porte having expressed the wish to maintain the principle of religious liberty, to give it the widest scope, the contracting parties take note of this spontaneous declaration.
> In no part of the Ottoman Empire shall difference of religion be alleged against an individual as a ground for exclusion or incapacity as regards the discharge of civil and political rights, admission to the public service, functions, and honors, and the exercise of the different professions and industries.

This is the treaty which was entered into in 1878, and to which my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has referred. This treaty obligates the powers named to see to it that the Ottoman Empire shall in no way interfere with any class of its subjects on account of their religion.

The United States is not a party to this treaty; but there is no reason why the people of the United States or the representatives of the people of the United States should not take an interest in the suffering people of Armenia, who have been murdered, who have been robbed, and who have suffered every indignity. There is no reason why we should not declare, in the strongest yet the most diplomatic language, that we protest against such a course as has been pursued toward those suffering people, and that we regret that any nation in the world should permit such outrages within its domain. The purpose of the resolution now under consideration is to ask the European powers to enforce the treaty obligations of 1878. Our country stands to-day not only the peer of any nation in the world, but it stands as one of the leading nations, if not the leading nation, of the world. There is nothing which marks our country more distinctively than its love of justice, its love of fairness, its love for humanity, and condemnation of all that is wicked, of all that is unjust, of all that is outrageous, especially when the atrocities and outrages are committed upon a people simply because of their religious convictions. [Applause.]

Therefore we call upon the European powers to enforce these treaty obligations. It is true that we can do nothing so far as regulating and controlling the Sultan of Turkey is concerned. He sits in his palace to-day not respected for that wisdom, that courage, or that fairness which should characterize every ruler, whether he be at the head of a monarchy or an empire. We can here only express our regrets as regards the outrages and atrocities committed against the Armenians, and hope that the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence will be stayed. The protection and security of American citizens in Turkey and proper redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens is a duty our Government owes to every American citizen. It is reported that at Harpoot, a city in Armenia, where Americans have built churches, and where Americans have built colleges, one of our colleges has been burned and American citizens have been compelled to flee for their lives.

I wish to say that if such is the fact—if upon examination those statements turn out to be true, then our Government should use all the power it possesses, if necessary—its ships and its soldiers—to obtain reparation and indemnity for any injury or outrage that may have been perpetrated upon American property or American citizens.

The members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House have endeavored this session and last session to do all in their power as regards Armenia. During the last Congress we received information of these robberies and murders in Armenia. Hoping and believing that we might accomplish something, we authorized the appointment by the President of the United States of a consul at Erzerum and a consul at Harpoot, in the Turkish provinces where the greatest atrocities had been committed. These consuls were appointed by the President, but they were at first denied their exequaturs. After months of delay I believe they have at last reached their posts of duty. At this session of Congress, to still further aid them, we authorized in the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill the appointment of interpreters for those consuls.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon an inquiry at this point? He has stated that the last Congress authorized the appointment of consuls at Erzerum and Harpoot, the two points where these massacres have been the most serious——

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. And that these consuls were refused exequaturs by the Turkish Government. What I desire to ask is, whether the Committee on Foreign Affairs has any information that while our consuls have been refused exequaturs a British consul has, during the same period, been given his exequatur to proceed to a point near these two cities, and has actually gone to that point? If that be so, I should like to know why an exequatur has been refused to American consuls and has been granted to a British consul.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I do not know that an exequatur was granted to the British consul except so far as I have seen reference to it in the newspapers. As I have already stated, exequaturs were denied to our consuls for months, but I have been informed that the exequaturs have recently been received by our consuls.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman permit me one moment further? Do I understand him to say that exequaturs have been granted to those two American consuls?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. QUIGG. I understand that they have now been granted.

Mr. DINGLEY. After the massacres have taken place the exequaturs have been granted!

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. That only goes to show that the conduct of the Turkish Government as regards Armenia has been characterized all the time by unfairness and injustice.

Mr. QUIGG. Allow me to add that the condition of affairs is very much worse than would appear by the mere fact that these consuls were not granted their exequaturs until after the harm was done, because no protection is allowed to those American representatives to reach their posts of duty. That is a very serious matter which is now engaging the attention of the State Department.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, that the very fact that exequaturs were denied to our consuls when duly appointed, accredited, and sent to Harpoot and Erzerum is another important reason why the Congress of the United States should take an interest in this matter and do all that can properly be done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask my friend from New York for two or three minutes more, which will enable me to close what I desire to say.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I have but a few words more to say. I have already expressed my hope that if damage has been done to colleges or churches erected by Americans in Armenia, or if our citizens have been arrested and deprived of their liberities, all the power of our Government will be used to restore to them their freedom and correct the wrongs that have been done.

I shall vote for the pending resolutions cheerfully, and I am ready to vote for other resolutions if they are necessary in the future, but always, of course, within the scope and authority of the Congress of the United States. As has been said in the report read this morning, these outrages in Armenia seem to have been committed mainly because of the religion of Armenians. The doctrine of our country is that religion shall be free, and so far as we have the power we should undertake to uphold and support that doctrine not only in our country, but in every part of the world. Daniel Webster said on a great occasion:

> There is something on earth greater than arbitrary or despotic power. The lightning has its power, the whirlwind has its power, and the earthquake has its power, but there is something among men more capable of shaking despotic power than the lightning, the whirlwind, or the earthquake, and that is the excited and aroused indignation of the whole civilized world.

If the Sultan of Turkey continues to allow the murderers and robbers of Armenians to go unpunished, if the Turks persist in the massacre of innocent and defenseless men, women, and children because of their devotion to the Christian religion, then, Mr. Speaker, the time may come when the excited and aroused indignation of the civilized world may cause the dismemberment of Turkey and that it be blotted from the map of nations forever. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. QUIGG. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I find the following appended as a part of one of the Senate resolutions:

> Resolved further, That the Senate of the United States, the House of Representatives concurring, will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons or property of such citizens.

I understood from the reading of the report of the House committee that no American citizen has lost his life or had received any personal injury in Armenia. I understood further that the House committee had information which they had embodied in their report that some of the American citizens had lost their property in Armenia, but that the Sultan of Turkey had expressed a willingness to redress the wrong and make reparation for such loss. I understand further that there are at least three American war ships in Eastern waters. Now, if all that be true, is there any necessity for the resolution—that part of the Senate resolution—which I have just read; and may it not imply that the Administration had not heretofore performed its duty, and thereby work an injustice? Because, if the gentleman is correct in the report made to the House, I am very glad indeed to have an opportunity to express my cordial indorsement of the Administration and of its vigilance in the matter.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois, as his habit is, has answered his own question so exceedingly fully that it is unnecessary for me to occupy more of the time of the House upon it. [Laughter.]

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, if the resolution now before the House covered exclusively the offenses which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] declares have been committed against American citizens in Armenia, I would cheerfully support any adequate measure which the Committee on Foreign Affairs might recommend in order to secure redress. I am sure that there is no man on the floor of this House who would go farther, and go more willingly to any extent necessary, in defending the rights and the property of American citizens.

But, remarkable to say, while offenses are said to have been committed against our own people, there is not a line or a syllable in this resolution reciting them. But, sir, the resolution recites, as a preamble, the stipulations of a treaty to which the United States was not a party, and one of the stipulations recited deals with a matter of domestic policy, which according to our theory must be determined by each country for itself. We could not assert our right to intervene in such matters affecting other nations without admitting the right of other nations to intervene in such matters affecting us.

Mr. Speaker, there is a question in my own mind as to the propriety of this Government undertaking to even recommend to any other Government the policies which it ought to adopt and pursue. But I have no doubt that it is obviously improper for this Government to practically censure other nations for violating a compact made among themselves, and with which the United States has no connection. This resolution, if adopted, is an impertinence, if not a downright insult, to the nations making this treaty. It says in effect that the great powers of Europe have entered into a combination and assumed an obligation which they have so grossly disregarded that this Government feels it incumbent upon it to call attention to their offense.

I submit to the judgment of the House that this is not different from the case where two parties enter into a contract in which a third party who has no interest should demand of them that they enforce its stipulations. I believe that it is as gross an affront to a nation to tell it that it has violated its treaty as it would be to an individual to tell him that he had disregarded the obligation of his contract. I can see no difference between them.

I had supposed that this Government had no policy better settled than that it will not interfere with the affairs of a foreign nation and will not suffer a foreign nation to interfere with its affairs. I submit, in conclusion, to the judgment of the House that while we are denying the right of foreign nations even to interfere in the affairs, not of our country, but of this continent, we ought not to attempt an interference with the affairs of other nations. To do so must involve us in a departure from our traditional policy, and for that reason I believe the resolution ought to be amended so as to eliminate from it all reference to the treaty of Berlin.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] ten minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, the recital of outrage and wrong that has just been made to this House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] is one that seldom falls upon human ears. It is seldom, indeed, in this day of civilization, that such a story is told to men; 30,000 Christian people, within twenty months, slaughtered by the unspeakable Turk solely because of their religious views. And what do we propose to do about it? This resolution contains, first, our mild protest against outrages like these. Then we express our sympathies for those that yet remain in Armenia and that may be the subject of slaughter. Sympathy for the people menaced with a peril like this, or suffering grief for slaughtered friends! They do not want sympathy, Mr. Speaker; they want rescue. They do not want our mere words; they want Christian people to come to their relief. And we ask that those nations that have witnessed all these transactions of outrage, that are as familiar with all of these facts as we are—we ask these people who for years have been derelict of duty now to respond to the dictates of duty and see to it that their treaty stipulations are enforced. That is what we do. We protest, and the gentleman from New York tells us that he scarcely thinks it possible—that it is "barely possible"—that something may come from this action which has been reported by our Committee on Foreign Affairs after a month of deliberation.

Mr. Speaker, we all know that the English Government owns largely of Turkish bonds. We know that English capital, to the extent of hundreds of millions, is invested in Turkey, and that capital is intent upon preserving the autonomy of Turkey in order to protect those investments. We know that it is that and that alone which has kept this foul blot of a Government upon the map of the world for the last twenty years. [Applause.] We know that Russia stands anxious to get to the Mediterranean Sea, and that France and Germany and Austria and England are unwilling that the balance of power in Europe shall be disturbed. We know that they will continue the situation as it is, and yet we appeal to them to do that which humanity says we should do and that we know they will not do. We have it in our own hands to do something more than make this mild protest, and at the proper time, Mr. Speaker, I intend to offer this amendment:

That for the purpose of emphasizing our protest against the murders and outrages above recited, the President is directed to furnish the Turkish minister his dismissal as a representative of the Sultan at this capital, and to at once terminate all diplomatic relations with the Government of Turkey.

[Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, that kind of a protest would mean something. Gentlemen around me say this is too drastic, that this is not diplomacy. It may be that it is not diplomatic and that it is drastic, but it means something more than mere words. It is within the limitation of that action that we can take. We can say here to all the world that we will not recognize as a civilized government that government which permits the outrages against its citizens that the Turkish Government has permitted. [Applause.] We can do that. We can say that it is unworthy of a place among the nations, and we ought to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, the remedy suggested by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] would terminate all intercourse with a Government which to-day is in friendly relations with us by treaty pledge, and which meets every demand that we have made for the protection of American citizens——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to say that we do not want friendly relations with this murderer. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. Let me answer you with facts. You are speaking in declamation. The Turkish Government in every case where an American citizen has been touched has responded——

Mr. HEPBURN. How about the 30,000 Christians that it has butchered. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. The power of the United States to protect its citizens in Turkey, which is now something, which is now a substantial fact——

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me? Has it suspended the knife in one instance or stopped one murder?

Mr. HITT. If the gentleman will allow me to speak for a minute or two I will give him all day, if I have control of the time.

Mr. HEPBURN. You are kind. I beg your pardon.

Mr. HITT. I have no want of sympathy such as the gentleman expresses for those who suffer; but his remedy, dismissing the Turkish minister, to be certainly followed by the dismissal of our minister at Constantinople, is a strange, extraordinary one—to take away the one instrumentality by which we now are protecting many; an instrumentality which, by the code of the world, by international law, stronger than the applause of the gallery, enables us to put out our arm and save an American anywhere in the midst of massacre, of burning, and of blood, and it has done it.

That is the testimony. No one regrets more than I do that these resolutions seem so weak, that the remedy is so feeble. But how far can we go? Our action is limited by our power. Gentlemen have suggested to the committee and numerous letters from eminent men and from societies have proposed that we seize the ports of Turkey. That is still more drastic than dismissing the Turkish minister. It has been proposed that we send a fleet. Another distinguished gentleman whose name it would not be proper to mention here proposed that we should join with Russia in what is substantially an invasion of Turkey.

These are not methods consonant with our traditions or our policy. We can do something—not much.

We do not want—

As an eminent Armenian said to me, representing their great association—

We do not want you to utter things in the House of Representatives that will simply exasperate the murderous bands that are killing our mothers, our sisters, and our brothers at home. We want, if we can, a voice from you that will add to that multitudinous cry which comes up from humanity everywhere in this wide world, that will create a public opinion which in the end will be irresistible, which will constrain the Governments of England, and of Russia, and all the great States of central Europe to stop the policy of selfish standoff in which they are watching each other and make them do something to stay that slaughter, to protect the helpless, who under the sway of fanaticism are being murdered.

We only by this resolution appeal to those great powers to act as we would act. We wish that they shall move on behalf of the unhappy—be the defenders for a time of those who are suffering and falling for the sake of their religion. It is our duty to do it. We can not shrink from it. Any swagger which we may ourselves indulge toward Turkey will be wholly ineffectual. Dismissing their minister and bringing home our own, we will simply exasperate them and take away from ourselves the power we have now of preventing the property and lives of our citizens in Turkey from being destroyed. The Turkish Government is responding to the claim for property being destroyed, that every cent will be paid in full. They are taking the same time to examine the bill that we took in making out the bill. That is not only the usage of nations, but of private individuals in private disputes.

Protection has been given to Americans in perhaps overabundance, in order that we might not have a claim for intervention on behalf of those unhappy victims of cruelty and fanaticism who are falling all about the Americans there. An American citizen who is here in this city, it was related to me the other day, saw right before his face, while he stood in the midst of an armed guard he had by Turkish authority, these poor, unhappy Christians, imploring mercy, cut down, nine of them, while he could only look on helpless.

Mr. HARDY. He was not a good American, or he would not have stood still and seen that.

Mr. HITT. He was helpless, and for him to have taken any part, one man as against an army, it would have been folly. The missionaries there have suffered inconvenience, and we all feel a sympathy for the great and noble cause in which their lives are enlisted, but they have not been physically hurt. Their property has been destroyed, and it is supposed it will be paid for, but for that greater cause, for that vast multitude who will perish to-morrow and beyond, it is not in our power to directly do anything. The great powers of Europe, with 2,700,000 armed men ready, are where they can do something, and have the treaty right and obligation to do it, but we can not march there and disturb that country. It is not in our power, in the name of humanity, to invade that country, to overturn the Government, or to renew or reorganize the government of the provinces. I am sorry it is not. The days of the Crusades have passed, and we can not organize to-day a crusade, as was done eight hundred years ago.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. QUIGG. I would like to ask how much time I have?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. QUIGG. I would like to know what time I have, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that the time be extended and left within my control, if the House will be kind enough, for thirty minutes longer.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for thirty minutes longer. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Now will the gentleman from Iowa allow me a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] whether it is not clear that the object of these pending concurrent resolutions is to ameliorate the condition of the Armenians and in some way help those suffering people? The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is not before the House, and I wish to say to the gentleman that I hope he will not offer it. I do not believe it is in order, and if he does offer it I shall make a point of order against it, but I hope that the gentleman from Iowa, with his usual fairness and wisdom, will let us adopt these Senate concurrent resolutions without amendment, and thus take one step toward aiding and benefiting these suffering Armenian people. I do not believe that such a severe remedy, such a drastic measure, as that which he proposes will help them. On the contrary, I fear that if it should be adopted it would injure them. Therefore, I trust the gentleman will withhold his amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky now tell me in which part of his speech his question is to be found? [Laughter.]

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir; I asked you if you did not think that the pending resolutions were designed to give relief to the Armenians, and also if you thought your amendment was in order on these resolutions, and then I asked you not to offer it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to yield to me to make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] be allowed to control thirty minutes' time in this debate.

Mr. QUIGG. I object, Mr. Speaker, and yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose this subject is up for consideration and that the debate can run until the previous question is ordered. Is that correct, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer the query of the gentleman from Kentucky in the language of the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG]. The gentleman from Kentucky asks me if I do not understand that these resolutions are intended to ameliorate the condition of the suffering Armenians, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] said a while ago, "These resolutions are probably inadequate to accomplish their purpose. It is possible, barely possible, that something may come from this protest." Now, Mr. Speaker, to that extent I do understand that these resolutions are intended to ameliorate the condition of the Armenians, and that it is possible, that it is "barely possible," that "something" may work out from the adoption of these resolutions.

Mr. Speaker, I am always sorry when I fail to reach the high standards that are fixed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT]. With all matters diplomatic that gentleman is so familiar that whenever anyone disagrees with one, he must do it at the peril of his own doubts. But I take the liberty to disagree with the gentleman on this subject. I want this protest of ours to mean something when it goes abroad. [Applause.] I do not want it to fall, as protests ordinarily do, upon dull ears. What does England, with her millions of investments, care about our opinion as to her conduct in this matter? What do the other Governments care? But if we can challenge the attention of their people by the extraordinary, aye, by the drastic means that we propose in the amendment I have offered, then we may accomplish something. If we can startle public opinion abroad into activity until it reaches the condition that it has reached in this country, then, indeed, something may come from our action here, and that is what I want.

The gentleman from Illinois tells us that we are cutting off by this amendment the only means now within our reach of putting an end to the existing condition of things and helping these suffering people. What one of them have we helped? Where have we stayed the assassin's arm? Where have we diminished the roll of death by even one victim? But the gentleman tells us complacently that they (the Government of Turkey) are offering to pay all our accounts, that they are scanning all the bills that we present. Yes; but we are told that American citizens have not been harmed, and where, then, are the bills for damages? Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, while they are scanning the bills, let me say to the gentleman from Illinois that they are continuing their murders and rapes. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I raise a point of order against the amendment. Shall I state my reasons for making the point now, or reserve them until later?

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentlemen from New York [Mr. QUIGG] yield for the purpose of letting this amendment be offered?

Mr. QUIGG. I do not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I offered it in my own time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time was given to him by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes; but it had not terminated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the gentleman's time had terminated.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then, Mr. Speaker, I understand that the amendment is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not before the House.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I shall ask the gentleman from New York to give me an opportunity to offer this amendment.

Mr. QUIGG. Meanwhile, Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I introduced resolutions upon this subject some weeks ago, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and in the interval I have received so much correspondence conveying information about it that I shall not be able to conclude my remarks within the time which the gentleman from New York gives me, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to extend them in the RECORD.

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, on January 14 I offered in this House resolutions asking the Committee on Foreign Affairs to consider the expediency of an expression by the Congress of the United States on the subject of the Armenian outrages.

These resolutions were referred to that committee, with other petitions and memorials upon the subject from every section of the country, and in their wisdom they reported resolutions on the subject to this House, which are now under consideration and will receive the indorsement of Congress, of the country, and humanity throughout the wide, wide world.

Since I offered the resolutions to which I have referred I have been overwhelmed with letters from every section of the country, all of a similar tenor, and all expressing deep and abiding abhorrence and indignation at the conduct of the Turkish Government.

One of my correspondents describes it as a travesty on government. Another correspondent calls the "Sublime Porte" the "Bluebeard of the nations."

The Armenians are an ancient people. Their history goes back to a time the memory of man runneth not, and to a point where history melts into story and fable, in the dim twilight of time.

But its later history, since it has been under the sway and government of the "Sublime Porte," has been a history of cruel wrongs, oppressive taxation, and not infrequently of murder and pillage, culminating in the massacre and slaughter of thousands of these innocent and unoffending people during the last few months; and the blood of these murdered and innocent victims cries to Heaven for justice.

Undoubtedly the Christian churches of Armenia are the oldest Christian churches in the world, and certainly date back to the third century, and possibly to the time of the apostles.

I regret that the President of the United States could not have sent a message to Congress upon this subject, calling the attention of the nations of the earth to this crime against God and man. I hope he may yet see his way clear to do so.

Surely the Venezuela boundary dispute was trivial and unimportant as compared with the Armenian question. I desire to call the attention of Congress and the country to the weekly bulletins issued by the Turkish minister in this city, denying these cruelties and butcheries, or saying that they are greatly exaggerated.

I suppose he does this by order of his master, the Sultan. Now, I think I have the honor to represent upon this floor 200,000 of as intelligent and progressive people as there are in any land, and I desire to pay my respects to the Sultan of Turkey, and tell him that I do not believe a man, woman, or child in my district would believe him under oath. [Laughter.]

Such denials are utterly idle in the face of thousands of private letters now being received in this country by our Armenian citizens giving minute details as to time and place of these horrid crimes and butcheries that have shocked the civilized world, many of them too revolting to record or narrate in a public speech. Whole families have been butchered in cold blood; whole villages have been burned and laid waste; thousands who have escaped to the mountains are dying of cold and starvation; women have been driven into a captivity worse than death.

The rule of the Turkish Sultans for centuries has been marked by duplicity, treachery, lying, murder, lust, and every known crime. These crimes have well earned for the present ruler the appellation of "the Unspeakable Turk," for the reason that the present language is inadequate to record these awful butcheries and crimes.

The refusal of the Sultan of Turkey to allow the Red Cross Society to enter his dominions and feed the starving and succor the dead and wounded and dying victims of the atrocities if persisted in will earn for him the execration of the civilized world. [Applause.] It ought to ring the death knell of his Empire. There is abundant evidence that these massacres are not only condoned by him, but are openly encouraged. Certain it is that they are the most mournful event in the nineteenth century.

I would that it were in our power to induce the signatory and allied powers of Europe to combine together and drive from his throne a bloodthirsty prince so unworthy to be a ruler. I would that the Committee on Foreign Affairs in their wisdom could have seen their way clear to have gone much further and used harsher and stronger language in denunciation of these appalling crimes, and if it were possible, more earnestly invoke the cooperation of the European powers to end the miserable, bloodthirsty Government of the Sultan of Turkey.

I desire to append to these remarks some press comments that have come under my notice, as well as several resolutions of various bodies and a few letters that have been written to me on this subject since this matter has been under consideration. They speak with more eloquent words than any I can command, and I am sure will receive the consideration of Congress and the country.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union is a sisterhood which spans not only this continent, but the world. It is an organization banded together for the highest and noblest causes. That organization recently presented a memorial to the President of the United States and to Congress, bearing 1,200,000 signatures, in over fifty dialects and tongues, praying legislators, rulers, and monarchs of the earth to suppress the drink and opium traffic. This was the largest petition ever presented on the face of the earth. And now comes this great sisterhood and asks our sympathy and assistance for their suffering sisters in Armenia. Listen to what they say. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

We, the officers of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, representing a membership and following of not fewer than a million people, who believe that the protection of the home is the supreme duty of statesmen, do hereby most earnestly and solemnly beseech you to take such action as shall put our home-loving Republic on record as having used its moral and material influence for the relief of Armenia, the martyr nation, at this time of its supreme distress. We respectfully urge that our country should no longer remain a silent spectator of the agony and outrage inflicted by Moslem savages upon our brother and sister Christians, whose only fault is their devotion to Christ and their loyalty to a pure home.

We beg you, therefore, as the legally constituted representatives of the wives and mothers of our nation, to give heed to our devoted prayer and aspiration that America may, through her highest legislative authorities, give expression to all the world of her abhorrence of the atrocities in Armenia, and may make an appropriation from the people's money for the relief of our brothers and sisters who have been driven to the last extremity by the fatal fanaticism of the Sultan and his soldiers. We are, with esteem and good-will, your fellow-countrywomen.

FRANCES E. WILLARD, President.

L. M. N. Stevens, vice-president-at-large; Katherine Lente Stevenson corresponding secretary; Clara C. Hoffman, recording secretary; Frances E. Beauchamp, assistant recording secretary; Helen M. Barker, treasurer.

Mr. MORSE. Will the Clerk read also the following important communication from a great representative religious body, composed of every evangelical denomination?

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Honorable House of Representatives of the United States:

The managing board, to wit, the executive committee and other officers of the Boston Evangelical Alliance, comprising evangelical ministers and laymen, who have, in public session, three times during the last year passed resolutions as successive facts were published, now that the events we speak of are matters of common notoriety and public history, respectfully but urgently memorialize the Congress of the United States, the honorable Senate and the honorable House of Representatives, to make to the Sultan of Turkey the emphatic formal protest of the Government of the United States, on behalf of the American people, against the blows inflicted upon Christianity and humanity in the atrocities and massacres perpetrated upon our Armenian fellow-Christians in the Turkish Empire, and to accompany this protest with the affirmation and declaration in behalf of the people of the United States that only impartial justice and toleration of all religions as the accepted policy and practice of a Government can, in this enlightened age, be the ground of moral respect of the American people, for any nation, of whatever race or religion.

Arthur Little, president; Chas. L. Goodell, Nathan E. Wood, Fred. B. Allen, James T. Black, Cyrus Cunningham, vice-presidents; Wm. Nast Brodbeck, M. D. Kneeland, E. H. Byington, Edwin S. Meeler, John M. Lowden, W. Fred. Allen, executive committee; Will C. Wood, secretary.

A true copy.

WILL C. WOOD,
Secretary, 77 Revere Street, Boston, Mass.

Mr. MORSE. As representing thousands of churches who have made expressions to members of Congress, I ask the Clerk to read the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF PLYMOUTH, MASS.

Whereas our fellow-men and brethren of the Christian faith in Armenia are obliged for conscience sake to endure most inhuman sufferings and death: Therefore,

Resolved, That the First Baptist Church of Plymouth, Mass., in special meeting January 17, 1896, do utterly protest against and condemn such barbarities as not only unchristian, but uncivilized; that we heartily indorse the efforts of our Congressman, ELIJAH A. MORSE, in his recent criticism of the inactivity of the present Administration and all other efforts looking to the amelioration of the oppressed; that the spirit of Jesus Christ and the spirit of Plymouth Rock demand that right stand before policy.

RESOLUTIONS ON THE ARMENIAN QUESTION ADOPTED BY THE UNION CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AND CONGREGATION IN EAST BRIDGEWATER, MASS., SUNDAY, JANUARY 26, 1896.

Resolved, That we, the members of the Union Church, East Bridgewater, Mass., in public meeting assembled, hereby record our indignation and horror at the awful deeds of violence, oppression, and slaughter perpetrated on a vast scale in Armenia, under the connivance if not by the agency of the Turkish authorities, constituting the darkest blot on the fair name of the civilization and Christianity of the nineteenth century. Believing as we do, that the great powers of Europe might, if they would, put a speedy end to these atrocities, we pray that our own Government will use every legitimate means to induce the Governments of the Old World, especially Great Britain, to take such immediate action as shall lead to this result. We urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all their influence to secure such action as shall lead to the protection of endangered lives, whether American or Armenian, in the Ottoman Empire. By these resolutions, as well as by our gifts and prayers, we record our protest of this church, representing, as we believe, the sentiments of the entire community, against this enormous sin and outrage upon Christian civilization.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be spread upon the church records and sent to our Representative at Washington.

FRANK H. PALMER, Pastor.
JAMES S. ALLEN, Clerk.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED AT MASS MEETING IN HADDONFIELD, N. J., JANUARY 15, 1896.

Whereas the Government of the Sultan of Turkey has systematically deprived the Armenian people of its inalienable rights, including those of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness;

Whereas he has refused to carry out his oft-repeated promises to reform said evils, but has rather increased them by giving his assent for quartering large bodies of troops among them; for protecting these troops by a mock trial from punishment for any murders which they should commit; for cutting off the trade of Armenia with all parts of the world; for imposing taxes on them without their consent; for transporting them to different places to be tried for pretended offenses;

Whereas the Sultan has practically abdicated government in Armenia by declaring the Armenians out of his protection and waging war against them;

Whereas he has plundered their country, burned their towns, and destroyed the lives of their people;

Whereas he is at this time transporting large armies of mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny already begun, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy not paralleled in the most barbarous ages and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation;

Whereas he has brought into their country the merciless Kurdish savages, whose known rule of warfare is an indiscriminating destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions;

Whereas in every stage of these oppressions the Armenian people have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms, but their petitions have been answered only by repeated injury; and a prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a people; and

Whereas the representative of the Imperial Government of Turkey at Washington has officially notified our Government that it will not permit any distribution among its subjects, in its own territory, by any foreign society or individuals, however respectable the same may be (as, for instance, the Red Cross Society), of moneys collected abroad: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, citizens of Haddonfield, N. J., in mass meeting assembled, solemnly declare that, in our opinion, the Sultan of Turkey has forfeited all right to rule over the Armenian people; that we respectfully urge our Government to make every possible effort to induce the governments of Christendom to rouse themselves from their apathy and put an end to this intolerable state of affairs which threatens with extermination thousands upon thousands of innocent fellow-Christians; that we urge upon our Government, also, to do everything in its power to preserve the fruits of American missionary toil; that we express our ardent sympathy with the unutterable suffering of this persecuted race; that we call upon all the people of Christendom to insist that these unutterable sufferings shall cease, and that we heartily indorse the resolutions introduced by Senator HOAR in the United States Senate and by Representative MORSE in the House of Congress.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, these resolutions are only specimens of hundreds if not thousands of communications and resolutions which have been received by members of Congress from every section of the country before and since I offered the resolutions in the House on January 14, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and to which the resolutions now before the House are at least a partial response.

The following quotations from the press of Massachusetts fairly represent the sentiment of the Commonwealth that I have the honor, in part, to represent:

[Articles by Rev. Jesse H. Jones, in the Rockland Standard of January 17, 1896.]

THE BLUEBEARD OF THE NATIONS.

The Turkish Government officially refuses to allow Miss Clara Barton and her assistants to go into Armenia and distribute relief to the perishing.

This act is a confession that the charges of cruelty and destruction are true, else the Government would say to so noble a lady, "Go and see for yourself and your people that the stories you have been told are false."

This act shows the cold-blooded brutishness of the Turkish officials, that they would rather tens of thousands should starve to death than that relief should come from the infidel. Would the bread which was brought by the giaour relieve hunger and nourish the famishing any less than that furnished by the faithful? Verily, as an ancient said, "The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel."

In this act the Turk has exhibited to Christendom his real heart toward Christendom. A sort of half-wild-beast human, destitute of the capacity to originate any improvement, or lift up mankind in any way, he, a mere devourer of his subjects, shows to all mankind how he despises Christians. The word given out last Monday was of such tone, temper, and quality that it was the spitting into the face of the American people by the Turk. No such national utterance of contempt and despite has happened before in our day. When so gentle and noble a lady as Miss Barton, going on an errand of unmingled mercy for the relief of intolerable suffering, is thus grossly flouted by insolent despotism sitting a veritable Bluebeard in the bloody chamber of his Empire, hung with the ghastly trophies of his hideous crimes, it becomes insulted Christendom to ask, "What shall be done with the Bluebeard of the nations?" for that is what the Turk is to-day.

[From the Springfield Union.]

The present inactivity of Christian nations is worse than disgraceful; it is wicked, and this country can not escape its share of condemnation if it longer refuses to interfere. We will despise a man who will stand by and see a bully abuse a child, but the great powers of the world, the United States included, are calmly looking on while the unspeakable Turk kills and tortures men, women, and children who had a right to expect constant protection.

[From the Milford (Mass.) Journal.]

In refusing to allow Clara Barton and her assistants to do their work of mercy in Armenia, Turkey is only emphasizing the before well-known fact that it is the most thoroughly brutal nation that blurs God's green earth.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] speaks of the treaty of 1878 as a contract, and he protests against the adoption of the Senate resolution because it interferes with a contract to which the Government of the United States is not a party. Sir, the nations of the civilized world, in equity, have become parties to that contract and have a right to be heard, since the interests of humanity are involved.

I shall support the Senate resolution and am opposed to the amendment of my colleague [Mr. HEPBURN], although every drop of blood in my heart is in sympathy with the spirit of his amendment. But I am opposed to it because the bondholders of England and the parties to the contract, so called, of 1878, who have the power to stop these murders, should be ejected from the United States diplomatic force before the representative of the Government of the infidels. And that we are not prepared for. I say graver responsibility lies at the door of every civilized Government of Europe that has a right to enforce the contract with Turkey than lies at the door of Turkey itself.

The Senate resolution is not strong enough to suit me, but I do not see what better we can do now. For my part, though I am opposed to war until everything else has been exhausted, I would be glad if every line of that resolution was shotted with lead for the murderers under the Turkish Government. And as for Europe, I would that another Peter the Hermit would arise, who, as his prototype, with his eloquence enlisted millions for the crusade to Jerusalem, might raise his voice to alarm the hearts of Europe to strike in defense of those who are being assassinated in cold blood under the wing of the Government of the infidel.

Mr. Speaker, whatever power this Government has should now be expressed, not under the system of jingoism, not wildly, but calmly and earnestly; for the heart of this great Government is against the atrocities that have shocked, not the Christian world—I do not use that term—but the civilized world. And I would be glad if this House of Representatives, in close touch with the people, the people's body, could with united voice express its opinion of the murders which we have witnessed going on across the seas. We may not be prepared to go further; but let us sound this American keynote on this question. The last clause of the resolution has warning in it that we can strike harder yet, if the conditions approach the threshold of our homes.

If need be, I am ready to have the two-edged sword of civilization pierce the cruel heart of the Ottoman Empire.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution of our country the relations of this nation with foreign Governments are intrusted to the Executive of our land. The only power conferred upon Congress in that regard is that the Senate of the United States shall have the power to ratify or confirm the treaties so made. But there seems to be a feeling of unrest, a disposition on the part of both Houses of this Congress to take part and interfere in our foreign affairs.

No man in this House has more sympathy for the sufferings that are going on in any part of the world than the one who has the honor to address you now. But, sir, I ask this House and I ask this Congress to pause a moment before proceeding to the extreme measure contemplated by the amendment now proposed to these resolutions. Sir, in my mind there is a grave doubt whether if we wish to preserve that comity which should be maintained among the nations—if we wish to follow the rule of fair dealing which has distinguished us in our recognition of rights between individuals in our own country and the recognition of the rights of masses of men in the aggregate of nations—if we wish to preserve the reputation that has caused foreign countries to ask us to arbitrate their disputes—in view of the fact that we have the Argentine Republic and Brazil asking us to settle their difficulties—in view of the fact that among the infidel nations of the world to which my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has referred, China and Japan, who called upon our ministers plenipotentiary to defend their citizens in those respective countries and who called upon our ex-Secretary of State to assist them in their negotiations for permanent and lasting peace—I say, if we wish to preserve the character we have for fair dealing which we have established among the nations of the earth, we must not rush into every trouble or difficulty that besets other nations with whom we are on friendly terms.

We have here a proposition that the President of the United States shall be requested to give the Turkish minister his passports and send him home. Why, sir, is that the way to appeal in proper spirit to humanity for these suffering people? That, sir, is equivalent to a declaration of war. We have recently enunciated the great doctrine of our country bearing the name of Monroe that no foreign nation shall interfere in our affairs; and as part and parcel of that same doctrine we have recently sent forth to the world the declaration that we shall not entangle ourselves in foreign complications. Yet here to-day it is proposed that we stultify one enunciation of that doctrine by stepping forward in this incipient stage, I may say, of these negotiations and demanding the expulsion of the minister of Turkey from this country.

Let us at least be consistent, and if we propose to carry on diplomatic negotiations with other countries, if we propose to maintain our position among the civilized nations of the world, let us proceed in decent order. Here is a country with whom we have been on friendly terms, and where, as we have been advised by our foreign representatives, there has not been the life of an American citizen lost in the recent disturbances; and we have been advised further that that country is ready to indemnify us for any loss of property which may have occurred. If we now undertake to break off our friendly relations with that country, is that a proper way to reciprocate the conduct of that nation toward our own? When she has protected our citizens and stands ready to indemnify any loss of property that they may have suffered, can it be proper for us to propose that his excellency the representative of that country to our nation be handed his passports?

I say no, Mr. Speaker; and I do not believe that the House will vote for such an amendment. More than that, I should have preferred that the resolution of the House of Representatives, which is in courteous language, but full of feeling for the sufferings of these people, had been allowed to stand as the expression of this body rather than these Senate resolutions, which are more pronounced in their expression. But it should be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that in the Senate resolution they call upon the signatories to the Berlin treaty to perform their duty. We were not a part or parcel of that compact, and it is therefore a serious question in my own mind whether this is a proper way to conduct a negotiation of this character.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in obedience to my duty as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, having in charge the resolution now under discussion, I rise for the purpose of supporting the committee's action.

Details of the sufferings of some of those who hold advanced religious opinion in the Turkish Empire have come to my notice from a citizen of my own Congressional district who, while pursuing a worthy and honorable vocation, was thrown into a Turkish prison and subjected to indignities and suffering that should arouse the patriotic ire of every true American. He was formerly a citizen of Persia, but sought this country, sir, to get an education, being admitted into one of our great universities. Returning to his native land, he sought to use the knowledge acquired, in the interest of the benighted Oriental, soon following the Christian cross to Turkey. He had no sooner landed at Diza, on Turkish soil, than he was arrested by the authorities as an Armenian spy and thrown into a dungeon, although he carried an American passport in his pocket, which he confidently displayed. He submitted to treatment that should not be tolerated by the American people anywhere. He was chained, both hands behind him, a heavy girdle about his neck and manacles upon his feet, placed upon the cold ground in a sitting posture, and was permitted to linger unattended in filth and vermin until a faithful servant could call the attention of the American consul to his assistance, but no relief could be obtained until the high authorities at Constantinople could formulate their decree. He had committed no crime; indeed, he was on an errand of mercy. I believe it to be the duty of this Government, founded upon the principles of liberty and freedom, to speak out boldly in behalf of its own citizens and of Christian civilization.

You who have read of the terrible crimes committed in the name of authority at Mount Andak know well the butcheries committed with the apparent sanction of reigning authority and of the suffering to which Christians in Armenia have been subjected. It is said that rather than meet death by the slow process of barbaric torture inflicted on innocent women and children by Turkish soldiers, great bodies of Armenians have leaped from the mountains at Mount Andak in order to hasten their death.

One instance will illustrate the desperation to which humanity has been goaded near Mount Ararat: A beautiful young woman was directed to march down a line of Turkish soldiers and choose from among them a lover. She paused before a brutish fiend, leaned over, with a coquettish smile on her face, pretending to whisper something to him, and seizing a dagger from his girth drove it quick to her heart, rather than live by the lustful courtesy of those who had murdered her brothers and sisters. [Applause.]

I was told by an ex-American minister to Turkey, one whose great literary ability has gilded the horrors of that Empire with an interest undeserved, and which I do not believe a visit now would confirm, that a prominent Turkish officer once asked him, "Why is it that we never see an American war ship in the Bosphorus or the Black Sea?" Is it not indeed humiliating to feel that our ships are never seen in Eastern waters, and that the rights of our citizens are not guarded with sufficient jealousy?

While I would not go so far as my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and sever all official relations with the Government of the Sultan, I would not dispatch this joint resolution expressing the sentiment of the American people by the ordinary method of transmission, but after it passes and receives the sanction of the Executive, I would authorize him to place it in the hands of a captain of an American man-of-war and ask him to deliver the resolution in person to the reigning authority on the shores of the Black Sea. [Applause.]

While the powers bound by the treaty of Berlin are jealously guarding their commercial interests in the Dardanelles and the Mediterranean, the great compact in which they so solemnly engaged lacks the sanction of enforcement. Commercial considerations are exalted above those of humanity. Christianity suffers at the hands of barbarism in the Ottoman Empire, and the duty of civilized nations everywhere should be to come to the relief of struggling and suffering humanity.

We do not live in the darkness of the Middle Ages; the light of the closing days of the nineteenth century beams upon us. Let the new century not dawn until the most advanced Government in civilization has fulfilled its duty to mankind. No matter how distant the cry of suffering humanity, struggling to throw off the yoke of tyranny and oppression, let us not turn the deaf ear. No matter into what land our citizens may go, let the strength and power of the Mother of Republics be to them an inspiration in every worthy effort and their firm reliance in time of unjust trial. In this solicitude of the Government for the citizen the citizen can be relied upon to die if need be for the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE. I understand the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has withdrawn his objection to my extending my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can ask for permission to extend them after the debate is concluded.

Mr. QUIGG. How much time have I remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes left.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to one point in connection with this resolution, more especially in view of the words used by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], wherein he stated to the House that some thirty thousand, more or less, people had been murdered in Armenia because they professed the Christian religion. I want to call the attention of the House to one fact, that the Christian people of the United States have protested through their religious organizations to every one of you against this House or this Government or the President of the United States taking any steps that might lead to any complication or that might tend to bring on war with any foreign country.

We are assured by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of this House that they have no official intelligence that any American has been harmed; only Armenians have been murdered; therefore, it is said, we should not interfere. If this be true, we are exactly in line with those Governments whom we hold responsible for these horrible murders. Their citizens have not been hurt and ours have not been hurt, therefore why should we interfere? I want to say right here that I am not in sympathy with the religious sentiment of this country that does not want a war, but always wants its missionaries protected, by resolutions and prayers. Now, sir, as we are assured that this resolution is simply an expression of sympathy; that it really does not mean anything at all; that it is words, words, words; that it does not involve us in any trouble or complications whatever with any nation, I can not see any particular harm in passing it; but if I read the last paragraph of the resolution aright, we pledge ourselves to the President of the United States that we will stand by him in any measure he may take in this matter, and that means to the extent of war, if necessary.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from California allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BOWERS. Most certainly.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. If the gentleman from California will read the resolution to which he refers he will find he is mistaken in his declaration. That resolution says "that the Senate of the United States, the House of Representatives concurring," will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey and to obtain redress for injuries. Now, we have been doing that all the time for the protection of American citizens.

Mr. BOWERS. I hope the gentleman will not take all my time.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman was mistaken in his statement.

Mr. BOWERS. The gentleman has removed almost the last objection to this resolution, and all this talk about the Armenian outrages is irrelevant in connection with it. He says it does not mean anything from beginning to end, excepting a mere expression of sympathy; that it is words and nothing else, and that we are not responsible for it. Pass it, and what does it amount to? There is nothing in it but buncombe.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask for five minutes more in addition to the two minutes that remain, in order that I may yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] asks that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. KEM. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Subsequently Mr. KEM withdrew his objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska withdraws his objection. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GROSVENOR. What is the request? Is the time all to be controlled by one side?

The SPEAKER. It is to be under the control of the gentleman in charge of the proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] desires to offer an amendment, and I yield at this moment for the purpose of enabling the gentleman to offer that amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I read a few moments ago, and which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

That for the purpose of emphasizing our protest against the murders and outrages above recited the President is directed to furnish the Turkish minister his dismissal as a representative of the Sultan at this capital, and to at once terminate all diplomatic relations with the Government of Turkey.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. My grounds for making the point of order are that the concurrent resolution recites the provisions of the supplementary treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, and then says:

That it is an imperative duty, in the interest of humanity, to express the earnest hope that the European concert brought about by the treaty referred to may speedily be given its just effect in such decisive measures as shall stay the hand of fanaticism and lawless violence, and as shall secure to the unoffending Christians of the Turkish Empire all the rights belonging to them both as men and Christians and as beneficiaries of the explicit provisions of the treaty above recited.

The next resolution provides that—

The Senate of the United States, the House of Representatives concurring, will support the President in the most vigorous action he may take for the protection and security of American citizens in Turkey, and to obtain redress for injuries committed upon the persons and property of such citizens.

These concurrent resolutions refer simply to the desire of Congress that treaty stipulations be carried out, and also to the announcement that Congress will support the President in protecting American citizens.

The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is on a subject not germane to the concurrent resolutions; therefore, I think not in order. But there is a second reason to which I call the attention of the Chair. It will be observed that the resolutions under consideration are concurrent resolutions. Concurrent resolutions are employed where the assent of the Senate and House only is considered necessary. It has been the practice for many years not to present concurrent resolutions to the President for his approval. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, I contend, is not in order, because this relates to a subject which unquestionably should require the approval of the President.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to be heard upon this point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. HEPBURN. Upon the last point, I want to call the gentleman's attention to the constitutional provision which in direct terms provides that every joint and concurrent resolution of the two Houses shall be presented to the President for his approval. So that it seems to me there is a complete answer to the second objection made by the gentleman. In any event, this resolution would have to go to the President for his approval.
